Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the hon. member for Parkdale brought up the item of the Dalton Camp associates expenditure of $515,000. Would the hon. Minister care to elaborate how it was possible to give to an organization a sum equivalent to half a million dollars for advertising purposes?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, the reason I did not answer the hon. member for Parkdale is that it is under vote 401. That is where the advertising is. It is not in this vote at all.

But since I am on my feet I will be glad to tell you why the $515,000 was spent. That was a trade crusade programme that was launched. I do not think there is anything evil or crooked about putting your advertising through a legitimate advertising agency. This is done by the major companies in the business.

As far as I am concerned, I was not involved in this but I see nothing wrong with the former Minister choosing an agency of his choice. I had one of my own last year that did not do the job I wanted and I have another one this year. I presume as long as I am in government I will use an advertising agency. I have never done advertising myself in my own company because I feel that these people, for what they get out of the account, are entitled to what they earn in the way of a commission. They are specialists in their field, they are used by all intelligent business men and most of those men who want to promote and sell their products. There is nothing evil or crooked about an advertising agency earning a 15 per cent commission.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister made the comment that they are used by all intelligent business men. Is he assuming that other business men are not intelligent who do not use them?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Not necessarily, no.

Mr. Newman: Why would the hon. Minister not have distributed this total sum of money to a whole series of advertising agencies? It has never been done in this fashion before.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Frankly, I do not think that you can take that sum of money and spread it among the major advertising companies. It may be a huge sum to us, but not to some of the advertising companies which do millions of dollars worth of bookings and have advertising accountants work an account. The most this man can get out of here is 15 per cent. Let us assume that his gross commission is 15 per cent and out of that he has to pay his staff. I do not know what he has left out of the 15 per cent when he is finished.

Some of them would probably not break even on a half million dollars, depending on the size of their operation. I can assure you that some years, when I was in the appliance business, and we were not going to spend too much money, in order to get our advertising done we had to guarantee a fixed sum to the advertising agency, regardless of how much we spent, because at the 15 per cent commission the man would have had to go to the bank and borrow money to service our account.

So this amount of money here I think is a legitimate expenditure. It did a job in the trade crusade. It has created the prosperity to which we think we have made a contribution in Ontario. I would like to think that as long as we are spending this kind of money in advertising, we spend it through people who are professionals and know how to get the most for the dollar that we spend.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, this is what I wonder, when so much money is spent in this field—incidentally, it is under this item in the accounts, under trade and industry.

You said it was not under this item but it certainly—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, but the advertising is under vote 401. It has always been under 401.

Mr. Trotter: We are discussing vote 406, sir, and maybe they have changed the items in the last year.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I am sorry, the one you are referring to in public accounts is under trade and industry, but this year it is under 401, and last year it was under 401.

Mr. Trotter: Well, they must have changed the number. But one of my arguments was this, that even the government within one of its own departments had a group that could do this type of advertising, because this literally goes up into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. For example, in the same item, McConnell Eastman, I think, received $71,000. You go to another department and McConnell Eastman got $193,000, or Mr. Camp's firm got over half a million under this item. In another department he got $78,000.

It would take accountants to go through and see how much these different firms get, where it is handed out. All kinds of this money, I would say, is not spent wisely and when it is needed. Certainly a business the size of the province of Ontario could handle this far more effectively, far more cheaply, if they retained the men themselves on their own staff.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): How does Walter Gordon do it?

Mr. Trotter: Because, let us face it, in this PR work, you do not need to be that brilliant to have the Pepsodent smile and the handshake and the fancy sign. It does not take so much brilliance as it does a good handshake and a bar. I say that this is wasting a lot of money, and, as I have said time and time again, it is a way of paying off political friends. I do not care what party does it. I say it is bad for government, it is bad for the people of Ontario. Other parties do it in other provinces, or at the federal level. I say it is wrong, because millions of dollars today are being spent by governments and it is so easy to bury from public view the fact that hundreds of thousands of dollars can be handed out. In principle it is wrong, and I think there are far more efficient ways of handling this type of thing and doing this type of work.

Vote 406 agreed to.

On vote 407:

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I just made a short introduction previously under vote 405 and I apologize. I was looking at the estimates of 1965. I realize you have changed the numbers. But in that short introduction I was really leading up, in a most complimentary way, to some remarks that the hon. Minister had made previously, and I would like to quote some of those. On August 19, the hon. Minister said:

The importance of adequate housing at a realistic rental, in my opinion, lies second only to food as one of the basic essentials of life.

I think, Mr. Chairman, you would agree with me that is a very humanitarian sentiment. It was very encouraging to us when we realized that this remark was coming from the hon. Minister who was in charge of housing. We appreciated it when he stood up before us last year, that he had looked at the situation that the government was offering, with respect to encouraging public housing, and he was not satisfied. No matter how it had been embellished with a point system and so on, he was not satisfied. He was not satisfied with a lot of the red tape and the constant number of agencies and others that you had to go through in order that a developer could get going on the job, and he told us, "Give me until next year and you will hear results."

I think the term you used, Mr. Minister, is that conversations do not count in the bank, it is something else. This is what we are looking forward to hearing from you—not conversation, not that you have set up an Ontario housing corporation, but what the results are. I have been interested in the fact that you had obviously a real awareness of how fundamental good housing is to the citizens of this province. You related it to food. Mind you, you have come through with results, but you do not look as though you have starved particularly, if I can be that personal. It seems to me that you are not starving from lack of food. You have got a good healthy complexion on you and I am sure, therefore, that you have produced something in connection with housing.

I just want to repeat that this housing situation is, as you say, fundamental to the welfare of our citizens. If I could refer to Metropolitan Toronto, two months ago I looked at the figures that had come from the Metro housing register and there were apparently 2,700 to 3,000 people applying. The hon. member for Woodbine had said, and I agree with him, that there would be more than this; that the people who need housing so desperately had become frustrated with the futile exercise of registering; that they just did not apply any more.

We opened the newspapers yesterday and read of a man—I looked at television and saw him being interviewed—who in this great wealthy province was going to be evicted from his home. There was an apartment project going to be put up. I looked at his face as he said, "I am hoping that the city or someone will surely help me to get adequate housing for myself and for my children and for my family."

We place great hope in you, sir, in that you would sense the need for this low cost housing, the desperate need. I am sure that you have realized just how widespread this is, not only in this province, but across the nation. I think that the hon. member for Woodbine and others gave figures to the effect that we really need almost a million units for people across this country. This was in the brief that was presented to you which suggested that there were 570,000 young families and 18,000 elderly people across this country, who are living in substandard conditions. It is because of this kind of situation that I felt you would tackle the job. It is not that it cannot be done, and I know you realize this.

I was looking at the city of Newark in New Jersey, with a population of half a million, and they have built more than twice as many housing units as have been built right across Canada.

If we want to do the job, we can do it. It is because of this kind of situation, that I was encouraged in examining the housing corporation and the approach you are taking. I think it is a good Act. I think, as you yourself said, this can really move right in and get the job done. It can cut out the red tape. I was encouraged by the kind of men that you are attracting to serve on this—your chairman, a thoroughly able person, and others.

There were questions that were raised in the last estimates when you said, Just give me until next year. One was from my colleague, the hon. member for Downsview who wondered whether city councils might still maintain red tape, or in some way hold back the need for getting action; getting that green stuff that you say the banks need; and being able to produce the statistics. I remember you assured him that the Ontario housing corporation had the direction and planning and things would be done. It is because of this that I am now particularly keen to hear from you because we have not heard from him just how many houses have been built since August.

I would like to limit this to Toronto where we know that there is a desperate need for low cost housing, and I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he would tell us the statistics—how much has been done since August.

I know that the hon. Minister has not delayed, that he has got going on this job, that he has very encouraging statistics, not only for us in this House, but for the people who desperately need low cost houses.

I would ask how many have been put up under direct construction. In Metropolitan Toronto how many units have been built?

Another thing that interests me is that the hon. Minister can actually move in and buy houses in Metropolitan Toronto under his Ontario housing corporation. So that even if he does have difficulties with a metropolitan council or anything else, he can still move in and buy old houses and convert them into apartments, or have them as they have them in Sacramento, California, as scattered housing units. I am interested in how many have been bought and how many families are now in them.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, in order to answer the hon. member's question intelligently, and I am sure that he wants an intelligent answer—a complete and factual answer, I would like to tell him what has happened since I was here last year.

As he will recall the legislation provided for the creation of the Ontario housing corporation; this was passed in the last session of the Legislature, but the corporation did not actually come into being until August, 1964, due to the fact that the federal enabling legislation was not enacted until mid-June 1964. And even then the corporation did not physically come into being until the housing branch and the Metropolitan Toronto housing authority staff were merged on November 1, and since that time a complete staff reorganization, to meet the greatly increased volume and scope of the new housing programme, has been carried out. All Ontario municipalities have been advised, in writing, of symposiums in Toronto and Sault Ste. Marie and in many cases by individual meetings with municipal councils of the housing assistance now available to them.

Procedures between Ontario housing corporation, the federal government and municipalities have been reviewed and streamlined down to an infinitesimal proportion.

There has been an extremely good response from Ontario municipalities in the form of requests for surveys for specific projects, and perhaps the best way of illustrating this is by comparing the figures for eight months proceeding the formation of the Ontario housing corporation with the subsequent eight months.

I read from January to August 1964: Municipal requests were seven, and we cannot start anything until a municipality requests a housing programme. August 1964 to August 1965, we have gone from seven to 33 in the same period, the next eight months.

Municipal requests for projects, January to August, 1964, were five, for a total of 170 units; and from August 1964 to August 1965, the requests are 36 for 10,641 units.

Tenders or proposals called from January to August, 1964, were six for 170 units; and August 1964, to April 1965, there were 14 with 2,085 units.

Contracts awarded in the earlier eight months were four for 134 units, and from August 1964 to 1965, there were five for 168 units.

Units completed or purchased to date were 154 in the first eight months—I am talking about from January to August. And August 1964, to April 1965—306.

From these figures it will be seen that, although the number of units completed were purchased in August, 1964, and at the present date amount to only 306, a total of more than 2,000 units are at the point where construction will commence or where the units will be purchased during the next month or so.

In point of fact the response to our proposals for existing units and new construction in Metropolitan Toronto was so good that this in itself amounts to over 2,000 units. I agree that the number of units completed and occupied during the past fiscal year was very small. However, again using the statistical comparison which I have just enumerated, it will be noticed that in the eight months from January to August, 1964, requests for only 170 units were received from municipalities. It has never been our practice to force housing upon an unwilling municipality and therefore we can only build the housing that was requested. However, the housing programme now available is so attractive that, as the figures I have just given you prove, over 10,000 units have been requested during the last eight months.

Ontario housing corporation has already acted on these with speed and imagination, as indicated by the fact that 14 tender proposal calls have been made totalling over 2,000 units. Tenders for a further 432 units will be called within the next few weeks and the architectural design of over 2,000 units is under way.

I think that is a pretty good record from the time the corporation was proclaimed and got into business, and I think the hon. member will realize that a magic wand cannot be waved on construction. It takes time to process blueprints and designs and I think that between the federal authorities and ourselves, we have done a remarkable job of getting housing off the ground and getting under way.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I think this is a very puny effort. The hon. Minister tells us that at this point he has 306 units that are actually built in Metropolitan Toronto and he explains that the delay has been because he was having these built, and he says that I am to understand this. One of the things that the hon. Minister emphasized when he spoke to us last year was that he could buy existing houses—and I think particularly of the families which have three or more children. Surely it would be a great opportunity for the hon. Minister to buy existing houses—and the scattered Sacramento approach was lauded not only I think by the hon. Minister, but by his predecessor as an approach that would take place. How many existing houses in Metropolitan Toronto have been bought since last year and how many have people living in them on a low rental basis?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Let me give the hon. leader of the Opposition another full and factual explanation. This is the Metro story: It has been suggested that the Ontario housing corporation is not the proper agency to be providing houses in Metropolitan Toronto and that its programme leaves much to be desired. I would like to say a few words concerning this.

To start with, Metropolitan Toronto is well represented on the board of directors of the Ontario housing corporation in that four of its members are residents of Toronto; two of these were previously members of the Toronto housing authority. In addition, by arrangement with the Metro chairman, Mr. Allen, two of his commissioners, the commissioner of planning and the commissioner of welfare and housing, had been appointed as advisers to the corporation.

I would now like to say what has been done concerning the metropolitan housing programme since the Ontario housing corporation was formed last year. This is the information requested by the hon. member: Metropolitan Toronto requested the Ontario housing corporation on February 9, 1965, to develop 4,500 units of housing over the next three years; this was Metropolitan Toronto's request. On February 27, 1965, the Ontario housing corporation advertised for a minimum of 1,250 units, either existing housing or to be constructed by builders on their own land and to their own design. Approximately 1,636 units of existing accommodation were offered and it is expected that more than 1,000 of these will be purchased during the next month.

For new construction proposals—

Mr. Thompson: Those are being bought; how many have been converted?

Hon. Mr. Randall: For new construction proposals, over 1,000 units were submitted. These plans are presently under review by the Ontario housing corporation—

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister is reading—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, do you want me to continue or am I going to continue to be interrupted by the hon. member?

Interjection by an hon. member?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Just keep quiet now; I did not interrupt the hon. member. Just sit down. Let him go and watch the hockey game if he does not want to listen.

These plans are presently under review by the Ontario housing corporation and the Metropolitan Toronto planning commission to determine their suitability and tenders for the first 309 units will be called within the next few weeks.

I would add that the installation of services—that is sewers, water, roads, and so on—have been under way for a considerable length of time. Ontario housing corporation has hired architects to produce designs for the second stage of 269 units and it is expected that tenders will be called for these in June of this year; the third stage is 618 units, and tenders will be called in May, 1966.

Tenders for the construction of 237 units on O'Connor Drive will be called in August of this year. The architectural design of this development has been carried out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation but the housing will be developed by the Ontario housing corporation.

The Stapleford Farm development in Scarborough will go to tender during May. I know that this project has been delayed for many years but I would like to point out that it is back on the rails and now the Ontario housing corporation has taken over.

A further project of approximately 500 units at north Jane Street is under design and will go to tender about December of this year. This will provide for a spring construction start and occupancy in 1966.

Now, much has been said about the delays that have occurred at Alexandra Park and we might as well get these two items off the agenda because I know hon. members want to know about them. I would like to point out that neither Ontario housing corporation nor its predecessor, the housing branch, were involved in these delays. Not until an accepted renewal plan has been prepared, until there is an agreement between the municipality, the federal government and The Ontario Department of Municipal Affairs, until old houses have been purchased and the land cleared, can Ontario housing corporation build the new housing that is required.

As a matter of interest it was not until December of last year that agreement between the city of Toronto and the federal government was executed. When Ontario housing corporation was requested to provide the large housing requirements in Alexandra Park, it was found that the city had not at that time determined the street pattern or general planning of the public housing area. However, the city immediately hired consulting engineers and architects to carry out this work and, as a sign of good faith, Ontario housing corporation agreed to continue with the same architects for the design of this housing.

The preliminary planning is now virtually completed and the architects have agreed to make a start on working drawings for the first area to be cleared by the city. Ontario housing corporation has given the architects a light schedule to work to which provides for a tender call for the first units during the second week of July, 1965. The remainder of the project will be developed as quickly as the city can acquire and demolish the housing and other structures which are now in existence.

In the meantime, Ontario housing corporation, through the central housing registry of Metropolitan Toronto, is providing housing for those families whose properties are being purchased and who require public housing accommodation.

Other redevelopment projects in Metropolitan Toronto were: Ontario housing corporation will be developing new housing at Blake Street, Napier Street, Trefham Street, Sackville and Dermot streets.

However, I cannot emphasize too strongly that the municipality must first complete the necessary urban renewal planning and must obtain the approval of my colleague the hon.

Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) and of the federal government before Ontario housing corporation can become involved.

In summary, I believe that 1965 and 1966 will see a significant number of public housing units developed or purchased in Metropolitan Toronto. Our schedule calls for the acquisition or construction of approximately 2,200 units during 1965 and over 2,000 units during 1966.

I would like to suggest before I finish my remarks that the housing that we advertised for and the 1,632 that we got, have to be appraised by not only the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but ourselves; otherwise the 90 per cent loan money from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not be forthcoming.

CMHC have loaned us five or six appraisers; the job is going on and the housing we are going to purchase I believe will be acquired very shortly.

Now that is the Metro story. I had hoped, as I said yesterday, that I could have been more encouraging on housing but I recognize, and I think hon. members do, the amount of work that has to be done to get a programme like this off the ground, and we did not get started until November. What was in the works then is what has been completed, the 306 units.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the hon. Minister for one project which is now underway on O'Connor Drive, because that project has been under way now for a great many years. I sat on the municipal council when it was planned and when the Ontario municipal board intervened to make certain changes there. I hope that what the hon. Minister said tonight is true and that it is now actually, at last, going forward.

The other thing that emerges tonight is that what the hon. Minister has said is that there is here a great condemnation of the inactivity of former Ministers in this department and of the government up to this point. If the hon. Minister is serious about what he says—and I believe he is—and if he is undertaking a project of this magnitude, then perhaps this province will see a freeing of the shackles on public housing which we have seen in Ontario over the past generation and more.

Last year I drew the hon. Minister's attention to a problem which occurred in my riding and which has occurred generally throughout not only this area but throughout the province, where large families are evicted because there are too many children in those families and landlords do not like large families in their apartment buildings. They say, and I talked to many of these landlords, that it just is not economical, when the family gets too large, to have children running around and doing damage to the walls and to the rooms and to the building, and so they want to get them out. So the landlords and private enterprise here take the attitude that they will build for small families and for couples. But when it comes to large families, they do not like them in their apartment buildings and they say, frankly, that this is a business for government to provide for housing of this kind.

Just since last week I have been working with a family in my own riding where three children constitute a large family. The landlord has given them notice to get out. We struggled for some time to try to find accommodation for the mother and father and three children. Finally, last night, they did find private accommodation and their problem was solved.

This is typical of what is going on, and more and more we are going to have to face the fact that this problem is with us.

But there is another problem, and I bring it to the hon. Minister's attention because tomorrow a family by the name of Helmus is moving out of Rectory Road in Weston.

The father has been a hard-working, industrious person; he came here from Holland with his wife 13 years ago and finally found a job as a truck driver, and over these years has saved and worked. His work has been spotty and sporadic, but he was industrious and honest and a good citizen. Then he had a brain haemorrhage in 1963. The result is that he is living on welfare.

The family which owns the house in which he lives has given him notice because they want to move in; and now Mr. Helmus, his wife and their five children, ranging in age from one to eleven, have to move out tomorrow and they have no place to go, in spite of the searching that has been done.

They have been told that because of two things a landlord does not want them: First of all because they are on welfare and the husband is sick; and second, because of the five children.

The result is, through the good offices of the church to which they belong, the Albion Road Lutheran Church, they are now going in tomorrow with another family of five members for the next month. The expectation is that at the end of that period, a house will be available. The house is now spotted and the promise is half made, provided they can produce $125 per month out of their welfare cheque and their family allowance to pay the rent.

This is almost a sheer impossibility and this family is on its way to real trouble over this next period. The fear on the part of the parents is that they may have to break up because of a problem which is presented.

This is simply another illustration of the failure of this government over the past years to really produce houses.

I was very interested, Mr. Chairman, in the by-play here tonight. I was not here when the predecessor of the present Minister, who was also the predecessor of the present hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick), was here but I understand that he had a bit of capacity for making certain promises—12 points, 20 points, whatever the points were. I was delighted a few years ago when I attended the eleventh annual housing conference on September 11, 1963, held in Windsor. I brought away the speech of the then Minister and it is a very good speech. He told us what he was going to do and what the government was going to do and he said this, among other things:

We approach housing for the elderly in Ontario with an entirely new look, with entirely new projects; and we cast aside all aspects of axe grinding in our approach to the housing needs. If we apply skillful, broad brush strokes to our social canvas, we can accomplish in the next few years in this province a goal of magnificent dimension.

Well, then he goes on to tell about "the project that we have proposed in Metro Toronto, it is unique and for the following reasons." And he lists nine reasons—because this project for the elderly in Toronto is going to be unique.

He said, "It will take care of over a thousand people, it will cost approximately $12 million." I listened to this and I read this with a great deal of interest.

The only problem is I go down to the spot to look for this development and I have not yet been able to locate it. I do not know, perhaps some of my hon. friends over here can tell me where it is. I just could not get at it.

But he goes on to something else, and this is the thing I want to draw the hon. Minister's attention to, because it is really good.

This programme by no means ignores the needs of low-cost housing generally for our people. It simply becomes an additional plank in the 12-point housing programme of Ontario, which has been described—

—which has been described by the commissioner of housing in the United States as 10 years in advance of anything on the North American continent. A programme such as this will release a great number of houses for family occupancy, many of which hitherto have been only partially occupied. There is still a great need in Ontario for low-cost housing. I believe that with an ever-broadening understanding of it on the municipal level and an enlargement of the legislation now contemplated at the federal level—when that has come—we will be able to get on in Ontario with the finest public housing programme available on this continent.

Well, this was 1963. And this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the byplay here, and to my good friend, the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent), and when I heard about the hon. Minister going down to Africa and selling dryers—was it?—and other items to the people in Africa, and as I heard this byplay tonight, I could not help thinking that the government's housing plans, particularly this kind of plan, is all too much like the tropical dysentery that people seem to get down there sometimes, a diarrhea of words and plans but then followed by a complete constipation of action, as the medicine men of the government move in and prevent the hon. Minister and the staff from implementing the plans that they want to implement.

Now, whether the hon. Minister wanted to implement these plans or not, I do not know, but certainly in my discussions with staff members I do know that on that staff are dedicated men who do know their job and who have been anxious to get ahead with this job of housing. And I hope tonight that the hon. Minister is really sincere—and I believe he is—when he says that now they are moving forward on this plan.

Now the only problem I can see in this—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Young: Well, we hope he will be here as the hon. Minister next year because we shall call him to account next year. We want him to tell us at that point just how many houses he has built.

Mr. Bryden: He told us last year what he is telling us this year.

Mr. Young: But there is one point I want to bring to the hon. Minister's attention. The question was raised by my hon. friend here tonight. That is the acquisition of old houses. While it may solve the problem of the large family—and I hope that this acquisition goes forward for that purpose specifically—this does not add to the stock of housing unless those houses can be divided up, perhaps, into more housing units than they now contain. But the tremendous challenge that the hon. Minister faces is this challenge of 350,000 new homes that we are going to need by 1980. It means, Mr. Chairman, that we have to have an average of about 14,000 housing units per year over these next few years to catch up with the need. And that is not going to be sufficient to carry through the great population explosion that is coming.

And so, Mr. Chairman, I would hope that the hon. Minister tonight is making plans, not only to build the 2,000 units he is talking about, not only to get the request from the municipalities but to do two other things: first of all, to go out to the municipalities, wherever they may be, and to urge upon them the necessity of low-cost housing and to invite from them the kind of requests which he wants and his corporation wants, that they can measure up to this challenge of 14,000 houses at least per year.

And the second thing I hope he will do is lay long-term definite plans—those plans that will, from 1965 on, result in an ever-increasing spiral of housing in this province. It is all right to talk about what the other municipalities are doing, and what the requests are as they come in; it is all right to put the blame there, and say that unless requests come we cannot do anything about it. But I think the hon. Minister must initiate action, and then he must lay long-term plans and the kind of capital expansion that is needed in the days to come, so that he knows in 1966 and 1967 and 1968 what needs to be done to catch up with this backlog. As I said a moment ago, the hon. Minister has a staff which is keen to go to work. The hon. Minister himself knows the need and the hon. Minister himself is a pragmatist, a person who is willing, I think, to accept the challenge and to move forward in this field.

All I hope is that around him on this Cabinet and in this government are not going to be the kind of drags which we saw in years back, which prevented other Ministers from doing a job if indeed they wanted to do it.

So I would ask the hon. Minister tonight if he has definite plans ahead, if he is planning ahead for several years on this matter of expansion so that he knows what he can expect and what he wants to do and what his staff can really expect to do in the years ahead.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, to answer some of the questions that the hon. member posed. First, let me assure you that the gentleman you talk about, Mr. Helmus—you have already given the information to Mr. Suters—Mr. Suters assures me we will find him accommodation, he is one of a few others for whom we are trying to get accommodation and before I get through tonight I could give you some information on St. James Square. I am sure we are all interested in that, too, in view of the publicity. There has been a lot of work done down there and I am sure he would be interested in it.

One of the things that you would perhaps be interested in is that since last August we have had 19 municipalities that have asked for developments for senior citizen housing. We have not had one request from Metro Toronto but we have had a request for the 4,500 family units.

We can only start, as the hon. member suggested—he hoped we would go to the municipalities and tell them the story. I do not know what more the Minister in Ottawa and myself can do than what we have already done to awaken the municipalities to the fact that the money is available, the machinery is here. Will they request this survey?

Mr. Singer: Nonsense, utter nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Just a minute, my friend, do not get excited.

Mr. Bryden: You have taken over in Metropolitan Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, we have not taken over in Metropolitan Toronto. We have taken over the Metro housing authority which was our own branch.

Mr. Singer: Macaulay in 1962 said it was done.

Mr. Bryden: Is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, that the Ontario housing corporation has taken over the planning, construction and administration of projects in Toronto, other than those under the Metro Toronto housing company—limited dividend company—and the Toronto housing authority? Otherwise you have just moved right in; you dissolved the Metro housing authority.

Hon. Mr. Randall: We still have to have the Metro request regardless of how badly we want to get on with the project. The Metro council definitely has to make the request. I think that is understood. We are not trying to evade the issue.

Mr. Singer: Is it their fault?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I would be glad to go ahead and do it tomorrow if we could get on the property and build, but we have to get a request from Metro, as from any municipal council.

Mr. Singer: Would the hon. Minister answer a question?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, surely.

Mr. Singer: Is it the fault of the Metro council that we have not got housing in Metro? Or is it the fault of the province?

Mr. Bryden: It is the fault of both.

Mr. Singer: Whose fault is it?

Hon. Mr. Randall: They build their own senior citizen housing. They have not requested any senior citizen housing from us. They build their own. As I say, they have asked us for family units. We got the request on February 9. We moved on February 27. I do not know how we could move any faster.

Mr. Singer: With great respect, you did not answer my question, sir. I said, is it the fault of Metro that the plan projected by Mr. Macaulay in 1962, as reflected on page 380 of Hansard, was not implemented, or was it your fault?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I am not too sure what Mr. Macaulay's original intentions were, but—

Mr. Singer: I will tell you shortly.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Just a minute. This was put up to the Metro chairman, Mr. Allen, and it was turned down.

Mr. Singer: Is it Allen's fault.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): Yak, yak, yak.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I would not say that. It is not fair to say that.

Mr. Singer: Well, you should say it.

Hon. Mr. Randall: It is their decision.

Mr. Edwards: Yak, yak, yak.

Mr. Singer: Yak-yak, as long as you want, but there are no houses.

Mr. Edwards: But you have been yak-yaking for years.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, may I just finish answering the hon. member's question?

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's question. You ask, are we serious? I say, yes, we are serious and the government is serious. I would point out to you we have $9 million this year to spend on housing, that is $90 million with the 90 per cent from the federal government. Only yesterday Mr. Nicholson went before the Cabinet and asked for another $100 million, and I have had a number of discussions with him. Mr. Soble is up there today talking to Mr. Nicholson about some housing matters, and I can assure you that the federal government and ourselves are serious about a programme. We have to be. Of the 10,000 units we have got here as a result of being serious about the housing programme—these cannot disappear—we have got to do something with them, and I have outlined a programme of what we are doing. They are coming through in stages, and I am quite confident that a year from now these houses will be produced as we say.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, there is something I want to clarify, and I think the hon. Minister will understand me completely. He said that conversation when you go to the bank counts for nothing, it is the statistics of the cash I presume he is talking about when you see a bank manager. I would recommend that to the people.

I had felt the hon. Minister fully recognized what this is doing to human beings in this city, because I am going to focus again on Metro Toronto. They do not have homes. You are aware of the need for low cost housing. You stood up last year, and said to us, the Opposition, give me a year and I will come back. When you go to the bank manager, we are through with conversation, I will show you the green stuff.

I want to ask a question, and I would like, instead of a long involved answer, some green stuff for the man without a house right now, and there are thousands of them in this city.

Mr. Trotter: Thirty thousand of them in Ontario.

Mr. Thompson: The green stuff that he wants to know is how many houses this great Ontario housing corporation has bought. That is, first of all, you can buy existing houses and you can give us excuses about the fact that you will hear next year that they are developing houses. You can actually go and buy houses. How many have you bought in the past year? That is my first question.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I thought I answered that, but I will repeat it again. We have not bought one house at the moment. We got a request from Metro on February 9 to advertise for houses. We got the 1,652 houses turned into us by the builders, they processed the paper work. We borrowed staff from Ottawa to go through their propositions. We had to boil a lot of them out because they did not meet NHA specifications, and the federal money would not be forthcoming. As I say, it has boiled down to 1,000 houses.

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry to interrupt, but my question was about existing houses. You do not need NHA plans for houses that are built and exist.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Oh yes, you do.

Mr. Thompson: Well, let me put this again to you. When you stood before us last year, the hon. member for Downsview raised the very apprehensions which you are now using as excuses for not having come through with results. He told you he thought there would still be delays. You assured him that with this Ontario housing corporation there would be results. You said you would stand up before us and there would be results. I say to you, sir, that if you went to your bank manager and you did not produce the green stuff, he would say you have got conversation. That is the state of the man in Toronto right now. We read yesterday of a man's troubles in connection with getting low cost housing and does not know where to turn. At this point, you have not provided him with an answer and you have not provided us with an answer.

Once again, we have to give you a waiting period of another year, and we hope that next year you will really come back and have production. I think you probably will, but as far as I am concerned you asked for a deadline of a year and you have not produced.

Mr. Singer: Not a thing.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I have produced. There are 10,000 houses right here that have been requested, and we are prepared to produce them. I have told you time and time again you cannot wave a magic wand and build houses overnight. We have to get the requests. The requests are here, and we will build the 10,000 houses.

Mr. Bryden: Over how long a period?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We have told you what the schedule is. You have more intelligence than to stand here and tell me that a year ago I promised you I would have this number of houses. I told you I would get a housing programme underway, and I would produce housing, and the very fact—

Mr. Thompson: And produce housing.

Hon. Mr. Randall: —that we have 10,000 requests here tonight indicates that we have done exactly what this government promised to do, and we will follow up the schedule until the houses are built.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Scarborough West.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, bless the Chairman of this House. I do not want to wait another year. I want to give the hon. Minister about an hour and 33 minutes, because in an hour and 33 minutes time, 53 families presently in St. James Town, could well be evicted according to the previous stipulations that were presented to them. I am rather interested to find us on the verge, or in the midst, of a housing debate in this House without having brought St. James Town into direct focus, and I would like to spend a little time on this.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Would you like me to talk about the St. James Town?

Mr. S. Lewis: Well, I will offer some ideas and you can illuminate them.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I will listen and make notes.

Mr. S. Lewis: I would like to spend a little time on St. James Town because I think it is rather an interesting reflection on what happens when the Ontario housing corporation steps in, and then fails to come to grips with the problem. As a matter of fact, if St. James Town is the test case—and it is one of the most dramatic examples of the last little while—then indeed there are some concerns about the Ontario housing corporation. I am not particularly appreciative if the hon. Minister sits like a latter day Nero fiddling while St. James Town burns, because of course, that is precisely what is happening.

I want to suggest to him that it is basically out of character. The persistence and the energy and the capacities which he has demonstrated in certain other areas of this portfolio—sometimes more limited, sometimes in a grandiose but effective way—are not reflected in the housing branch, and it may be that it is too much for him.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I disagree with you.

Mr. S. Lewis: It may be that the housing branch should not be part of this department. It may be that it should have a separate hon. Minister. It may be that it should report to some other Cabinet portfolio, but through the last many years, housing has been seriously—and, I suggest to you, callously—neglected by the Conservatives in Ontario. And that although this hon. Minister has some signs on his books for change, we here continue to be concerned about it. Let me put St. James Town, if I may, in the context of public housing for just a moment in the Metro Toronto area. The hon. Minister points out that it was not until August that the Ontario housing corporation began to come to grips with things, and in that incredible fall period between August and December, let us say, we had what I would like to describe as an adolescent by-play between the Ontario housing corporation people and the officials in the city of Toronto and Metropolitan Toronto. Indeed, between themselves and the hon. Minister. As a matter of fact, if memory serves me correctly, the esteemed mayor of Toronto at one point said that the hon. Minister was full of some very unlovely substance, and he replied that the mayor himself did not know what he was talking about.

Nobody could understand what the needs of Metropolitan Toronto were; no one could seem to come to grips with the problem, despite the fact that Mr. Brady, who is the number three man on the Ontario housing corporation, had been the major force behind the Metropolitan Toronto housing authority and knew exactly what the housing requirements in Metro Toronto were. He knew precisely what was needed and we have this interim lag of several months.

“And then,” says the hon. Minister, “finally, either through persuasion or coercion, the city of Toronto and Metro Toronto were forced to come before the Ontario housing corporation on February 9 and made their request for 4,500 units over three years. And that,” says the hon. Minister, “cleared the air.”

Cleared the air, did it? That was on February 9, 1965. On March 31, 1965, nearly a month ago, we had a major news story in the Toronto press saying: "Muddles Over Housing, Mayor, Controllers Admit."

Let me read portions of it into the text:

Mayor Philip Givens and Toronto's four controllers confessed yesterday that they are hopelessly confused about the city's public housing situation, and the respective roles of the Toronto housing authority and the Ontario housing corporation.

Mr. Givens told the board of control that he had been unable to get any answers out of the Ontario housing corporation. Whenever he asks what the corporation is doing, it says it has not been asked to do anything, the mayor said.

He said the only information he gets about the corporation is through the newspapers. "Everything is in the rumour stage, I get everything second-hand," the mayor complained.

Controller Herbert Orliffe, who started the protest, said there is either a lack of communication or clash of personalities between the authority and the corporation.

I strongly suggest that it may, unhappily enough, be the latter.

Controller Margaret Campbell said: "I find myself completely confused about what the situation is."

And then the mayor ended the meeting by saying: "Let us hope the good Lord intervenes in our behalf."

"We certainly need help," said Mrs. Campbell.

It is a rather interesting situation that on April 1, 1965, almost two months after the Ontario housing corporation had finalized agreements, there is still no liaison between the Ontario housing corporation and the Toronto housing authority; still no liaison worth anything in terms of clarity and understanding between the Ontario housing corporation and the board of control and its membership in the city of Toronto.

I want to suggest to the hon. Minister that he may be pleased with what the Ontario housing corporation is achieving, but obviously it has not persuaded the people with whom it must deal. The hon. Minister will never get housing in the Metropolitan Toronto area if that situation is allowed to persist.

The St. James Town project is a case study in cynicism and unsavoury motives. It goes all the way back—the hon. Minister will know better than I—to the days of the Parliament syndicate and Andrew MacFarlane's spate of articles in the Telegram which were blood chilling to read—as unhappy a history of inadequate planning that could be conceived. Duplicity, harassment, creation of a slum—right through that series of subsequent syndicates to take over the St. James Town area—continued slum evolution down to 1961 when the Rose Park Apartments Limited were unsuccessful in their efforts to take it over.

Finally, in the latter and final part of this saga, at the end of 1964 and early 1965, the Howard Investments stepped in.

I want to say to the hon. Minister—and I say this to him in all good faith—that in every instance, while the whims of the private developers were given overriding precedence, the need for relocating people in a planned fashion was relegated to the waste basket of the urban renewal programme. There simply has never been a grasp within the Ontario housing corporation now, or within the authority which preceded it, for the need to relocate people effectively.

The plans are finalized; the axe falls and the eviction notices are served. I have no doubt that the hon. Minister is going to stand up a little later and say that the member for Scarborough West will be pleased to know that we are postponing the evictions, nobody will be evicted tomorrow and they will have a little more time. I am sure, as I stand here, that this is likely to be his reply. I say to him in anticipation that no Minister of the Crown has the right to hang a Damocles sword over a large number of families, many of them with multiple problems, no right whatsoever.

If, in fact, the Ontario housing corporation steps into this kind of situation, it cannot simply play with people's lives in a rather frivolous and unbecoming fashion, which is the main characteristic of this whole St. James Town affair.

I want to point out that there are more than 200 families affected; that they are on low income levels; that there are large numbers in many families; that several suffer cultural deprivation.

There will be a real problem of psychological adjustment for some of them. There are a goodly number on welfare rolls, existing in present slum conditions and being faced with the possibility of further slum conditions and we have engaged, by putting them on welfare rolls, in this peculiar policy in Ontario of subsidizing slum landlords out of the public purse. But 53 of the families involved have been presented with a fait accompli, just as in effect the city of Toronto was presented with a fait accompli.

The housing authority stepped in when the plans were made early in 1965. While perhaps the hon. Minister will correct me if I am wrong, I believe that the Toronto housing authority is the only municipal authority of its kind through the province and that the Ontario housing corporation when it merged a great many other authorities, created a quite distinct and individual entity, but it left the Toronto housing authority alone—itsself very distinctive.

The Toronto housing authority worried about the consequences to the St. James Town residents and it began—I believe it was in February or March—to develop a programme. They worked for six weeks and were prepared to provide what Mr. Bradley said at the time was “instant” housing. He even named the housing and the streets.

He went to the Toronto board of control at the end of March, 1965, and asked for $36,000 and the Toronto board of control said he could have $36,000. They were willing to vote the money. The Toronto housing authority was willing to relocate the people. They had been in the field for 17 years and had opened up a lot of contacts. They had undertaken the relocation and at that point, for reasons I would appreciate the hon. Minister explaining to the House, the Ontario housing corporation stepped into the St. James Town picture, with great largesse, and agreed to take over the relocation of families.

At the moment the Ontario housing corporation stepped in, all the most perplexing and confusing trouble began. In fact, let it be said that those families for whom the Toronto housing authority is still responsible are likely to be adequately relocated. It is the families for whom the Ontario housing corporation is responsible who are not likely to be relocated and who face eviction—if the evictions are served—tomorrow, during the day an hour and 20-odd minutes from now.

I want to know why the Ontario housing corporation suddenly stepped in. It was very nice of them to step in; it meant that the Toronto board of control did not have to pay the full $36,000 and they were glad to pay a lesser sum. But since the Ontario housing corporation talked so much about municipal initiative and municipal authority, surely this was a situation where the Toronto housing authority should have been allowed to do the job.

But the Ontario housing corporation stepped in and it throws many of us—it throws me, I must tell the hon. Minister frankly, into a quandary. I have never particularly thought that we could rely upon this happy thing of municipal initiative, I do not think it comes properly from municipalities. I do not think that we will ever have a housing programme in Ontario if it is contingent upon municipal initiative. But in the one instance where the municipality had showed initiative in relocating people, the Ontario housing corporation stepped in and promptly managed to destroy the base of confidence and to set in motion a chain of events so that large families are continually faced with the prospects of eviction and live in a perpetual state of harassment and uncertainty; not to mention the fear that is attendant on families on public welfare who have the prospect of upheaval.

I do not know what the answer is, I say honestly to the chairman. Perhaps the hon. Minister should remove housing from the crude and partisan political arena, perhaps he should appoint someone from this party and someone from the Liberal Party to sit on the Ontario housing corporation board for a year. I promise him some results if it is humanly conceivable. Perhaps we could meet and see for ourselves the frustrations that he lays claim to and that he pretends form an impasse to progress. But I strongly suggest to him that he is getting nowhere now. If he would like bi-partisan or tri-partisan political help, we are perfectly happy to join in.

What do we find after the Ontario housing corporation steps in? I would like the hon. Minister to answer these questions, and I assume that he would take them carefully and answer them carefully.

First of all, I would like to know, and the House would like to know, what is going to happen to these 53 families in an hour and twenty minutes from now, assuming that the bailiffs or whoever else is involved are excited about the job they have to do and will be on people's doorsteps promptly on April 30.

Second, how many families will be evicted, if any, and how much flexibility is there to the eviction date?

Let me refer him back to another confrontation of people from his department and the citizens involved. There was a meeting not long ago at St. Simon's Church. It has become the local hub of activity and anxiety, and the hon. Minister sent Mr. Bournes, who—and I may be corrected—has been seconded to the Ontario housing corporation from CMHC. He also sent along someone else; I am not quite sure who it is, but that particular person is not of consequence—I profoundly hope it is not Mr. Suters—no offence meant.

says the news story:

—Alderman June Marks challenged Mr. Bournes, “I want to be told right now in front of all these people whether I can tell the families who call me, that they will be allowed to stay in their homes if no accommodation has been found for them by April 30.” Mr. Burns replied: “You shouldn’t give them a black or white yes or no.”

If that is not catching the spirit of Ontario housing, nothing does.

You shouldn’t give them a black or white yes or no. It may be true to say that they will not be evicted on May 1 but I couldn’t say whether that would still hold on May 2, May 10 or May of next year.

Now, how does the hon. Minister allow leading representatives of the Ontario housing corporation to play in that less-than-reputable fashion with the anxieties of the families concerned? And why is it not possible to tell them precisely what the terms of the eviction are likely to be, and what housing prospects they have and what relocation prospects they have, and when action will take place? Mr. Frizzelle, the other gentleman who was there, said that the housing authority was working on the rehabilitation of houses, “but it would take 100 men a month to fix up those houses”—that is, other houses in the St. James Town area—and he asks tenants to be patient. He asks them to be patient—faced with eviction on April 30 or May 1.

I would also like to know from the hon. Minister how many require multiple unit dwellings. We all know you can offer one-bedroom or two-bedroom apartments or homes, but how many require multiple unit dwellings and how many of those dwellings have you presently on the books? How many precise units are available now for the residents of St. James Town? How many Ontario housing corporation people are there in St. James Town now assessing people’s needs?

Why, until this afternoon, had there been no contact with Mrs. Lena Cook, who works two days a week, partly with the Toronto housing authority and partly with the social planning council of Metropolitan Toronto, researching what is happening in St. James Town, and trying to find ways of relocating people?

Is the hon. Minister happy with the methods the Ontario housing corporation has adopted? Is he happy with this cloud of fear and despair that hangs over so many families in the St. James Town area? And is it the policy of the department to move people from one bulldozer step to another? Because, let us be frank with each other, some of the alternative housing accommodation which has been offered to the citizens in St. James Town is not much better than that in which they are now located. In fact, for some of them it was a great emotional shock, it was worse than that in which they are now located. That is not the way one plans a project of urban renewal. I say that frankly to the hon. Minister.

And finally, I would like to know what rationale there is for demanding that repairs be made and bylaws suddenly enforced at considerable expense—I refer to electric wiring and similar aspects—right on the eve of eviction, in the last week prior to the eviction, when these same people cannot even get low-cost housing in Regent Park north because Regent Park north will not take people who owe a Consumers’ Gas bill unless it is balanced off on monthly payments.

I say to the hon. Minister that there are doubtless some answers, there are doubtless some explanations and, as I say, I have no doubt that you will say the promoters, the private interests are willing to hold off, and that you are willing to hold off, which simply means that the concern and anxiety in people’s minds is allowed to become that much more intensified. I do not know whether the hon. Minister faces eviction tomorrow; I suspect that he would not be here tonight with the equanimity that he demonstrates, if he were. And one cannot in fact play with people in that fashion. I do not think that a single project has ever been so badly acted upon by a housing authority. I do not know what happened, I do not know what went wrong, and I would be interested in hearing the hon. Minister’s explanation.

You said in your opening speech, Mr. Minister, that you would have a thousand units ready in May of 1965. Now why cannot some of those housing units be used for these families who are on the verge of eviction? There does not seem to be any plausible or possible excuse for the general delay and the general concern. I do not wish the front bench of the Cabinet, that attractive, handsome, charming, disarming front bench of the Cabinet to be known as the guilty men, but it is happening; we are on the threshold of it in the field of public housing and housing requirements generally. The same energy which the hon. Minister applies with such admirable finesse to other branches might be extended here and I suggest that the actual methods and activities of the Ontario housing corporation be analyzed with as much scrupulous intent as the projection of figures for houses and the accumulation of old houses in the Metro Toronto area.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, Mr. Chairman, I will try and answer some of the questions for the hon. member.

First of all, let me clear up the so-called misunderstanding between myself and the city of Toronto. There is no misunderstanding on my part, regardless of what you read in the newspapers. Mr. Allen and Mr. Givens were both in my office on September 9, along with Mr. Suters and many other people. On September 10 I wrote them both a four-page letter and outlined exactly what we were prepared to do. I did not hear a word from either one of them until just before election time when Mr. Givens made the remarks that he did not know what was going on in housing. When I wrote to Mr. Givens and said, "Would you mind looking up the letter of September 9," he apologized and said, "I didn't think they would quote what I said." And I said, "Well, Phil, if you can't tell a friend what he is full of, you can't tell anybody." I can assure you that Phil and I are still good friends.

And may I also say that in the matters of housing—and I think you know as much about municipal law as I do—the city of Toronto is just another municipality in Metro. The Metro housing authorities are the ones that request the housing and the mayor sits on the Metro board, so he knows what goes on. We do not deal directly with the Toronto housing authority. Many of the things you brought up today are municipal matters in which the Ontario housing authority is not involved. We are involved in some of it—not many of the things—like the electric light switch being turned off and so on. I think you will recognize that.

Now let me just say this: There are 200 families—

Mr. S. Lewis: I recognize that.

Hon. Mr. Randall: There are 200 families involved at the moment and that whole area is not going to be bulldozed tomorrow, so we are talking about a percentage of 200 over a period of time. We have ample time to look after, let us say, the majority of these people.

Mr. S. Lewis: But there were evictions for tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is right, and I will talk about them in a minute.

Now, as for the 12 houses that Mr. Bradley said he could produce—instant housing—he made the statement and the mayor suggested to the Metro chairman that Mr. Bradley should ask the Ontario housing corporation to take those over immediately and do something with them. When we called on the 12 houses they were all occupied by people who needed the houses just as badly as those whom Mr. Bradley was trying to house. We could not throw those people out of housing so we have to look around and find something else for them. I do not evict people to put other people in. Those houses were not instant housing, there were people living in them. So Mr. Bradley's statement about instant housing just died a natural death very quickly when we found that the houses were occupied.

Mr. Singer: What did you do with the people, other than—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Just sit still now, do not get excited. This is your bad night, now, just be careful.

Mr. Singer: No, it is your bad night. It is the government's bad night. You have got nothing.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: You cannot hear when you are talking so loudly.

Hon. Mr. Randall: The city asked Metro to have the Ontario housing corporation take over the St. James Town project. The city asked Metro to ask us and we took it over. Now, this is the way it came to the Ontario housing corporation. Let me give you a full report on the St. James Town area, because this is where I was brought up. I know something about it. I know the conditions in that area, so I think I can talk from experience.

Although this has been referred to in the press as a redevelopment area, it is actually a private redevelopment scheme in which the old, existing properties are to be torn down and replaced with a high-density development, largely for single persons and childless couples. The government of Ontario is playing no part in redevelopment of this area. We are not in it.

On April 9 the Ontario housing corporation was asked by Metro to assume responsibility, with the assistance of the city of Toronto housing authority, for finding housing accommodation for families who are being displaced by the rental programme. Previously the city of Toronto housing authority had undertaken the finding of accommodation and had also agreed to assume responsibility for the management of all houses in the area scheduled for demolition over the next few years. The Ontario housing corporation was advised that accommodation for all the families in the area slated for immediate demolition had to be found during the month of April. Ontario housing corporation interviewed all these families, to determine their accommodation requirements and also approached the developers to determine exactly when the existing houses would be demolished. The present position is as follows:

Ontario housing corporation staff interviewed 64 families. Of these, 11 refused to complete an application for housing. The developer, as you said yourself—and I will repeat your words now—agreed that no family would be evicted. In point of fact, the Ontario housing corporation discovered that the developer had not obtained a court order for possession.

A total of 25 families have since been offered accommodation and of these, 19 have accepted, two are undecided and four have refused. Thirteen families have found alternative privately-owned accommodation, either with the assistance of OHC, or of their own volition. Fourteen families remain to be housed; all require a minimum of four-bedroom accommodation.

In addition to the families housed by the Ontario housing corporation, the city of Toronto housing authority has found accommodation for five other families. A number of these families in the area were previously tenants in either Regent Park south or Lawrence Heights project, who left for various reasons. You can use your own imagination why some of them left.

One fact has been clearly illustrated in Ontario housing corporation's endeavour to rehouse families in St. James Town. Quite a number of the residents refused to complete application forms and do not wish to receive assistance in the form of public housing. In other words, no matter how desperate a family's circumstances, they still reserve the right to decide whether or not they wish to be provided with decent, safe, sanitary accommodation.

Now, I do not know what more we could offer to do, than what we have already done at the request of the city through Metro to us. I think, again, this proves that we are not ducking our responsibilities. We have an interest in these people. We said what the corporation was going to do and we have had our people working, trying to find what their problems are, how soon they are going to move. I can assure you that, in that 1 hour and 18 minutes you are talking about, you can go home and sleep, because it is not going to happen.

Mr. S. Lewis: Well, I am glad that we finally—if I may follow up for a moment, and then throw it open to my hon. colleagues in both parties—I am happy to hear that they are not, in fact, going to be evicted and I want to tell the hon. Minister that this is the first time in the last eight weeks, since this has been a boiling issue, that someone of authority has said they will not be evicted on April 30. No one has yet said it, and I suggest to you strongly, sir, that to do so an hour before they could be evicted, is not in fact an intelligent way to relocate families. This simply demonstrates the incredible confusion in which all of this has been immersed. It may be breakdowns in communication, there may be other problems involved. It may be that Mayor Givens is incapable of comprehension. That is the implication of your earlier remarks, but somewhere, something broke down and I am not at all sure where that happened. And when I say that yours is the first announcement, I quoted from what Mr. Bournes said on your behalf. I recall a rather—I do not want to recall it too vividly because it was a rather painful question and answer story in the Toronto Globe and Mail, involving Mr. Suters, in which, if I may say, he was not absolutely precise about the eviction possibilities or otherwise. All I suggested to you earlier was that this aspect of the relocation was very badly mishandled.

Mr. Singer: It could not be. Nobody told him what to say.

Mr. S. Lewis: Now, let me move to the other point. Multiple housing units are obviously going to be one of the problems. Eleven out of the 64 families would not sign of their own volition and move. But on your own notes, 53 will move and the four who have said no, said it not on the grounds that they will not move but on the grounds that the accommodation offered them was not what they wanted. And I think that families who are being uprooted can on occasion be given the opportunity to choose between one or two alternatives. I do not think that is too much to ask of a government. Now where are these multiple housing units and why are they not available? Let me quote again from your speech, Mr. Minister, when you led off on the estimates:

On February 27 the corporation advertised for a minimum of 1,250 units either existing or to be constructed this year. These are now being appraised and it is expected that at least 1,000 units will meet OHC requirements. Purchase of acceptable units will be carried out during May, 1965.

Now, is it not possible for the hon. Minister to stand in this House and say, "Of those 1,000 units which I promised, 48 hours ago, would be purchased during May, 1965, I am prepared to designate this many for the St. James Town residents"? Can we not, in fact, have some clarity? How can you expect the members on this side of the House to have confidence in the Ontario housing corporation if, in fact, the procedures have been characterized by this confusion? I suggest, finally, it is ministerial responsibility. It is a good strong Minister who steps in and says, "On my authority they will not be evicted and on my authority we will look after them." Well, on your authority, Mr. Minister, we are also going to have to look after a considerable number of people for relocation in Alexander Park and God help them if this kind of anxiety pervades their relocation as well.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Minister, I have listened with very great interest to your remarks tonight. My recollection brings back your remarks of a year ago and my further memory goes back even before that and recalls the remarks of your illustrious predecessor, Mr. Macaulay, and I can only say to you, sir, and to your colleagues, where is the Macaulay of yesteryear?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: He seems to haunt you.

Mr. Singer: No, he does not haunt us. He haunts you and he haunts the government of Ontario because, sir, I say to you, Mr. Prime Minister, that if you are going to parade a series of false faces on your front benches who get up and make ridiculous statements that are abandoned a year after they are made, your government is a sham and a fake. If you are not prepared, sir, to stand up and say that a responsible Minister who stood in his place on December 18, 1962, meant what he said, you, with him, are a sham and a fake. Now, let me read to you what he did say.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Do.

Mr. Singer: On December 18—I quote from page 380 in Hansard—Mr. Macaulay said this:

Earlier this year the 12-point plan for housing in Ontario was approved to give our housing programme greater flexibility.

We have not heard tonight, we did not hear a year ago, any mention of the 12-point programme. In fact, sir, you and your colleagues pretend Macaulay exists no more. Anything he said was no responsibility of yours, that he is discarded, that he is in limbo, that in fact you are embarrassed by him and ashamed of him. Now why does the hon. Prime Minister not stand up and say that?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Ha, ha.

Mr. Singer: Do not sit there and laugh. This is a very serious—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I have nothing else to do but laugh.

Mr. Singer: Macaulay said, and I quote again from page 380: "I am pleased to say that our endeavours are beginning to bear fruit with the following results." Listen. Just listen. These are the results of—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I have no alternative; I will listen.

Mr. Singer: Of course the hon. Prime Minister has no alternative and the people of Ontario have no alternative but to listen to the nonsense that comes forward from a succession of his Ministers—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I doubt—

Mr. Singer:—full of sound and fury, signifying nothing—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I doubt if they will want to hear last year's debates again.

Mr. Singer: Absolutely nothing. Macaulay said in 1962 exactly what the hon. Minister of Economics and Development says in 1965, and nothing has been done.

Listen to Macaulay's words; listen to what he says: "I am pleased to say that our endeavours are beginning to bear fruit with the following results: Scarlett Wood, Etobicoke—150 units."

Where are the 150 units in Scarlett Wood?

"Warden Avenue in Scarborough—350 units." Where are the 350 units on Warden Avenue in Scarborough?

"Thistletown, Etobicoke—1,200 units." Thistletown has been going on almost every year for the last ten years. There never were any units in Thistletown.

"O'Connor Drive, North York—300 units." A few minutes ago the hon. Minister said that we were going to have something on O'Connor Drive in North York. How many units have they got on O'Connor Drive? Not one.

"Jane-Steeles, North York—500 units." A few minutes ago the hon. Minister again said,

"Stapleford Farm—100 units." Stapleford Farm has been going on since 1955. How many units are there there? Not a single one and the hon. Prime Minister knows it. He should be ashamed and embarrassed to allow his hon. Ministers, one after the other, to get up and say that this is their programme and this is what they promise and they produce absolutely nothing.

This year the government has a salesman and he gets up and says a lot of nice words signifying absolutely nothing. What did he say a year ago? What did the hon. Minister say a year ago? On April 28, 1964, he said: "Again, I can only say to you and to the hon. members of this House, that if this housing Act"—and that is the one that created the Ontario housing corporation—"is passed, and I am sure it will be—" that was a fairly well calculated guess, it does not take any great genius to recognize that there are 77 votes over there and 23 plus eight over here, and the bet is that the 77 will get together and pass almost anything they want to.

"I think a year from now," and I think the hon. Prime Minister should listen to this, "I will be very pleased," and this is the hon. Minister talking, "I will be very pleased to take any criticism on the housing programme and I will deserve everything you say if it does not work out as we anticipate."

What has the hon. Minister got to tell us tonight? Not a thing has worked out. There is not a shade of difference between what he said tonight and what he said a year ago, or from what Macaulay said two or three years ago. It is a sham, a fake, a delusion, a red herring dragged across the trail to confuse the people of Ontario. The hon. Prime Minister should get himself a new Minister who will do something about housing.

I ask the hon. Minister very seriously if he has any interest in housing? He is very busy going to Tokyo and Canberra and all these interesting places in the world and selling Ontario. Perhaps this is needed, but this hon. Minister has no interest at all in housing. His approach to this indicates it; the results that he has achieved indicate it; the results the Ontario housing corporation have achieved indicate it; and the attempt to shift the blame from his department to the municipalities indicates it. A year ago when this thing came in I suggested to him, quietly and politely as I usually do, that they were asking for trouble, seriously asking for trouble, because the lack of the municipal anticipated efforts could frustrate this whole plan. It has been obvious, the municipal effort has not been productive of the housing units that are needed in this province.

There is no excuse. The hon. Minister said that it would not happen; and it has happened and he knows that it has happened. The blame lies at his doorstep, and his explanation of the housing policy tonight is an explanation of utter and complete failure.

The hon. Minister must have seen, and I am sure he has seen, a submission made to him and to various housing authorities by a firm called Blainey Real Estate Limited which offered to supply some 3,000 units of housing to any housing authority that was interested and the economic basis for it is very soundly set up. Now whether this is a good one or a bad one I do not know. It would seem to me, costing less, that it makes reasonable economic sense.

Here is a private enterpriser who comes forward and says that he is able to offer to government, on the basis of what we have heard in your legislation, several thousand units of housing in accordance with the findings and the regulations and the statutes laid down. They tell him that one of the chief complaints levied by social organizations with respect to the present inadequate subsidized housing scheme is a lack of integration. There is such a lack of integration that it is not uncommon these days to find subsidized housing facilities referred to as "ghetto-like." In recent years the movement seems to be toward having the greatest possible number of subsidized housing units in the same area. It is acknowledged that there is a social stigma attached to the residents in subsidized housing units now provided.

It is submitted that the housing units herein present the maximum in social integration and that the buildings are located in virtually every municipality in Metro, and for the most part in each location there are no more than 250 suites. Where there are 250 suites, the buildings are a part of a large apartment complex in that municipality; or you might say are integrated into an apartment development.

Here is a private developer who listens—perhaps to his folly because he spent a great deal of time and effort trying to present a plan that seemed to be feasible in the direction in which the hon. Minister was apparently pointing to more private enterprise toward assistance in public housing. He presented a scheme that seems to me, at least, reasonable on the surface.

It is backed up with economic facts that seemed to me to be reasonable. I gather from the gentleman who gave me this information that he hardly received the courtesy of a reply. With all the time and effort that went into this type of presentation where he was able to offer to housing authorities several thousand units on a sound economic basis that would be available for public housing, he hardly got an answer from the hon. Minister.

Certainly either his offer or his suggestion was never accepted or encouraged or modified or anything else. The only answer, Mr. Chairman, that can come from this is that this government pays no more than the barest lip-service to the idea of public housing. The only answer, Mr. Chairman, is that the hon. Prime Minister in his wisdom has now chosen perhaps his best salesman to get up and to surround this very serious social problem with mere words.

There is nobody up there—I am talking to the hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman—there is nobody up there at all; they surround this very serious social problem with a bunch of words full of sound and fury signifying absolutely nothing.

I suggest to you, sir, that no one in this province can seriously believe that the hon. Prime Minister or any of his colleagues are at all concerned about the provision of public housing.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, I would like to clear up a few facts so that the hon. member can go home and sleep with an easy conscience tonight. I know that he would not want to go to bed having made some misstatements.

Warden Woods, with 340 units, has been occupied for over a year; Scarlett Wood, with 150 units, has been occupied for over a year.

The gentleman that the hon. member referred to at Blainey Real Estate I know well. He is a very fine fellow and I have had some dealings with him. He was in to our office and sat down and went over his proposition. It revealed the very thing that the hon. member for Scarborough West was talking about. Ninety per cent of his offer was bachelor suites or one bedroom suites, which we do not need for the kind of accommodation for which we are looking. If he has other accommodation, he knows that we are still in the market. I spent over an hour talking to him and his partner and pointed out that this was the reason why his proposition was not acceptable.

I mentioned that there were 1,632 deals offered to us, but there was no use buying something that was not going to meet the needs. On the 1,000 units of which we were speaking, we hope that within these 1,000 units we will be able to do the things that the hon. member for Scarborough West was talking about, and that is take care of the bigger families.

One of the problems at Regent Park and Moss Park is that there are not enough bedrooms. We recognize that the problem of housing is not housing as such, but housing with sufficient bedrooms to take care of these expanded families.

Now I just want to clear one other thing while I am on my feet, and that is yesterday when I presented my estimates speech, I explained the reason why we formed the housing corporation, I would just like to reiterate again why I think it was a good idea.

It is obvious that the Minister is not going to be here all the time. It is obvious that perhaps in four years, or eight years, or 12 years, that there will be a new government here. Who knows?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: In 16!

Hon. Mr. Randall: Sixteen perhaps!

Mr. Singer: Four—next election! When are you going to call it?

Hon. Mr. Randall: The housing problem is going to be here for a hundred years. The housing problem is going to be here, regardless of who the Minister is and who the government is.

Mr. Bryden: If you fellows are there it is certainly going to be here forever.

Hon. Mr. Randall: The housing problem needs an entity to look after it, such as Central Mortgage and Housing, and that is exactly what we have created with the Ontario housing corporation. All I say is, it has hardly had its first birthday, give it a chance to get off the ground. We have indicated that it is working, so far as I am concerned. I do not think we need any separate Minister of housing. They do not have it in Ottawa, and I think with the two Ministers, the hon. Minister in Ottawa and myself, looking after housing in this province, we are going to do a good job for the province as a whole.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. Minister, who is a reasonable man, can understand why we view all announcements from the government opposite about housing with a jaundiced eye. They have been nothing but phonies for 20 years. Everything they have announced amounts to nothing. Now it certainly would be unfair to make this hon. Minister responsible for the gross failures of all his predecessors, although I think the government has to take responsibility for those failures. This hon. Minister may have new plans, he may actually be going to carry out some plans, and it would certainly be a whole new departure in housing in this province if any significant plans were carried out. However, he asked us last year to wait a year and see how he performed. We waited a year, and the performance has been negligible. He has asked us to wait another year. We will wait that other year, but in the meantime, I have a number of questions I would like to ask.

There is one in particular I would like to ask him about these houses that the housing corporation is buying up from builders. Could he give us some idea—I gather they have not yet been acquired—but the hon. Minister must have a pretty good idea of what is likely to be acquired, since they are likely to be bought shortly. Could the hon. Minister tell us: A. What is the approximate geographic distribution of these houses? B. What is the bedroom distribution?

He himself mentioned the great importance of larger houses with two, three and four bedrooms. How many is the hon. Minister planning to get in those categories?

The hon. Minister referred to Moss Park which was, I suppose, one of the greatest abortions in the history of housing, a plan that started as a good idea and was turned upside down by a federal Tory government until it was practically useless. I hope we are not going to make any more mistakes like that, and spend large sums of public money for accommodation that does not meet the need at all. I hope that is not going to happen. Now, what is he getting in these houses he is buying? How many four-bedroom houses is he getting? How many three-bedroom houses?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Answering your question, I do not have a bedroom count as yet, the appraisers are working on it. We are trying to finish up our own appraisals, but these units that we are talking about—there are 80 in the city and the other 1,000-some-odd are spread across the rest of the municipalities.

Mr. Bryden: How many of them are adjacent to the Macdonald-Cartier highway?

Hon. Mr. Randall: None whatsoever. When we undertook that project we made sure that this would not be turned into this kind of a programme, because I think it is good business on our part not to do that. That is an area where we have used a little discretion. We are picking those houses up, anyway, on the basis of the offer to the "401" people, but they are not being used for this particular purpose.

Mr. Chairman: Is the vote carried?

Mr. Bryden: No, far from it.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I have a special problem in my own community that I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister at this time. That is, the lack of available space in the community in which to put up the low rental type of home. Windsor, as you know, is fairly well landlocked. There is not the space available. Windsor has applied for some low rental housing. Certain numbers of low rental housing have been approved by the government. However, because of the lack of space, it makes the problem that much more acute.

The problem could have been solved if the municipalities beyond the bounds of the city had applied for low rental housing. The city of Riverside has only applied for 16 low rental units and 12 senior citizens homes. Sandwich West has not applied for any. Sandwich East has applied for none.

In the meantime, because of the tremendous boom in the economy, there is a terrific need for housing. The need has become so acute that during the last weekend, I received over ten telephone calls from individuals, not asking, but begging, for any type of rental accommodation. I am just going to mention three different people.

A fellow by the name of Tom Griffin, married, six children. His eviction notice is for Monday morning. He has no place to go. There is absolutely no housing available for him, a man with six children. He does not know what he is going to do. He has applied to the mayor of the city. He has applied to everyone of the real estate agents in town. He can get no housing whatsoever.

Tom Ford, five children, has done exactly the same thing, and can get no rental whatsoever.

Then I have a Mrs. Jean Couvillan, a mother of ten, who has had three of her children leave home, because of the type of accommodation in which she lives. Her children did not think it was of a sufficiently high standard in which they should be living. What can she do? She cannot find housing accommodation.

As a result of this, rentals have been driven sky high. For a home that at one time rented for $50 a month, today the landlord is asking anywhere from $90 to $100 a month. It makes it most difficult for these people not only to be unable to afford the rental, but just to find a place to rent.

May I read just this short article from the local paper on April 23?

Boom is a much-used word around Windsor and other Canadian communities. Apply boom to housing and you get bust for growing numbers. They are on a vicious road leading to a deadend. The cost of building prevents them from building a house. The cost of renting is starting to really hurt many, and chase some into nowhere.

In the war and post-war period, governments saw the need for rent control. It was the only way to curb inflation. Rent control long went out of the window, and with it so did justice and fairness in many cases. Thousands in Windsor and elsewhere have failed to benefit from the booming economy. Their salaries or pensions have not gone up the same way the cost of living and housing has.

A typical case—rent for a small flat in Windsor has been increased from $65 to $90 in seven months.

We could go on for 1,000 words and detail personal case miseries. There is no need to. Most in Windsor are aware of the situation. The problem is obvious. What must be sought out are the solutions.

Might not some of these solutions be: 1. The return of rent controls; 2. Better administration of public housing to ensure that low-rental housing is for low-income groups; 3. An increase in public housing in this area. And urgent, a city-provincial-federal governments study of the housing needs and problems in this area?

The hon. Minister will say he has conducted these surveys, but I will say that Windsor is landlocked and cannot meet the needs. It cannot force municipalities adjacent to it to ask for this type of housing, or to entertain or go ahead and develop this type of housing. The sad truth is there has been quite a bit of building in Windsor and the area in recent years and months. Apartment block buildings seem the latest thing. Questions:

How many of those in great need of housing can afford the rents? For the sake of suffering people, will someone, city hall, Ontario, Ottawa, landlords' consciences, do something?

Would the hon. Minister consider imposing some type of rent control on a temporary basis up until the time the housing situation could ease itself in a local community?

Mr. Peck: Is this Liberal policy?

Mr. Singer: What is the hon. member's policy? Does he have any? If you have any policy, why does not one of you stand up? He has no policy.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, in answering the hon. member's question, let me first of all say that if he has specific cases of people there who have difficulty getting accommodation, I suggest two things. If the hon. member will let us have a list of those names, the people who are having difficulty—

Mr. Newman: I will be glad to.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Also the Windsor housing authority, let us have a list of the names, and I am sure that we can assist in some way to take care of the problem. At the moment there are 176 family units being built in Windsor; 87 of these are on scattered sites, the balance are downtown in Windsor, which is going to assist the problem. I do not know when the annexation is going to take place but Riverside is being considered as one of them; if it does there is a lot of building land out there as you perhaps recognize.

The hon. member also asked if we had any property. We do own property down there, federal-provincial property; there are something like 232 acres and there are over 200 acres now in the process of being serviced. So that will be available for modest-income family housing in the Windsor area.

Mr. Newman: I would like to thank the hon. Minister for his remarks there, and I will turn over the names as I get them. The one in here is being forced out of the home as of Sunday night. A married man with six children. He was crying when he was talking to me; he is 29 years of age.

Hon. Mr. Randall: If the hon. member would let us have that correspondence.

Mr. Newman: I will not give the hon. Minister the correspondence, I will give him the notes, because I talked with the man over the telephone.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Why did the hon. member not give it to him when he received it instead of waiting until 11:23 to do so?

Mr. Newman: Well, if the hon. Prime Minister were any type of a decent individual, he would have called the—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member could have brought this information to the hon. Minister by merely a telephone call immediately he received it but he saved it until 11:23 tonight in order to—

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I have brought this up to all of the authorities I could back home, and could not get any satisfaction.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I only asked if the hon. member had phoned the hon. Minister. Had he phoned and communicated this before this time—

Mr. Singer: It is obvious that you have no housing policy at all.

Mr. Newman: Well, I will apologize, then. In the future I will be more than pleased to give these problems to you people as they come in to me.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We would be happy to deal with them.

Mr. Thompson: I am delighted that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville put this before the House, Mr. Chairman, because it is this kind of individual problem which must be brought before the House so that you can recognize the really serious need that we have for public housing. And I think he has done a service in bringing this up, not only for his community but for the whole of Ontario, and in hearing that the—

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): He has neglected the people he was elected to represent by not—

Mr. Singer: Utter nonsense!

Mr. Thompson: What a shocking approach to public housing, where it is suggested that the only way to get public housing is get in touch with the hon. Minister. Do you not realize that your Minister is in Japan and all over the country—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: What about the Deputy Minister?

Mr. Thompson: He himself said, "I realize I will not be around to look after the Ontario housing corporation." And then the hon. Prime Minister suggested to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville that the proper approach is to get in touch with the hon. Minister. And the hon. Minister said that they will set up regular collective bodies to look after it.

Well, if I could turn again to the subject of housing—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Before we finish, Mr. Chairman, I would just simply say this: The hon. member could very well have brought this to the attention of the department and then he could have brought it into the House, as an illustration of what is going on in Windsor. But he did not do this—

Mr. Thompson: Yes, he did.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Did he? Did he bring this to the attention of the department?

Mr. Singer: If that is your whole housing policy, it is a sham and a farce.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We have machinery as the hon. Minister has already illustrated and spoken about; we have machinery to deal with emergencies. All I say is this: Had the hon. member brought this to the attention of the hon. Minister it could have been dealt with and then it could have been brought into this House as an example of what is going on in Windsor and we would have been delighted to sit here and listen to it.

But I am only asking why, when the very sad case of each of these persons, and a number of children involved—and I have listened very carefully to the three of them—why did not the hon. member get in touch with the department to see if there were some emergency action that we could take, because we have means of doing this, as the hon. Minister has already pointed out. And then the hon. member could bring it in here as an illustration, if he chooses, of the housing policies of this government, if this is what he chooses to do. But I am just asking—

Mr. Bryden: We should not have the emergencies.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, of course—

Mr. Singer: You heard what Macaulay said, you did not do anything about it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: You heard what this man said a year ago, you have not done anything about it. It is a sham and a farce.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think that this intervention by the hon. Prime Minister is typical of the government's evasion of the real issue—they try to laugh it off and scoff at it, and they make snotty comments on what a member does. The hon. Prime Minister quibbled for five minutes as to the exact procedure the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville should have followed. He can quibble about that, Mr. Chairman, but the basic point that is at issue is that nobody can find houses for low-income families. The housing corporation no doubt is doing its best but it cannot find them either, in the St. James Town project. The Alexander Park project is coming up fairly soon, we trust, and we are going to have the same problem. The situation is that there is an acute, critical shortage of housing for low-income families and it is getting more critical all the time. I pointed that out yesterday but it is no answer to say, "We will look after this or that individual case."

The problem is an overall problem that has reached crisis proportions. Frankly I do not think the government is taking a serious view of it at all, even though it finds in the experience of its own corporation that it just cannot find houses for people who are being pushed out by development. The hon. Minister has said 4,700 houses are going to be provided in the Toronto area over the next few years—I just do not remember how many years, two or three years. Assuming those are all low-rent houses—and I am not sure that they are going to be—that will about double the stock of low-rent housing in the city of Toronto and my guess would be that it might meet somewhere between 10 and 20 per cent of the need.

The programme outlined by the hon. Minister is not even scratching the surface of the problem. The association of Ontario housing authorities, in its report to which I referred yesterday, estimated that between now and 1980 in Canada, we will need a million houses for low-income families. I suggest that it would be reasonable to assume that means about 350,000 in Ontario. Now, 4,700 is not even looking at the problem. With 4,700 over the next two or three years, you will do well if you merely prevent the crisis from getting worse. That number is not going to cut into the backlog of needs, it probably is not going even to keep up with the growth of the needs. I know that the hon. Minister will say, as he has said before, that this is all—in fact it is 200 more than the Metro council asked for.

Well, frankly, Mr. Chairman, I think that Metro council has been sound asleep with regard to housing. It has no vision or viewpoint on it at all. It is great on building expressways that it can name after chairmen, and those things are no doubt necessary, but it has never had a realistic view of housing and apparently it still has not.

Now, the Ontario housing corporation has assumed responsibility in this area. I realize they have to work with the municipality, but I think the sights of both of them have to be raised tremendously, if we are not going to have continuing recurrences of the St. James Town experience.

Hon. Mr. Randall: May I just make one more comment on this low-cost housing you talk about? The reason why we have gone into the market to buy existing housing, is to provide, first of all, the space that all of us know is required for large families. This housing is going to be provided on a geared income basis, so it does not necessarily mean the people we are talking about here tonight—who need housing immediately and do not have sufficient income to go out and live in these high-rent areas you are talking about, or these high-cost buildings.

Mr. Bryden: That is fine.

Hon. Mr. Randall: The rent is geared to the income. You can appreciate that they are going to be subsidized, and this is a good start on that major problem. We recognize it. The move we have made here to pick up this first 1,000 units, is going to solve some of the situations we have talked about, whether they be individual, or whether they be mass situations.

I do not think anywhere here tonight I said that we have not been able as yet to find accommodation for people if they are prepared to go. I do not think there was one case here tonight in St. James Square, or St. James Town, or Alexander, where we have been asked to find accommodation, that we have not been able to do something. And if it ever gets to the point where we cannot find accommodation, then I know we are really in trouble.

I can assure you that this move to buy existing housing, I think, will take the pressure off the people we have been talking about here tonight, and perhaps down in our friend's town of Windsor. We recognize that there are individual cases when they come before us, but I hope there will be no need to have them come to us. I hope the people on the site can do something; that the people do not have to wait until the mailman comes to us and their letter goes to the housing authority. But even if I am not here, it certainly will go to the housing authority immediately. It does not have to wait for the Minister to make a decision as to where people are going to be housed.

If my friend from Windsor has any cases like that, and he cannot get satisfaction out of the housing authority, or the municipality, all I am saying is, send it to me and I will get him some action. That is all I can do. I cannot do any more unless I know about the circumstances. I cannot make any provision for them.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate these remarks, but I am just a little concerned. I am thinking of my hon. friend from Woodbine. He stated this case, which is not just one of an individual. It is a case typical of all over this nation. He has mentioned the million low cost or public housing needs that are across the nation. You, sir, as I mentioned before, had a brief which was prepared by James A. Murray, the professor of architecture at the University of Toronto, and he has pointed out the real needs of public housing.

It has been suggested that the need for public housing—and this has not been broken down into whether it is three- or four-bedroom housing, or what it is—but it has been suggested that the need in Toronto alone is 30,000 to 40,000. I would like to ask the hon. Minister, do you agree with that figure? Is this the goal that you have in mind? Do you feel that there is a need now in Toronto for 30,000 to 40,000 units?

I say this, because with respect to the hon. Prime Minister, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville brought up an individual case. We all could have done this. We have in the past. We have brought up cases from our own ridings of people desperately needing some kind of low rental housing. But what we are interested in is a policy and action.

I am concerned whether the government really knows of this desperate social need. I say this because I want to re-emphasize for the record, that as far as I understand it, after a year, from last August, when the Ontario housing corporation was started, as of right now; in Metropolitan Toronto where people have been presenting briefs to you, suggesting that we need something like 30,000 to 40,000 units; as of now, since August of 1964, your corporation has not actually bought any low rental housing units in Metropolitan Toronto. You have not bought one existing new house and had a family move into it.

Hon. Mr. Randall: May I just suggest, I am sure the hon. leader of the Opposition is aware of what you can get in reports. I know Professor Murray, and he has been very kind to us with information. Our housing branch has been associated with him for the last two years. This report that he has given us, much was implemented when we formed the housing corporation, as you will know if you read the rest of the report.

One of the things that we were somewhat doubtful about—I do not say we were critical I just say there was a question mark—is that Professor Murray's figures were not based on an actual field study. They were taken from DBS figures. I think you, yourself, the other day mentioned that figures do not always tell the facts. You can take average percentages, and averages do not mean very much.

I am sure that even private builders have got accommodation across this province today that they would be willing almost to give away. They cannot get them rented. In some towns there is lots of accommodation, but the people are not there, the people are here.

I would not like to say at the moment whether his figures are right or wrong. I just say this, that book has become a bible in the housing field, and we are very familiar with it and we have certainly taken a look at any recommendations. But again I think before we would go on and commit ourselves for anything more than what we have done, we would like to know more about the basis for the facts that he presents in the book. As I say, I think it is a good start. It is a good pilot, and it gives us a chance to do some other research.

Mr. Thompson: Have you done other research? Surely, as you are moving into this through the Ontario housing corporation, you must want to satisfy your own mind as to what are the needs. You suggest that perhaps the statistics from DBS do not give a sufficient background with respect to the actual needs. How are you substantiating for your own mind what the needs are?

Hon. Mr. Randall: You ask if we are doing any further research on housing. Yes. Professor Dakin of the University of Toronto is carrying out a study now on housing need across Ontario. He has been commissioned by the Ontario housing corporation to do this, and I think he will be using some of the facts that Professor Murray had. This is where I say we have been double-checking on the facts that Professor Murray has in his book, and I think when Professor Dakin gets through, we will have more information on which to base our decisions.

Mr. Thompson: I do not want to continue this too long, but I recall at the last debate where we raised the question of the queues waiting for low-cost housing. At that point—I think I am correct in my recollection—you said sometimes we will get these queues of people, but when you analyze them, some of them do not either warrant or need public housing, and that we could be all wrong in our figures. That was last year. Since that time, could you give us any estimate—let us just take Metro Toronto—that you have established in your mind, of the need for public housing, the number of people who need public housing in 1965 in Metro Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Randall: The central registry of Metro does the survey. We contribute to the cost. We do not have those figures, but Metro would have them. The central registry would have them.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct the attention of the hon. Minister to the sixth or seventh sub-item down the line under item number one, that is the item headed Grants. It is carried over from last year in much the same terms and approximately the same amount of money. The purpose is described as being to assist non-profit limited dividend housing companies and other groups constructing non-profit low-rental housing accommodation for the physically handicapped and families of low incomes. Could the hon. Minister give us a breakdown of this item? How much of it is to go to limited dividend housing companies, and how much to other groups and, if so, what groups?

Hon. Mr. Randall: This amount of money, the full amount, is divided into two parts. Part of it goes to MacDonal Manor in Ottawa, and part to the Thistletown senior citizens project out here, and that was set up when these projects were underway.

Mr. Bryden: Is the Ottawa one for elderly citizens? How much, and on what basis, are you subsidizing these projects?

Hon. Mr. Randall: It was $850 per unit for MacDonal Manor and it is $1,000 a unit for Thistletown.

Mr. Bryden: Did you say that was the entire item for those two projects?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes.

Mr. Bryden: What is the figure just above that, subsidies?

Hon. Mr. Randall: They have had some already. This is a balance coming to them—

Mr. Bryden: But it is two limited dividend housing programmes for elderly citizens?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes.

Mr. Bryden: What are the net subsidies for, just above the grants?

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is the net subsidies for this year less any profits under the operations that have come in through the housing corporation.

Mr. Bryden: This is in actual subsidized low rental projects, your share of the costs of it?

Hon. Mr. Randall: The provincial share of what is left.

Mr. Bryden: Yes. Are there any new ones that you are allowing for here, or are these just existing projects to which you have been committed in the past?

Hon. Mr. Randall: There is an allowance here for new ones this year.

Mr. Bryden: How much?

Hon. Mr. Randall: There is no breakdown for the figure. I will get it for you, I do not have it here tonight.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, in following the course of this debate I get the distinct impression that when we are discussing housing; the government has a very cold and statistical view; it presents a problem that they consider can be alleviated by planning on their part and which we consider, viewing the facts that are available to us, has not been properly alleviated.

I was most interested to hear the hon. Minister say that he himself came from the St. James Town area. I can only assume that in the few years since he was a boy there has been a serious depreciation of the area.

I have had an opportunity to visit some of those homes and talk with the people who are living in the houses that have been under discussion tonight. I have had a chance to see the squalor in which they are living and to feel very distinctly the hopelessness that is surrounding their lives because of the lack of even an opportunity to look forward to some better housing. It is far too late for me to describe this in detail. I know that some of you have taken this tour of the un-stately homes of Toronto; but I was definitely impressed by the fact that the people were anxious to discuss with me the cost of rodent control, the fact that they could not afford to pay their gas bills and so had gone out and bought a very small electric heater for a three-bedroom home in which this particular family had three young children, an electric heater that they carried from room to room.

I saw myself the bare wires of the electrical system with which many of these homes were equipped. I saw the iron bedsteads within a few feet of this wiring in which three or four young children would be sleeping in what can only be described as a pile of rags. I saw the internal plumbing conveniences which had not been properly operating for some weeks, although it was apparent that this did not come home to those people in the house for some days after it had stopped operation. I have been in bedrooms where there were no windows at all—at least the glass had been broken out and it had been boarded up so that it was completely dark, without even an electric light.

This is not, I suppose, the immediate problem that we are here to discuss tonight. There are municipal bylaws and inspectors, but somehow these people are living in these homes. I have seen a group of three or four dirty, ill-clad children in ill health, all with the kind of noses that the hon. member for Woodbine could describe more ably than I. You used the word "snotty" a few moments ago.

Mr. Bryden: Not about those people.

Mr. Nixon: No, but I was saying that you were quite capable of describing them. They were huddled around a stove that in my view was inadequately vented. The house was full of smoke and they said: "Well, it is always like this; we've got to keep warm, you know."

I would think perhaps some of these descriptions might better be brought to the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) at a later date. But we are talking about people when we are talking about housing, and we are talking in many cases of people with no education or little education. They do not know where to turn for help. I was in the company of some people working in church groups who have dedicated their lives to helping these people, and believe me their own health was suffering because of their involvement in the seemingly endless problems, apparently unsolvable problems. Many of them spoke about the new Minister and the new organization which he says is very well prepared and is ready to go into action as soon as requested.

It has been mentioned here several times tonight and the hon. Minister has emphasized that you cannot force housing on a municipality, you have to wait until it is requested. But I think there are a good many hon. members here who feel that the hon. Minister is not showing the initiative and drive that is characteristic of some of his other endeavours and that the time may come when he is going to ask this House for permission to go into a municipality and instruct them very definitely as to what their responsibilities are in respect to housing.

I am certainly not in a position to set myself up as an expert in the rather complex mechanism that administers public housing and rent-controlled housing that might be made available in this province, but one thing that has not as yet been discussed is the fact that there are slums in areas across this province that are just as bad as the ones that I have seen on Darling Avenue and in the cul de sacs immediately to the west of the great publishing palace of the Telegram; places that would really shake you if you were to go in and look at them yourself and talk to the people who are forced to live in these circumstances of squalor.

If you go into many rural areas you will find small little hamlets, usually at a cross-road well back from the main road where the local municipality is not living up to its responsibility in providing more adequate housing. For one thing, I would like to know how many of these rural and semi-rural municipalities have come to the housing authority and asked for the help that is theirs by right.

I know that the hon. Minister has had these symposia in Toronto and Sault Ste. Marie, those are the two places he named. But in my view many of these rural municipalities do not know anything about public housing. They do not know what is available to them. They are concerned with keeping the roads up, building the bridges; and not with building housing for the people who are living in these conditions in so many areas.

I had an opportunity to bring this to the attention of some people in my own area and one of them happened to be a country doctor. He said: If you want to see the worst living conditions you don't go to these hamlets that I have been describing, but you go to the homes that have been provided by a good many of our farmers for their hired help.

Now, the hon. Minister of Agriculture has probably seen some of these places. He announced a few days ago an admirable project which will enable some of these farmers to help provide housing for the migrant itinerant labourers who are needed in some of the areas of the province of Ontario. But this does nothing for the problem of housing that you find in every rural municipality, on probably three farms out of 10, where somehow the local people have not realized what their responsibility is in providing for the labouring people in the agricultural community. This is a tremendous problem. Just because the houses are not jammed together in a very small area does not mean that people are not living under conditions that are indescribably bad, far worse than the farmer would provide for his livestock. Here indeed is a problem that we must look into.

It seems to me that these rural municipalities should be urged much more directly than they have. They must be given much more leadership than they have if we are going to provide the housing that surely Ontario can provide for these citizens.

There is a feeling among many people who are not living in substandard housing that there is something the matter with these people because they are living in these hovels. When I was down on Darling Avenue I was talking to the people, to a housewife there and talking to her children, and her husband came in, who had been working, I understand for 15 consecutive hours in a packing plant in this city. When I asked him about certain regulations that should apply to this sort of thing, he told me that he actually works far less than 40 hours a week, because his job just requires him to come in for long periods, and then he would be home with nothing to do. But he brings home $50 a week. If they were to heat their home with gas, it would cost $45 a month, their rent is more than $60 a month and they are in complete despair.

So the problem is more than statistical, it is more than the meetings that the hon. Minister may have in some back room with Phil Givens to work out their mutual problems. I do not know anything about that; all I know is that it does seem to be a rather adolescent way to approach it. There is the feeling that there is a certain jealousy among those officials who have this responsibility and I am sure that the hon. Minister is in a position to work out these problems.

Now, I have two other specific questions but I would like at this time, if the hon. Minister would be able to answer, to ask the question: How many rural municipalities have applied to the housing authority for some assistance?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, first of all let me say that I think that most of the municipalities in this province have been advised that the programme is available and I would say a very great many attended the conferences.

Now, Mr. Nicholson said, and I agree with him, that there is a term of education that has to go on among municipal officials and I think you recognize that. They have to be made aware of their responsibilities in order to let us know where we can help them. I do not know what size towns the hon. member is referring to, but here are some of the towns that we have had applications from: Black River, Chelmsford, Geraldton, Glencoe, Port Dover, Harriston, Dryden, Fort Frances, Port Elgin, Strathroy, Lucknow, Garson, Long Lac, Calver township, Mitchell, Durham and Cardinal. These are just a few of the small rural towns—

Mr. Nixon: If I may interrupt just for a moment. The places I would be referring to would not be incorporated. They would come under the municipal government of the township.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Well, Black River, the first one named is a township, so is Calvert.

Mr. Nixon: So there are two right there. Well, I would be very interested in receiving a list of those places to see if there are any in the rural areas with which I am very familiar like, I am sure, a good many of the hon. members opposite.

Hon. Mr. Randall: We will see that the hon. member gets a list.

Mr. Nixon: Now, secondly—and this is something that appeared in the press a few days ago—the fact that in the Red Lake area, some years ago now—and perhaps there are other hon. Ministers who might recall the circumstances of this—the Indian population, or at least a large number of families there, were dispossessed of their homes, many of them extremely substandard. Homes were actually burned, I understand, and very small sums of money were paid to the Indians in compensation. I was wondering if there is any explanation at this date, three years later, that the hon. Minister might have as to why the housing facilities were taken from the Indians under these circumstances?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We have built new houses up there in Red Lake.

Mr. Nixon: The housing authority?

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, this is prior to the forming of the housing authority. It is through the housing branch. I read in the press, as the hon. member did, of the situation up at Red Lake. I had a complete report on my desk. I have not had a chance to study it in view of these last three days in the House. I got it, I think, only two days ago. It is a matter that we want to have a look at but it is not in our jurisdiction at the present time. Now what we can do—what created the circumstances I do not know—but we are going to have a look at the report that I have.

Mr. Nixon: In this connection, many of the Indian reservations have housing that is very definitely substandard. And the hon. Minister has probably heard some of his own colleagues say that the Indians are comfortable in wigwams, but unfortunately they have probably lost the knack of looking after their own housing in this way and we know that in trying to improve themselves there are many Indians living in poor housing; in fact, hovels. I would like to know how the regulations of the housing authority apply on the various reservations of Ontario and to what extent you are assisting in the development of housing for Indians?

Hon. Mr. Randall: It is my understanding that all the reservations are a federal responsibility. But let me also suggest at this time, as the hon. member heard a few days ago, we have a very high level committee looking at the entire Indian problem and certainly one of the major problems of the Indians is adequate housing.

Mr. Nixon: Is the hon. Minister a member of that committee?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I am not a member. Mr. Suters, my housing man is, and three or four other top-level men in various departments, Health, Welfare and Municipal Affairs, and Lands and Forests. This makes up this group. Much has been done on this to co-ordinate our efforts with the federal people. I think the hon. member realizes that the Indian problem is a major one, not only in this province but it is a major one in other provinces. I think it is about time that we had a look at the Indian problem on a basis such as we set up in this province so that if we are going to do something about housing, we have to do something about health; if we are going to do something about health, we have to do something about jobs, and about training these people. And this is one of the things the committee has in its mind:

what we can do about adequate housing and properly serviced land in these areas.

Mr. Nixon: Well, dealing with that specifically, it might well be that without requiring the Indians to organize as municipalities, the reservations could be recognized in this way so that if an Indian council did want to take part in this assistance, they could request it and it would be made available.

The last thing I would like to bring to the hon. Minister's attention is the fact that The Department of University Affairs announced a few weeks ago that they were going to pay universities a sum amounting to $1,400 per student to assist in the erection of university residences. You know that in Toronto and other university towns there is a system of co-operative residences that are built off the campus, of course, and are really well managed and provide an alternative to the very expensive accommodation on the universities themselves. The federal jurisdiction has recognized these co-operative residences as coming under The Federal Housing Act and will actually extend up to 90 per cent of the funds required to build them. A private bill was put before this Legislature some time ago requesting that these co-operative residences be freed from the responsibility of paying municipal taxation.

The government in its wisdom refused to accept this proposition and in fact these co-operative residences get no assistance from the province of Ontario. However, there is a good possibility here for the housing authority to step in and give some real relief to the problem of providing accommodation at the universities by assisting these co-operative residence companies, if they could be properly called that, with the raising of the remaining ten per cent. I do not know how the Act would apply to this but it seems to me that here is a case where a special type of housing would come well within the jurisdiction of the hon. Minister's responsibility and I wonder if he has looked into this and if he would be prepared to give some indication that he could extend this assistance.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think that the question is timely. The matter has been discussed in Ottawa at some length and they can borrow money from CMHC—

Mr. Nixon: That is settled.

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is right. The ten per cent has been brought to our attention. We are discussing it with The Department of University Affairs and I am quite sure that we are going to find some means of settling the problem, if there is a problem over the ten per cent.

Mr. Nixon: I get the impression that whenever a problem goes out of one department and travels over into another, there is a great deal of reticence in this Cabinet to have somebody take the lead. I wonder if the hon. Minister would be ready to say that he would take the lead in urging the hon. Minister of University Affairs (Mr. Davis) to go on with this thing, or is he, in fact, waiting for a recommendation from the other hon. Ministers?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I would say that from what I know of the situation at the moment, we will have to discuss it with The Department of University Affairs, because they are getting grants from that department and if there is money there for this purpose, certainly we would not want to be lending money from the Ontario housing corporation, which was not set up for it. But yes, I will take the matter into consideration and discuss it with my colleague, the hon. Minister of University Affairs and see what can be done to settle the ten per cent problem because this is what is stopping the accommodation from being built.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister says that these co-operative residences are now receiving some money from The Department of University Affairs.

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, I did not say that. I said that I do not know whether they are receiving any money or not—

Mr. Nixon: I can tell the hon. Minister that they are not.

Hon. Mr. Randall: We do not want to be in the position where they receive money from us, and from The Department of University Affairs. I think we have to co-ordinate our activities between the two departments. If it is going to come from this department, it certainly cannot come from The Department of University Affairs, or vice versa. This is a situation we will have to take a look at. I am not too familiar with it at the moment; it has not been brought to my attention in detail, but since the hon. member brought the matter up, we will take a look at it.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly there is a tendency in a matter like this that does not deal with thousands of people and multimillions of dollars to put it at the end of the list until some of the other problems are dealt with, but this is a very important one dealing with the educational problems of the province, and I urge the hon. Minister to take the initiative in this and to provide the funds that are required. Actually five per cent of the total funds is what would be needed; they would raise the other five.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, earlier in the evening I brought up the subject of the rental situation in the city of Windsor. May I inform the hon. Minister that the mayor of the community receives four to five calls every day from desperate families looking for accommodation. That is how serious it is in our own community today.

Earlier I had mentioned the possibility of either a rent control plan on a temporary basis, or maybe a rent subsidy plan. The hon. Minister did not reply to that question.

Hon. Mr. Randall: From the knowledge I have of that situation at the moment, I would not make that recommendation without careful study. I think that is also a federal matter, as I think the hon. member can appreciate. I would think that it could be considered, and if it is essential, certainly consideration will be given to that. I would not suggest that we should give it immediate consideration tonight.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I do not mean that it should be given immediate consideration, but I think that it is worthy of consideration while the situation is so critical.

Would the hon. Minister tell me what the policy of the department is concerning the sale of homes in the various subdivisions that have been established in various communities?

In my own community of Bridgeview—I do not recall the number of homes that have been built in the area, but I do understand that some of the residents in there would like to purchase them.

Hon. Mr. Randall: The homes that the hon. member is referring to are federally and provincially owned and we have no authority to sell those homes. There has to be an agreement between federal and provincial authorities if the homes are going to be sold, but we ourselves cannot take action to dispose of any homes.

Mr. Newman: May I suggest to the hon. Minister that he talk with the federal authorities so that those homes could be put on the local tax rolls instead?

The last item that I would like to bring up, Mr. Chairman, concerns a report that had been undertaken in the city of Detroit on urban renewal, and this is significant because this report—and it is a very lengthy one—has the following comment—I will be as brief as possible—the report, by the way, cost $105,000. It is approximately 800 pages, but a comment in there reads:

The report indicates that it is not economically possible to produce decent housing at rents the people in the $5,000 a year bracket can afford. It also indicates that a solution to be hoped for is in a programme of rent subsidies.

And the cost of living in Detroit is lower than it is in my own community.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I have some comments and some questions to raise if the hon. Minister intends to sit late into the evening—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Gisborn: The hon. Minister will recall that I raised a question regarding the problem of the Roxborough Park project in Hamilton with his department last summer. I recall that I first raised this question in the House with the former Minister, Mr. Macaulay. The Roxborough Park project, as the hon. Minister is aware, is a full recovery project in the east end of Hamilton whereby the families whose income exceed six times their rent, starting with a base of $5,112 and going up to $5,760, they are given notice to vacate.

When I raised the question with the former Minister, he agreed with me that this was not a very satisfactory situation, and that he would be interested in changing the formula to allow the people to stay in those houses and not be faced with the threat of eviction following a slight increase in their income at any particular time.

I also received strong support from the mayor of the city of Hamilton and the aldermen in the particular area, and subsequently we arranged to meet with the hon. Minister and his department to discuss the situation. We did meet last summer and had a thorough discussion of the situation, and we were able to bring about at that time a moratorium on the approximately 75 to 80 notices to vacate that were existing at that time.

The result of that meeting was that the alternative offered by the housing branch to the city council—to the board of control in this instance—was that they could revert to the geared-to-income programme whereby their rent would be scaled on their income, and when they reached a certain level, they would then pay a penalty rent of 30 per cent or else get out. The board of control refused to accept this proposition and the situation was left as it was. They refused to accept it because on a survey they found that approximately 80 per cent of the tenants would be faced with an increase in rent.

Personally, I think that the formula should have been installed in that project because now we are again faced with the same cycle and the same problems, only this year it is much worse because of the fact that there are fewer homes obtainable and people have less money.

Subsequent to the moratorium on the notices to vacate last year when the alternative was turned down by the board of control, the people were back in the same position and they started to receive their notices to vacate in February of this year. Some of the notices were orders to vacate in March and on through the spring.

This raised quite an outcry from the tenants because of the dislocation of their children from school, and pressure was put on me and, of course, on the aldermen and subsequently the city council, and I understand that they were able to get something done in that regard. They withheld the evictions until the children were out of school, but the problem now is the fact that they still have to get out, and I understand that there are something like 175 to 200 that now have their notices and there is a backlog of some 400 families ready to go in.

I want to reiterate what I said before, and that is that this is no kind of solution to the lack of housing in the city of Hamilton. I have watched the papers and I have had experience of going to homes where people are evicted and working with the welfare people in attempts to get them other accommodation. It is almost useless. The kind of homes that the welfare people are putting people into are not fit, as has been said here tonight, to put animals in.

I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister some of the problems affecting some of those people who received notice to move. It has been said here tonight that if real problems are brought to his attention, likely something would be done about them. As I said, there are some 175 to 200 notices extant for people to vacate, and I have here 22 samples that were sent into the committee. These are letters sent in by the tenants themselves setting out their problem and what they face.

No. 1 shows a yearly income of $5,800 with overtime and holiday pay. The wife worked to pay Crescent Finance Company. Still owes Crescent Finance Company $100.

Has not worked overtime so far this year. Wife not working. No money for down payment on a house, cannot find a house to rent. They have three bedrooms, three children—daughter 14 years, son 12, son 7. 1963 income, $4,142. The income that he received in 1964 was $5,800. Of course, the overtime—their maximum was $5,112—put them $688 over their maximum and this justified their notice to vacate.

You will notice that in many of the examples I relate to you, sir, the income in the years prior to 1964, on which year the income was calculated to justify the notice to vacate, was much lower than in 1964. If you notice, it did not average much over $4,800 on an average basis of three years.

No. 2: Income $5,931, overtime $372. Forced to work overtime because one man was fired. Four children; two boys, two girls; three bedrooms; rent $73 a month; cannot find a home to rent; cannot get a down payment for a house. Income $5,931; maximum $5,256; over the maximum $675.

Example No. 3: Yearly income $5,050; wife worked and earned $538, which made the total of $5,588. Four children; rent $74; three bedrooms. Looked for a house to rent; could not find a home to rent within their means. The 1963 income was $4,700. They were $260 over their maximum.

All of these examples are about the same. Some are worse than others.

There is one here with a yearly income of $5,559. It says:

In previous years my average income ranged from $3,629 to $5,166 with an average of $4,239. I have three children, and need three bedrooms. After about seven weeks looking for a house to rent and tried to buy one, had to buy one at a low deposit with two mortgages and over a 35-year period I pay $133 monthly.

His 1963 income was $5,166. This person moved because the frustration was too much for him to stand. But as he says, he ended up—and I do not know how he did end up—with an NHA loan and a second mortgage on it. Somebody pulled some strings, but he ended up with a 35-year mortgage at $133 a month.

The next sample was the yearly income. The yearly income I am giving at the first of the notes is the income. These are excerpts from the exact letters which I have:

Income $5,679, have five children, three bedrooms, cannot find a house to rent with five children. Have a few debts and medical expenses. Do not have any money for down payment on a house. Rent $74 month. Work overtime.

His income was $5,679, the maximum was $5,328, indicating he was $351 over. His 1962 income, $4,800; and his 1963 income was $4,800.

This case is of a three-bedroom house: Two boys, one girl. Income 1961, $3,376. In 1962, $3,917. In 1963, $5,036, with $400 overtime for an average of $4,109. In 1964, $5,583, $1,036 was overtime. Children aged four years, three years, 14 months, 17 months in the house. Three-year-old boy almost blind, girl in hospital. No overtime in 1965.

In this particular case they sent their letter to the authority explaining these problems; that the child had just begun to be able to find his way around the house and around the small fence they had put around the yard and they asked that their case be reconsidered and they were refused.

Mr. Thompson: I wonder if the hon. member would mind me interrupting for a moment? I have noticed myself and I am sure there are other hon. members in the House who are finding it rather difficult to catch the age and some of the details of the various cases that the hon. member is presenting. I am thinking strictly of the time it is, and I wondered if the hon. Prime Minister could tell us how long he plans to continue this night session?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, it has been a very interesting debate and has flowed along. We have had very many interesting comments from various hon. members. I felt I did not want to interrupt the flow. If the hon. member would finish his remarks perhaps then we could see whether this will be the end of the debate. If not, we will see what time it is when we finish this.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask: I have made some observations before and I think this is utter nonsense, utter and complete nonsense.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Prime Minister gets in a pique—

An hon. member: What you are saying is—

Mr. MacDonald: What do you mean—the proposition of carrying it on? Is anybody suggesting that any of the debate we have had today was not relevant? With a housing policy in which we have had 20 years of complete failure on the part of this government, is it not relevant that we should be debating it?

Mr. Edwards: That is nonsense!

Mr. MacDonald: This is the case, we have a crisis! Look, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that this man who is perhaps not in a position to take part in the debate should remain silent at the present stage.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Edwards: May I speak to order?

Mr. MacDonald: No, I do not want to speak to you. You just sit while I have the floor.

Mr. Edwards: Okay, you never came up and spoke in my riding in the first place.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I repeat, I do not think the hon. member is in a position to participate in the debate. Have I the floor, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, as a general proposition, the suggestion that the House should be sitting beyond 10.30 or 11.00 o'clock at any time, I suggest to this House, is nonsense.

Mr. Edwards: Well, you want to sit eight months of the year!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, would somebody shut him up, please; or carry him out, or pipe him out, or float him out?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Okay now! If we have to expose the kind of situation that you have to contend with sometimes here, then we shall have to do so.

An hon. member: You are tired!

Mr. MacDonald: Sure, we are all tired; and I just want to say to the hon. member and to the hon. Prime Minister that the proposition that we should be sitting at 12.20 dealing with an important issue like housing is nonsense. Whether or not there is anything more to come, the hon. member got up and said he had extended remarks to make and the hon. Prime Minister said go ahead—at midnight, after midnight.

Now nothing more need be said. If the hon. Prime Minister wants to bull it through, now that we have gotten to this stage—we got our raise, Easter is over—we are going to start to put the pressure on and bull it through. Well, we will get it across to the province the way the business of the House is handled.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, this is a debate we have had many times before and I do not think the question is really that it is now 12.20. The question is what has happened prior to this. We have heard the record of two years ago read into the record of this year.

Mr. MacDonald: Why not, we have listened for 20 years to get action from this government.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: How many times do we have to have it put on the record?

Mr. MacDonald: Only until we get some action from the government.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I simply say, as I said before, we have had a debate here tonight, parts of it I must say as far as I am concerned have not been enormously stimulating; on the other hand we have had a debate that has gone back and forth. I have watched the hon. member for York South and I wondered when he was really going to stand up and make his comments.

Mr. MacDonald: I should have made them earlier.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: But if we are going to go on like this I am prepared to stay into July. I do not say that I necessarily want to, but I am prepared to. We have had a debate here that has gone on and on. We have had matters discussed here that really are perhaps of general concern because we are a governing body, but which are really completely irrelevant as far as the matters of this department are concerned.

However, we sit patiently and we listen and if there is more to come, we shall give as much time as is necessary. Now I have no idea how long the hon. member for Wentworth East—I know him personally by name, even if I cannot remember his riding—but I do not know how long his remarks are to be. Frankly, I must say that I have had the sensation from this side of the floor, that there was a deliberate filibuster going on and I was prepared to sit here and outlast it. If this is what we are to have in this House, I am prepared to remain here as long as it is necessary to do the business of this House and to fight it out, if this is the way you choose to do it.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, I rise speaking on behalf of my party—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Now wait; speak on a point of order, or be in order and we will all attempt to do the same.

Mr. MacDonald: All right, Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. If the hon. Prime Minister can give the slightest documentation so far as this group is concerned of any filibustering, I challenge him to do it. He simply cannot give any indication of filibustering.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Chairman, I did not mention any group. I think any analysis—

Mr. Thompson: Well, I think there are only two groups in the House, Mr. Chairman, and on a point of order I rise. He suggests, in reply to the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party—he said, “I did not mention any particular group,” but you did mention filibustering, and let us set this straight. Tell us which group is filibustering.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have detected speeches for the sake of speeches, rather than speeches for the sake of content and if this is what we are going to deal with in this House, I, as leader of the House, and as leader of the government, am prepared to do it, and I will stay here patiently, and listen as long as there is anything to be said. If this is the way it is going to be, I am prepared to stay here and listen.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, it seemed to me that you have made the point. You said it is not the time after 12, but it is what went on before, that is significant. This means that you did not like what went on before.

Mr. MacDonald: Exactly.

Mr. Thompson: And because of this, whether it was the contents or the calibre or whatever it was, you then had your form of trying to wear people down, by saying, “I do not like what went on before, therefore we will keep them going on through the night.” If this is the way you want to lead the government of this province, I suggest to you that what has been read right now by the hon. member for Wentworth East is a tale of hardship and a tale with which everyone of us should be concerned. I suggest with respect that you, Mr. Prime Minister that most of your members were lolling back half asleep, showing a shocking indifference to this case which was being presented—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: Certainly, I was not here for some of the points but I came back in again and was surprised to see that you would permit this kind of thing to continue—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, this has nothing to do with—

Mr. Thompson: We have a housing problem year after year—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I did not interrupt the hon. member. It was not I who interrupted him.

Mr. Thompson: There is no point of order. We have had a housing problem and year after year, I think that you would accept, sir, that we have listened to all kinds of excuses that amount to an admission on the part of this hon. Minister why things have not been done in the past. He will try to do it, and I am afraid—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of personal privilege. This House—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: There is no personal privilege.

Mr. MacDonald: Just a minute, it is on a point of personal privilege. This House has called through its appropriate agencies, a select committee meeting to consider a report of the select committee on consumer credit at 9 o'clock tomorrow morning. Now, Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the hon. Prime Minister, I am here by that time in the morning. I am not going to that meeting and I am going to make certain that it is re-scheduled, because I, as the only representative of the party on that committee am not going to go through a report after two years of work—but I do not think that any member who has been following the House throughout the session should have to go out of here at 12.30 and come back at 9 o'clock for an important consideration of a report after two years. This is the kind of nonsense that the hon. Prime Minister is getting himself into.

Mr. Chairman: Would the member for Wentworth East continue with his address?

Mr. Gisborn: Yes. Mr. Chairman, as I said, I will not read into the record all of the cases of the problems of the individual tenants. They will be heard about as the days go by. There are some counsellors in Hamilton who are concerned with it and they are going to make another effort in an approach to the council to see if we can get some sensible approach to the problem in the Roxborough Park survey.

Subsequent to my raising this problem originally, the labour council in co-operation with the Ontario federation of labour have studied the housing problems in the province and, doing their part in Hamilton, they approached the city council. Consequently, the city council requested a survey by the housing branch of The Department of Economics and Development. Out of that report that came down last fall—I think it was around August some time—the recommendations showed there was a need for 800 more homes in Hamilton.

I was somewhat disappointed, as I expressed previously, that the survey was not done in a manner that would bring out the real need. It was more or less a survey taken on advertisement and solicitation of select groups, such as the applicants who already had made application for Roxborough Park, and on newspaper advertisements. But I would read into the record, to bring to the attention of the House and those interested, some of the findings of those officials when they were making this survey:

Officials checking recent applications describe some of the cases. One involved a family of four living in a $65-a-month duplex in the central area. For the rent the home is good value but the landlord does not want families with three children. The mother is expecting the third child soon. A government spokesman said that the case was average. Other examples pointed out more emphatically to a need for improved accommodations.

A mother supporting three children with city welfare money pays $60 a month for a flat over a downtown store. To reach this apartment you go down a long 18-inch-wide alley between two brick buildings, "with somebody's laundry flapping in your face," a referred-to researcher said. You climb a very narrow, steep, slippery metal fire escape, cross a sagging rooftop over a dock-like affair to keep your feet out of the water lying on the roof, reach a dugout, the back porch. When the door opens, the tenant's head appears on the level of your knees and you climb down to enter.

A family of four, the fifth expected soon, pays $80 a month rent for one of two flats in an aged house. The family shares a bathroom with downstairs tenants. Wiring prevents both families from using their stoves at the same time.

Another family with seven children once bought a house but lost it when the $200-a-month income could not cover living expenses and a mortgage payment.

A family of 13 rents a dilapidated house which has no bathtub.

Parents of five children sleep in the living room because their apartment has only two bedrooms. They cannot afford more space.

A couple with four children—the baby has been bitten by rats—had to move out of their run-down north end home. A new owner plans to renovate.

The government survey into Hamilton public housing needs was primarily aimed at families but the programme will provide accommodation for elderly persons too.

Now I do not have to continue with the report and explain what they found in regard to the need for the elderly. But I would say this: The Ontario housing corporation's policy in Hamilton consists of playing musical chairs with families. In the Roxborough Park project, families with six or more children, occupying a four bedroom house, whose annual income is between $5,112 and $5,760, will have to move out to make room for new tenants in the lower income brackets. On the surface, this looks like a fair arrangement, but large families have great difficulties finding inexpensive accommodation, and in many cases will simply switch with the new tenants who have taken their place at Roxborough Park and move into the inadequate housing vacated by them. In fact, we are creating new problems for the families.

I tried my best to follow up on some of the extraordinary cases last year—those who were evicted—to see what happened to them. I followed four, and the conditions that they found themselves in a few months after leaving the Roxborough Park indicates to me that the policy is wrong. They have ended up in much worse conditions, both in accommodation and in financial situation.

Rather than continue this game of musical chairs, we should accept the fact that the need is for more low rental housing. Be it public housing with rents geared to income, or public limited dividend housing—full recovery—programme for families on low incomes—until this is done some other arrangements must be made immediately for people in Roxborough Park.

It is obvious that most of them will not have enough money to make a down payment on a house, and commercial rents are simply too high. The immediate solution may be to establish a formula whereby the maximum allowable income can be averaged over a five-year period, rather than force people to move out as soon as they reach the maximum.

To cite cases, in one case in particular the tenant was admitted last year around August and had his notice to vacate in February. How this came about, I do not know, but it was a sad state of affairs, because in this particular case he came from an apartment and had bought a refrigerator and living appliances that you do not have in apartments. He had them on time and he just could not afford to go out and face the rental market.

We have heard tonight about the housing programme by newspaper headlines; a couple of months ago, huge headlines in the Hamilton Spectator announced the first low rental public housing opens this month. This was the headline. It looked very nice and I am sure a lot of people thought it was nice. It was an exciting event, until one read the story. This was an announcement that two large houses had been renovated ready for occupancy by the end of March, and two more by the end of April. In other words, in a 12-month period, the Hamilton housing corporation brought forth four housing units for Hamilton. The Spectator story goes on to read:

They are the first of an estimated 800 public housing units planned by the Ontario housing corporation in the next few years. If it took one year to produce four houses, it will take about 200 years to produce 800 houses and the figure of 800—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. members were these houses that you mention produced by the Hamilton housing authority?

Mr. Gisborn: I am not sure. No, I would not think so.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, who did produce them? Where did they come from?

Mr. Gisborn: To continue:

Hamilton's first geared-to-income low-rental public housing units will be ready to receive families this month. Ronald Nixon, Hamilton housing authority administrator, said two renovations on large houses on Catherine Street in the north end urban renewal zone will be completed by the end of March. Two more Catherine Street homes will be ready in April. They are the first of an estimated 800 new public housing units planned by the Ontario housing corporation in the next few years.

As I say, if it takes that long to produce four houses, it will take about 200 years to get the 800 houses.

Mr. Peck: You said that before.

Mr. Gisborn: Well, you need to hear it quite often because you are not listening very well. The figure of 800 represents today's needs, and heaven only knows how many units will be needed in 200 years, or how long it will take to have them ready. The figures could be astronomical.

Finally, last August, the Spectator carried a story that city council had decided to request the help of senior levels of government with the building of 200 family units and 100 senior citizen units. I have heard no more of this project at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: May I ask who suggested that programme? Who was it suggested by?

Mr. Gisborn: City council, Hamilton, requested, the housing committee of the city council made the recommendation to council and the council adopted it. That request should be in to the housing authority at this point.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is all within the municipal government in Hamilton?

Mr. Bryden: It is all within the total framework of housing policy, in which you are involved.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, when the Ontario housing corporation was established last year, it raised great hopes in Hamilton, and I know that I met with the executive of the labour council and they felt that the efforts of the federation and their council was getting things moving. They felt that something would be done in the public housing field. Instead there have been surveys, and a little nibble here and a little nibble there, but nothing substantial; few if any houses.

The families are in desperate need for low rental accommodation and are sick and tired of housing by headlines. They want and need action now. I think it has been said that it seems that when we talk about low rental houses, about the only thing we think about is the cost and who is going to initiate it, and who is going to take the responsibility for getting the project going. It has been said here tonight that we have to start thinking about the people that are involved. I know that some will say that the full recovery programme in Hamilton was developed to provide decent housing for people with low incomes.

They talk about low incomes in the $4,000 bracket. I have said to many that this project served a great purpose when it was first developed, when the first units were developed in 1951, because it was developed to take people out of the worst slum conditions that I have ever witnessed. I was campaigning for an aldermanic position in 1951, and many of you will remember we had what was called the trade schools in the Hamilton area, and after the war they billeted the returned servicemen in there with their families. It got to the point that we had to get the civic medical people in and have the place condemned. Only then, when they condemned these quarters, did they build the first units in the Roxborough Park survey, and they served a great purpose then. But things have changed now, and this shuttle in and out is not a good situation. People just cannot afford to go out and pay a rent of $100, $125, $135, $145 for accommodation. They just cannot find decent places; but most of them just have not got the means.

They are admitted into the project and the first three years they are in there—as I have said, I gave the examples—their income is low, in the $4,000-$4,500-$4,800 bracket and it takes them some time, with an income of $5,100 to $5,700 to start to get back on their feet.

But this does not happen. As soon as it is estimated that they reach the limit, they get their notice to vacate; and, of course, no one can deny the kind of frustration and worry this brings on.

Any sickness in the family certainly generates problems. The example I gave of the little woman with the blind girl. She has almost had a nervous breakdown; her doctor told her that she would have to relax or he would have to put her in the hospital as well.

This is the situation. I rose to make my contribution to the need for housing. It is just as bad in the Hamilton area as it is any place else. I do not know why the city council in Hamilton—I always thought they were rather progressive, they are certainly progressive enough to be considering a multi-million dollar uptown development centre; they are considering a multi-million dollar industrial expressway. All these things are needed, but why do they not take the initiative and really look at the housing problem?

Certainly if they do not do it soon in a lot of the centres, my opinion is that it will cost them much more money; because in Hamilton, I understand, there is very little land available. Most of the available land is now in the hands of developers and speculators. When the city is forced to go into public housing to obtain the land they are going to have to pay exorbitant prices for it.

Again, I do not think there are enough people on council who really want to apply themselves to the problem and take the initiative that is necessary. I join with others in saying that we cannot leave it to the municipalities. This government has got to give leadership and develop some method of putting pressure on them in some way or other.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, before the hon. Minister makes his remarks, I think the committee might rise and report progress and I so move.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report that it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 12.45 o'clock, a.m.

THE CHILD WELFARE ACT, 1965

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare) moves first reading of bill intituled, The Child Welfare Act, 1965.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): You will recognize that this new Child Welfare Act which is being introduced, contains significant amendments in the provision of services to children. I would indicate the major changes outlined in this legislation.

In the first instance, guardianship of children who are now permanent wards of the societies will become the responsibility of the Crown. This new status of wards provides an opportunity to standardize methods of service across the province in favour of children taken into care.

The second feature is that the province, with the municipalities, accepts responsibility for protection given to children in their own homes. In other words, the emphasis will be on total services and financing, which will be available to societies, not only for the protection of actual neglected children, but also for the prevention of potential neglect.

As we know, the children's aid societies of Ontario are operated under private auspices. In the past, some societies obtained a portion of their funds from private sources, such as community fund-raising campaigns, and united appeals. This legislation removes the necessity of obtaining private donations, since there is total coverage of costs between the province and the municipalities.

I think the next item in order of importance is that the province has agreed to accept full financial responsibility for the children of unmarried parents. We have also recognized the problem of the so-called "battered babies," in that the Act requires such incidents to be reported either to the local society or to the Crown attorney. We propose to absolve the informants from legal liability when they report such a situation.

This Act also simplifies the question of the child's residence, to avoid the rather costly investigations which were necessary to determine in what municipality the mother or child had legal domicile. The new Act would simply state that the child is the responsibility of the municipality where he is found to be neglected. Greater stress will also be placed on measures to provide group care homes in place of foster homes for children who have this special need.

As you will infer from the foregoing statements, the province will assume a greater share of the total financing of the services of children's aid societies.

The basic method of sharing expenditures is changed. Formerly there was a separation between the protection and wardship costs, and a per diem rate was calculated for each ward. Now, the total budget of the society is accepted as the basic cost. The amount of the annual budget will be negotiated by the children's aid society and the participating municipalities, through the committee of the county council or the city or separated town. In the northern districts where no county organization exists, a district board will be formed for the purpose of treating child welfare matters collectively by the municipalities.

An independent board of review will serve to arbitrate any matters which concern the societies, the municipalities, or the government.

I have said that the entire cost of cases where the child is born out of wedlock will be a charge upon the province. Of the balance of costs for both guardianship and protection, 40 per cent will be paid by the province and 60 per cent will be met by the municipalities; that is, the counties, cities, separated towns, and district boards.

The payments from the province will be paid on a monthly basis and they will go directly to the societies. In the past, it has been the practice to reimburse the municipalities for child welfare costs and the reimbursement has been made some time after the actual expenditure. When this new Act comes into effect, probably as of January 1, 1966, we would hope to have all arrears of subsidy cleared up. For this reason, we shall, in the coming months, pay to the municipalities, the subsidy due in the current year, as well as that which applies to last year.

This means that the province will be making child welfare subsidy available for nearly all of 1964 and 1965 in this present year—in other words, two years in one. When the accounts are brought up to date, we can then subsidize the societies on a current basis, which will be of advantage to them in avoiding operating deficits.

An expanded child welfare branch will function with the commencement of this Act, and will operate in co-operation with the children's aid societies of the province. The child welfare branch, which is mainly concerned with this Act, now has an excellent nucleus which will be available to support the services for which they are responsible. In view of the many improvements outlined, you will readily recognize that the standards of care and service will be strengthened, with better financing and administrative arrangements.

The members of the Legislature, will know, I am sure, the background of this legislation. An advisory committee on child welfare, headed by Mr. Charles J. Foster and including 12 other persons, representing various interests in children's services, reviewed the province-wide situation and presented a report. We are indebted to the chairman and his committee for this lengthy survey and the recommendations that served as a basis for this new Act.

I should say that the actual preparation of the bill was carried out by a committee headed by Professor Charles E. Hendry, director of the Toronto school of social work, together with the executive secretary of the association of the children's aid societies, the deputy Minister, the director of child welfare, the local director of a society, and the associate legislative counsel. This was the group who drafted the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, Ontario has maintained in the past excellent child welfare legislation. This new Act provides greater scope in all services to children with the major responsibilities now assumed by the government. I would ask, even before these new measures are instituted, where on this continent will you find a better child welfare programme than is maintained by the societies of this province?

This legislation contains far-reaching proposals of significance to children and to those charged with their care and protection. We have designed the Act to make certain that as far as possible, all hazards and obstacles are removed from the way of excellent protective, preventive and adoption services.

Though we have had striking success in the recent adoption campaigns, in future even greater effort will be directed to this aspect. I might note in passing, that according to our last survey there is a shortage of adoption homes for both Catholic and non-Catholic boys and girls. The surplus of children available over the number of applications for adoption is about equal in both categories. Thus, no children are being denied permanent homes, due to the religious factor alone.

I am confident that all who have an informed interest in the child welfare field, will welcome the provisions of this proposed legislation.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH ACT

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Health Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, these are relatively simple amendments. The first is to require the registration of manufacturers, renovators and secondhand dealers in upholstered furniture and stuffed articles. It will also change some of the methods that we have been using, and which have been very cumbersome, demanding that large tags be placed upon all such articles.

The second amendment is to relieve the municipalities of the necessity of securing departmental approval on a purely local matter of installing sanitary fixtures in connection with water systems, where the owner of the premises is unable or unwilling to pay expense of the same at once.

The next section is a new provision to prohibit the use of drugs for which standards have not been prescribed in The Food and Drug Acts of Canada or the British Pharmacopoeia or any other recognized work, so as to prohibit and control the use of secret remedies in the treatment of cancer and other ailments. Hospitals, universities and medical practitioners are relieved from this prohibition.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Health, of which he has had notice. My question is as follows:

Will the government encourage and endorse applications by municipalities in Ontario for grants from the federal government's commemoration of centennial of Confederation fund for the building and extension of hospitals?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I am not in a position to answer the hon. member's question fully since the assessment and endorsement of applications by municipalities in Ontario from federal government's commemoration of centennial of Confederation fund projects comes within the purview of The Department of Municipal Affairs.

I would say that I have not yet heard of any application for support of a hospital project under these grants and I do not know if they would be acceptable projects. I think the question there could be more properly answered by the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner). I am quite certain if hospitals were eligible for additional assistance under this scheme, I can assure the hon. member, that every encouragement will be given to such projects.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Speaker, just on a point of information. As of last April 27 it was stated in the House of Commons that they would approve such applications if the provincial government approved. In other words, the federal government will not make a grant to municipalities unless your government approves. Because it was a question of hospitals, the question is directed to you.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, in commenting upon this additional statement the hon. member has made, I can say that as I interpret the regulations under The Centennial Project Act I feel myself that hospitals would be eligible, but I know of no project having been put forward.

I can assure the hon. member that no project has been discouraged, I can say that definitely; but whether any project has ever been put forward or not, I do not know.

Whether they have gone to The Department of Municipal Affairs or not, I would not be in a position to tell without consulting my hon. colleague on this. I have not had an opportunity to do that since I got the hon. member's question, but I intend to do so.

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to correct certain statements.

In the committee of supply on April 27 an hon. member made it appear that an employee of Ontario Hydro, while engaged as postmaster in a Hydro community committed certain unlawful and improper acts, that he admitted these alleged offences and that in spite of them he was moved out as postmaster and placed in charge of the store. The place was Fraserdale in the district of Cochrane and the employee named was John J. Lavigne.

I now have information on the subject and am pleased to say that the charges made are completely at variance with fact. Mr. Lavigne never was postmaster. The only postmaster who has served in this capacity for many years is a senior and respected employee of Ontario Hydro, Mr. Glen Swanson. Mr. Lavigne was a former grocer who, in 1956, was engaged by Hydro as storekeeper and served in that capacity until June, 1963, when, for administrative reasons alone, another storekeeper was appointed. Mr. Lavigne, however, continued to serve and is still serving at the same store as an assistant.

On the basis of unsubstantiated statements made by a former employee with a fancied grievance, it has been said that Mr. Lavigne had confessed to having simulated a safe-breaking for purposes of covering up the tracks in terms of his own activity, trying to make it look like an outside job. There has been nothing whatever which would link Mr. Lavigne with having simulated such an offence, nor that he made any confession to any person concerning the alleged simulation.

The charge has also been levelled, again based on a statement made by the man with the fancied grievance, that the person under attack had been pocketing the proceeds of a double standard of retail prices. The same sort of round-about hearsay has it that the man charged with being responsible for these things had admitted them. There is no double standard of retail prices, and audits of store activities have not shown irregularities. No special audit has been undertaken because of any reported defalcation.

The allegation that Mr. Lavigne had pocketed the proceeds has no substance in fact. No responsible person has found any basis for this remarkable charge. There is no justification for the statement that the named employee had admitted to pocketing proceeds. He did no such thing, neither did any serving member of Ontario Hydro claim that he did.

In this particular connection it is a matter of record that the name of Mr. A. A. Pepper, who is the security officer of northeastern region of Ontario Hydro, was referred to no less than nine times on April 27 with reference to the various allegations which have been raised. Mr. Pepper, who is a highly competent, respected and honourable security officer, categorically denies that he made any of the statements which have been attributed to him. More precisely, he denies having made any statement concerning early retirement or that Lavigne had admitted to him that he had been pocketing the proceeds, just as he denies that there is any evidence of a simulated robbery or that Mr. Lavigne had made any admissions to him in this regard.

In short, an honourable man has been made the target of irresponsible and unfounded accusations.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the record has been set straight, for it is a disturbing thing when trustworthy personnel are made the object of irresponsible statements in so public a way.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The first order: Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair, and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

Mr. Speaker: The member for St. David.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. H. J. Price (St. David): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you on your appointment to the ancient and honourable position of Speaker of the House. The duties of Mr. Speaker are sometimes onerous, but you are conducting them with skill and efficiency.

I see the hon. member for Hastings West (Mr. Sandercock), the Deputy Speaker, is with us this morning and I understand that he has had many years experience with the gavel. I encourage him to use it here when the need arises. He, too, performs his duties fairly and impartially.

At this time I would like to offer congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. The speeches by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence) and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Demers) were, I thought, both well prepared and well delivered.

This is the first chance I have had to congratulate the new members of the House, the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) and the hon. member for Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Thrasher). I am sure they will enjoy their work in this Legislature and I welcome them and wish them every success in the future.

We acknowledge the election of the hon. member for Dovercourt (Mr. Thompson) to his new role as leader of his party. Mr. Speaker, may I be pardoned for saying he is now the "big wig." I am sure this will prove to be a most interesting position for him and we are all watching him from both sides of the House with great interest. He has made an excellent contribution to the work of the Legislature in the past and I have no doubt he will make an even greater contribution in the years ahead.

I am privileged to represent a seat in the House. It is with much pleasure that I bring you greetings this morning from St. David's riding.

I think twice in previous years the budget was brought down in this House on St. David's Day. In recent years it has been the practice to bring the budget down two or three weeks earlier, and this seems now to be pretty well established as the procedure.

The Budget debate provides all hon. members an opportunity of speaking in the House and I am glad to be able to offer a few remarks at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) used the appropriate adjective when he introduced the "sunshine" Budget. I know other terms have been ascribed to it by hon. members, and some of the Opposition members perhaps did not agree with the hon. Provincial Treasurer, but gentlemen, it is a "sunshine" Budget.

Mr. Speaker, I applaud the hon. Provincial Treasurer on introducing the largest budget in Ontario's history, amounting to about $1.5 billion. This is $164,300,000, or about 13 per cent larger than last year's record budget. We salute the government on not having to introduce new taxes or increase existing ones during the current fiscal year.

In 1965-1966 the government will continue our economic growth and development.

at a high level. The $1.4 billion rise in the 1964 Ontario gross provincial product of $18.5 billion surpassed expectation. In the course of the year 89,000 new jobs were created, bringing our total employment figures to an all-time high.

But, Mr. Speaker, you say what about unemployment? Well, again Ontario figures for unemployment, with a ratio of 3.3 per cent, were 2.2 per cent better than that prevailing in the rest of Canada.

Many industries in our manufacturing sector achieved new records of production. Most primary industries continued the upward swing in output. New export opportunities were opened to our manufacturers with help from the provincial government. Throughout the year Ontario's economic activity, wages and profits showed steady gains.

Mr. Speaker, educational demands continue to cost large sums of money. In the words of our hon. Provincial Treasurer, "Education costs have been a matter of concern to our government for many years." In the current fiscal year the total outlay for educational costs is $444.9 million. This amount exceeds the estimated revenues derived from liquor sales, succession duty, motor licences, race tracks, hospital tax, logging tax, securities transfer tax and sales tax.

Our grants to universities amount to $63.3 million, which is a substantial percentage of the total budget for education. Education costs now amount to about 35 cents of each dollar of revenue.

During 1965-1966 the expenditures of The Department of Health will amount to $161.7 million. The Ontario hospital insurance commission will receive $15.6 million or about nine per cent of the health budget. The largest single item is for our mental hospitals, amounting to $74.9 million, up $4.8 million over 1964-1965. The government has seen fit to provide an appropriation of $50 million to subsidize the cost of the Ontario hospital plan not met by premium subscription, with which I heartily agree.

The Department of Health continues to expand our hospital facilities with many projects scheduled for completion in 1965. I hope the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) will give serious consideration to the growing demand for more chronic and convalescent facilities needed so badly in the province.

The Department of Lands and Forests continue to expand our outstanding parks system and, I think, Mr. Speaker, the hon. members will agree that we have one of the finest systems anywhere in North America.

In the immediate years ahead, in my view, the provincial debt requires careful attention. While the new Budget provides an amount of $105.2 million to cover interest charges on our public debt, the net capital debt at March 31, 1965, is estimated at $1,423 million, representing an increase in the net capital debt in one year of $78.4 million.

Nearly 10 years have passed since I first took my seat in the House, so perhaps it is not inappropriate that I should make a few remarks on some thoughts which have occurred to me over the years.

I had occasion recently to be looking over the names of the members of the Legislature, chiselled in marble on the walls downstairs in this building. It was a shock to discover so many are no longer with us.

The path leading to a seat in this House is not always an easy one. Many of us come by different routes. Frequently this follows a term of service in municipal government which is valuable training, but certainly is not an essential qualification.

Mr. Speaker, upon first coming here I imagine other naive members like myself inquired the location of their private office. I soon discovered the tiny quarters on the second floor at the west end of this building used for this purpose. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the present facilities make it possible to attend to our duties in greater comfort and efficiency, than at any time since I have been a member of this House, and I think we should congratulate those who are responsible.

Turning to another matter, I believe the time has come for us to consider building a provincial cultural and sports centre. In this way facilities could be provided for the headquarters of the Ontario council for the arts. Such a centre could be the focal point for provincial competitions in such fields as drama, music, art, ballet and various athletic events. At such a centre, sports facilities could be constructed to Olympic specifications; something akin to an Olympic village could be provided to house the people who would be attending events at the centre all year round.

It seems to me that this is the only way in which we can train our young people to compete successfully with athletes of other countries for world honours. Such a centre would also provide a great tourist attraction. A project of this kind would require several thousand acres of land in order to house all the necessary facilities. Ideal locations are still available and the time to act is now.

We are presently expanding our leadership camps, and a select committee is studying problems confronting our youth. I hope this government will give top priority to the problems of our young people in coming years.

Perhaps at this time, a few words of advice to some of the new members might not be out of place. I believe it was the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) who recently offered some counsel to the new hon. members. It was to the effect that it is better for one's colleagues to speculate why one does not speak rather than why one does. This is good advice. It usually takes a new member a while to feel at home in the House. I know there are some who have been trapped into saying things they later regretted. So perhaps this advice offered by the hon. member in the Opposition might well be heeded.

Fortuitously, Mr. Speaker, arrangements have been made for the hon. Minister of Health to use the press lounge as a dispensary should an epidemic of foot-in-mouth disease break out in the Legislature.

Some additional advice I would like to offer to the new hon. members is not to blame your own party for all the shortcomings of democracy. It is always wiser to direct some of your criticism towards the members opposite.

Sooner or later, Mr. Speaker, all hon. members face the trial of their maiden speech. They do so with some trepidation. I can say, having been in the House for some years, that most members enjoyed considerable success on this occasion. It is accurately reported that Edmund Burke and Disraeli considered their maiden speeches to have been failures, but this view was not shared by members of the Commons who heard them.

Upon taking his seat for the first time, a member is likely to be awed by the ability of some of the veteran members of the House. This, I find, as others have before me, wanes with the passing of the years.

When I first came to the House, we lacked many of the advantages we enjoy today. Having sat first at the extreme right I know that that particular seat has many advantages, particularly when you want to come and go quietly without observation. Something else I recall when I first came to the House, which was a shock to me and a source of private embarrassment, was that the spectators in the gallery, could not hear what was being said, and it was only a member who happened to have a very good voice who could be heard at all. Of course, this has all changed with the coming of our PA system, which is so necessary in this House because of the poor acoustics.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I would like to tell you that my constituents are well pleased with the new provincial flag—so am I.

It will be to our everlasting credit that we did not turn our backs on our heritage; that we did not close the door on our history. Who would stand idly by and oversee the glories of our past destroyed? I am convinced we acted wisely. Surely any other course would be abhorrent to Conservative tradition.

Mr. W. G. Noden (Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, again it is a pleasure to congratulate you upon the excellent manner in which the conduct of this House is carried on, and also to offer my sincerest congratulations to the Chairman, the hon. member for Hastings West (Mr. Sandercock), who always has that understanding smile. Though he informs me from time to time when he goes on his annual hunting parties, he finds the deer are running faster. We will forgive him for this, because we can understand that fault.

At this time I intend to speak on one aspect of the Budget. Mr. Speaker, the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) is to be commended on bringing to the members of this chamber, a clear and concise picture of the economy of Ontario, and in his words, and I quote:

It represents a well balanced plan, designed to meet the essential requirements of a dynamic economy.

Also:

It is the longest period of expansion since World War II. This can also be a great credit to the present government of this province under the capable leadership of the hon. Mr. Robarts. I am sure we have no fears for the future prosperity of our day, for the people of Ontario and their everyday requirements.

Mr. Speaker, another statement by the hon. Provincial Treasurer, has given me further thought and I quote:

The need for increased provincial expenditure must be balanced by the need to maintain taxation and debt management policies consistent with the sound and balanced economic growth which our expenditures are designed to promote.

How do we maintain this kind of a policy of a healthy economic growth for Ontario? In my opinion, it can only come about by proper uses of our natural resources, and the people with an understanding of this importance. I will try to give you some of my observations relating to our forest resources in north-western Ontario.

The hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) announced the formation of a forestry study unit to examine existing forest resources of the province of Ontario to assure continued progress in utilization with a view to their fullest development. The advisory committee have agreed to act in an advisory capacity to the forestry study unit. The unit will study forestry practices in Ontario and recommend such measures as may be necessary to continue sound programmes of silviculture, conservation and forest management and suggest how we may get the highest possible sustained yield from our forest resources.

My concern, how do we go about guaranteeing sustained yield of the trees of Ontario? In line with a policy initiated by The Department of Lands and Forests, the department has written to the large pulp and paper companies asking for their co-operation in bringing about increased activity in a regeneration programme. Most of the companies have indicated a willingness to co-operate. Under date of February 3, 1965, in the Globe and Mail, an article appeared stating, and I quote: "A tree shortage in B.C. Future lumber industry tops B.C. industrial production list, but will there be enough trees to go around?"

This same situation could apply to Ontario. It has been my privilege to fly by conventional aircraft between the Lakehead cities and Fort Frances, some 200 air miles, as well as by helicopter, and to observe the endless forests. In one's own mind the thought arises: There are trees to be cut for all time. That is not so. After walking over areas that have been cut, you wonder how long our forest resources can last. Remember, trees are cut only in areas where it is most economical to operate. In time, other areas will be cut, based on economics of the times, of that day. I am not a silviculturist, but what I submit is my own practical observation.

I have listened to figures given in this Legislature on the tree-planting programme as being short of the goal required to maintain sustained yield to provide the industry in the days to come. I do not intend to refute the statements but to give some average figures of the present rate of forest regeneration work by The Department of Lands and Forests in the three districts of the western region—northwestern Ontario.

The total seedlings planted for the year 1963-64 was 2,533,600. Then there are the other programmes, such as scarification, seeding and natural growth. To give a clearer picture, I will use figures for the Fort Frances forest district. The average acres logged annually amount to 12,000 for the year 1963-64. Acres planted, 4,082. The remainder will reproduce satisfactorily by present standards, by natural means. Planting of seedlings and seeds is not the final answer. This method can serve only as long as plant food is available for the species tree. Nature must provide this. For example, where an area is burned over, fireweed, etc. is the first growth, then alders, etc. Afterwards, poplar, jackpine, and finally Norway and white pine, each providing food material for the other.

Mr. Speaker, the idea that The Department of Lands and Forests or industry should seed or plant seedlings to replace each tree cut is not necessarily correct, as I have mentioned. It is a well-known fact, or it is presumed, that a good fire over a certain area will create a stand of timber in future years such as man is unable to do with all his knowledge of silviculture. Trees are similar to the human being, requiring the proper kinds of foods to grow. The planting of seedlings or seeds cannot survive unless the proper nourishment is in the ground and could be a once-over programme, like the commercial salesman who covers the territory on a high-pressure programme, only good for the one trip, because the buying public did not take too favourably to the results of the product.

There is, however, a backlog that requires treatment by planting, seeding, scarification, etc. It is a backlog which creates the greatest concern and the only manner this can be dealt with is by the voting of extra funds by the members of this Legislature, or the forest industry in co-operation with the government, to work out some kind of a continuing development programme. The present method of forest taxation and regeneration is controlled by many factors.

Regeneration of the next stand of timber is our key problem. We need to control regeneration for our best advantage within the limits set by nature. We will be helped if we get a clear idea of the effects of taxation upon our efforts. The following discussion applies mainly to Crown forests. In Canada, taxation of Crown forests takes the three forms of ground rent plus fire tax, dues on timber cut, and income taxes. The first form of tax is as stable as can be expected of a human institution. Ground rent is called a payment to retain cutting rights, but it is obviously an annual interest payment on the expectation value of future timber crops. Ground rent is conservative, because it is a small part of total payments, and many companies hold extensive unused cutting rights by this means.

The second form of tax, dues on timber cut, is related directly to the quantity of timber cut. Dues payments vary more than ground rent but capriciously. Rates of dues remain fixed for some time but change more frequently than ground rent.

The third form of tax, income taxes, assures that the state at large shares in good times when they occur. When business is poor the tax is less, whereas ground rent is unchanged and dues are less only as less wood is cut. Income taxes accrue mainly from the increased values imparted by manufacturing processes but also partly from cutting rights.

The three forms of taxes are an integrated system. Each tax touches its field only in part so that a balanced burden can be obtained over a wide range of circumstances. In a broad way the first two pay the expenses of The Department of Lands and Forests and the third is a general sharing of gains.

The question of how to charge regeneration costs meets some difficulty. The more advanced methods of logging are aimed at regeneration but it is hard to separate regeneration costs from extraction costs. Some costs such as those of planting, seeding and scarifying are easily segregated, but additions to these, separated from extraction costs, are plainly arbitrary.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that stumpage dues should be increased to take care of this cost. Maybe so. But we also must realize that the forest industry has become very competitive and, in order to maintain employment and a healthy industry, all factors must be taken into consideration. Only in this way can the sustained growth of our forests keep pace with the demands of the industry which provides employment and economic growth for the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on another subject that came to my attention last session and I want to express some views and observations on the mining industry of Ontario. It has always been my view that there is not too much wrong with the mining industry; that the industry can very well take care of itself, in the best interest of the economics of mining.

Mr. Speaker, during the last session of the Legislature, some very disparaging statements were made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald). I am sorry that he is not in his seat this morning to listen to some of the facts that would perhaps correct his thinking. The hon. member visited the community of Atikokan which is in the riding of the Rainy River district serving the Steep Rock mining area. In Hansard under the debates of this House of February 28, 1964, the hon. member for York South said: "—it is one of the saddest places in Ontario."

And again: "It is drifting into a ghost-town position."

And the third statement: "—is dwindling into a ghost-town."

I would ask, what right has any individual to downgrade any community that he might visit in Ontario? Today the mines at Atikokan are moving forward on a sound plan of development, facing up to the constant change in mining procedures. I bring to your attention some pertinent facts relating to the well-being of this community and the problems as they apply to Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited, being the original mining development in the area.

1. Tonnage of iron ore shipped since operation began: 28,527,000.

2. Wages and salaries paid—and I want to point this out—$69,215,000.

3. Paid to Canadian National Railways for rail freight on iron ore: $41,762,000.

4. Dividends paid: 1962, $1,611,774—20 cents a share; 1963, $1,611,774—20 cents a share; 1964, $2,014,718—25 cents a share. No dividends were paid for the 17 years between 1945 and 1961. All the earnings were ploughed back into development and repayment of debt.

5. Total investment in the enterprise at November 30, 1964: $100,978,500.

6. There are approximately 1,500 dwellings in Atikokan—and I apply this to the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) in his remarks yesterday and some of the criticism in building homes. There are 54 vacancies in Don Park; a few vacancies in Dunbar Heights; elsewhere there are only a few buildings empty. This means that 96.5 per cent of all dwellings are occupied. We expect vacancies to be at the vanishing point by spring, and I would say it was coming to that now.

We have another mine, Caland Ore, subsidiary to Inland Steel of Chicago, who are presently building a $15 million pelletizing plant to be in operation in the latter part of 1965. For the year 1964, shipments of iron ore from the Steep Rock area—this is the whole area—amounted to approximately 3.5 million tons representing—just get this—42 per cent of all iron ore mined in Ontario.

The two mining companies located at Atikokan shipped 326 boat loads during 1964 totalling 3,312,822 tons. For the Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited, the freight paid to the railways and steamship companies was $4,761,000. This represents 28 per cent of the gross value of the product being paid out to the transportation companies.

Mr. Speaker, these are significant facts as it relates to the economy of Atikokan and applies to many other mining communities in Ontario. In my opinion, I do not think that there is too much wrong with that community; I do not think that the statements that were made were justified, based on the average mining community in Canada today.

As a member of the select committee on mining, studying the stimulation of prospecting and development of the mining industry of Ontario, I have listened to many statements being made about the mining industry: Stop the export of unprocessed ores; increase the mining tax, and so on. As an individual who has read, considered and observed the growing up of the mining industry—yes, and some of the vanishing mining developments—there is a history to the development of the mining industry which I would like to apply historically to iron ore in Ontario, yet it has to be related to Canada as a whole.

No iron ore from domestic sources was produced in Canada from 1924 to 1939, yet Canada today is now the world's leading iron ore exporter. The whole structure of the iron ore market has also changed. In the early post-war years the demand was for direct shipping of natural ores, without prior treatment. Rapid technological changes in ore processing and steel-making have brought a dramatic shift. The main market now is for "beneficiated" ores, in which the iron content is increased. Great strides have also been made in "tailoring" the ore—most frequently by pelletizing and sintering—in order to meet the specific needs of the steel producer. The high level of capital outlay required for these facilities demands not only large tonnage projects but also the assurance of stable market conditions. This has resulted in the tendency of the steel producers to maintain control over iron ore production, either through ownership of the mine or long-term contract arrangements.

The Canadian iron ore industry depends heavily on export markets. Between 85 and 90 per cent of production is currently being exported. Furthermore, although Canadian steel companies now consume over eight million tons of iron ore a year, more than 60 per cent of their requirements are imported. The situation is explained by the fact that Canadian steel companies invested in, or otherwise became associated with, iron ore mining companies in the United States prior to the establishment of the Canadian industry.

The present developments in Canada will enable the Canadian steel industry to obtain an increasing part of their requirements from domestic resources. This trend is expected to continue, so that by the end of the present decade, Canadian mines will likely be supplying the entire domestic market. Nevertheless, it is evident that in the foreseeable future, iron ore producers will be dependent on the United States market for the major part of their sales, and this is quite understandable because in the process of making steel you cannot use just one ore from one body, you have to have different ores in different parts of the country in order to produce the different grades of steel.

Mr. Speaker, again, there are signs of increasing competition in export markets. In Europe, African and South American competition has become very strong and Australia is meeting some of Japan's needs. In the United States, as the rich iron ore range of the Mesabi area became exhausted—and in my time I remember that there were shipments of some 90 million tons per year and it is down to about 55 million at the present time—new developments were delayed by heavy taxes on iron mining. Recent tax concessions in the United States are expected to lead to exploration and development of huge reserves of low-grade taconite deposits. To stay fully competitive, the Canadian industry will have to take full advantage of technological advances, both in extraction methods and in processing the ore to meet consumer requirements. The above situation has already gone into effect on the Mesabi iron range in Minnesota, where one of the largest manufacturers of automobiles is erecting a pelletizing plant.

I was most interested in a statement by the president of the Canadian metal mining association, which I intend to quote: Discussing taxes, he said that Canada has been favourably known as a politically stable country with policies that encourage mining enterprise. He said this situation must continue because mining finance is international in character.

"We, who are so dependent on our export trade, must remain competitive in mining as well as in other respects," he said. "It would be a sorry day for all of us—and for Canada—if any attempt were made to reduce the industry's effectiveness."

He said that government tax provisions for mining firms, particularly depletion allowances and the three-year tax exemption for new mines, have been of the greatest importance in enabling the Canadian industry to grow to its present stature.

"Without these incentives, exploration and proportionately, mineral discoveries, would be greatly reduced. Further, it would become impossible to finance production of more marginal deposits."

Once again I bring to your attention the importance of the mining industry to the economy of Ontario and Canada. Employment, directly and indirectly provides employment for approximately ten per cent of Canada's labour force. Export trade and earner of foreign exchange accounts for 40 per cent of the dollar value of all Canadian exports. This is an important feature in the economy of Canada today.

The mineral industry accounts for 40 per cent of all revenue freight on Canadian railways and 50 per cent of the freight on inland waterways. So you can see from that, the importance that the mining industry has on the economy of Ontario and Canada.

It is important for us to keep in mind, mineral deposits are an expendable natural resource. This creates problems for communities which have become established and are dependent only on the existing ore bodies. Today the other known iron ore bodies in northwestern Ontario are at Lake St. Joseph, Red Lake, Nakina, south of Fort William, Bending Lake, Emo and others. These ore bodies are still to be developed and will supply iron ore for the next generation, and then some, without disturbing, and in this case without having to disturb, any known ore bodies that might be in our provincial parks.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) for publishing the 1964 Review of New Discoveries and Developments in Ontario Mining. This is a very informative booklet, which should be read by every member of the Legislature, to acquaint him with the importance of the mining industry as it relates to the continuing economy of this "Grand Old Province."

Mr. Speaker, I have one other item I would like to mention at this time which is very close to my past and to the welfare of northwestern Ontario. And I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. members of this House, an important event which took place on June 28 of this year—the official opening and completion of Highway 11, the section between Fort Frances, Atikokan and the Rainy River district.

Hon. members are aware, looking at the new northern Ontario road map compiled under the direction of the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), Highway 11 begins at the water front on Yonge Street in Toronto and terminates in the town of Rainy River where it crosses the international boundary, skirting the south shore of the Lake-of-the-Woods and then into the province of Manitoba. This completed highway will provide the second transcontinental road link between northern Ontario or, should we say, the transprovincial highway, by way of Barrie, Bracebridge, North Bay, Cochrane, Kapuskasing, Nipigon, the Lakehead cities, Atikokan, Fort Frances and Rainy River, some 1,200 miles long.

At this time, on behalf of the people of the Rainy River district, I extend to all hon. members of the Legislature a warm and sincere invitation to be with us at the official opening upon the completion of Highway 11 across the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, it so happens that completion of the final road link takes place in the most westerly part of the province. This should not detract from its importance because of the added attractions we have to offer the travelling public.

Let me bring to the attention of the House some interesting things to see. After leaving the Lakehead cities with their intriguing waterfront of grain elevators, ore docks and Mount McKay, you continue on Highway 11 through forests, passing lakes and rivers. This highway parallels the main water route between eastern and western Canada, called the Voyageurs' Route, travelled first by the explorers beginning around 1630, then the coureurs de bois, the fur trading companies, and the main travelled route, which was used to transport troops to quell the Riel Rebellion.

After this, the three railways came into being; now two transcontinental highways are provided. The first stop is Quetico provincial park, second largest park in Ontario—some 1,760 square miles—a wilderness area for our people to enjoy.

Quetico conference and training centre, located on beautiful Eva Lake, operates on a plan similar to that of the Banff school of fine arts at Banff. Then onto the open pit iron ore mines at Atikokan. Here you can look down 500 feet into the pits where the rust coloured iron ore is being removed. Yes, gold in its final analysis.

From here you travel west through forests, past lakes, crossing the Seine River, coming to the community of Mine Centre, where the gold fever held sway, before the Klondike rush of 1898. The next scenic stop will be as you cross the Bear's Passage bridge between Swell Bay and Red Gut Bay of Rainy Lake; then a short distance on where the Windy Point bridge crosses to the entrance to Islet Bay.

Then you come to the major building undertaking, making possible the completion of Highway 11 across Ontario, the causeway over Rainy Lake, originally called Lac le Pluie, a distance of three and a half miles over water by bridge structures, rock fill and the crossing of islands, considered to be the longest engineering programme undertaking in a Commonwealth nation, at the beginning of construction.

At this point, you can look over beautiful Rainy Lake, as far as the eye can see, a sight to behold and not to be forgotten. The cutting of the ribbon will take place on the causeway across Rainy Lake.

Modern Fort Frances, with its pulp and paper mill—the next stop—is the judicial centre of the Rainy River district, and one of the oldest fur trading places between eastern and western Canada. Following Highway 11 west, we travel through the largest agriculture area in northern Ontario, following the scenic Rainy River. There are other interesting facts relating to this part of the northwestern area. Hon. members should come and see it for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, just so that we do not overlook another important fact—the credit for building highways across northern Ontario should go to the Progressive-Conservative government of this province. No other government has done so much to open up northern Ontario for development by the building of highways and financial assistance to the municipalities for municipal roads.

Thank you.

Hon. G. E. Gomme (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank you for this opportunity of being able to say a few words to the House.

In the preparation of numerous articles appearing in the press recently on rural poverty in Canada, it is unfortunate that the authors spent so much time reviewing statistics and national averages without giving sufficient information on the attitudes of rural people towards this change, particularly when it involves uprooting their homes and moving to a completely new environment.

I would like to read part of an editorial from my own home town paper, the Almonte Gazette, of February 25, 1965:

There were the same kind of pictures shown of roofless log barns that were depicted in Miss Moon's story. No one denies that there are abandoned farms in this county just as there are in many other counties, but in some cases the pictures create a false impression. For instance, many of these barns with the roofs falling in and the walls sagging haven't been used in years.

The farm probably was purchased by the man living next to it and the buildings were not torn down. The owner may have wanted this land for pasture, or maybe there was a good wood lot on it in addition to the pasture which he lacked on his own.

However, of this we may not be quite sure; we recognized one of the TV pictures as having been taken not too far from here. We compared notes next day with others who were watching this newscast and they agreed. If we are right, this farm with a couple of log barns on it, roofless and depressing looking is owned by a man who is in the cattle business. There was a time when it was a good farm, as farms were considered 25 years ago, but those who inherited it felt that they could make more money in other ways. The weathered looking logs in the roofless building are the kind that people from the cities are looking for these days to build fancy homes in the country.

The cattle trader, who owns the place, has been offered plenty for the log walls but for some reason he will not sell, so no one can say that he is in dire straits, even in a depressed area.

A recent study conducted by a skilled staff in south-central Ontario shows that 70 per cent of the low income people interviewed with gross incomes under $2,500 per year, were quite satisfied with their way of life and had no desire to move elsewhere. It is dangerous however to rationalize too much on this basis, particularly if there are young families with children living in these situation where there is often little incentive or education.

In the category of low income farmers are many semi-retired people who are farming only to make sufficient cash income to meet their basic needs. In some of our rural areas, low rural income cannot be traced to agriculture as much as to displaced woods workers. This does not make the problem any less serious but indicates that this problem cannot likely be solved by agricultural adjustment methods as suggested by many of the articles in the press.

Our increasing industrial and business growth in this province has created a strong demand for many skilled trades and business administrators. Expansion of the technical and vocational programmes in Ontario is designed to enable both urban and rural people to obtain training in the fields where there are expanding employment needs. You will note that Ontario is making more concrete progress in the field of retraining programmes than any other province. As you no doubt know, a full-dressed federal-provincial conference on ARDA was held in Montreal at the end of last November and agreement was reached on the terms of the general ARDA agreement that will, if ratified by all the governments concerned, govern the operations of ARDA until 1970. This new agreement embodies several important changes from the first general agreement that has been in effect since 1962.

What is poverty? Poverty is a difficult and confusing concept carrying dangerous social and psychological overtones that makes its analysis very complex. A number of sociologists, economists and other scholars have written about poverty and there is still much disagreement among them as to the basic nature and causes of poverty. First of all, poverty is relative. Poverty is relative to prevailing standards of living at a given time or in a given place. A family that we consider poor today might have been rich through the Depression. A family that is considered prosperous in rural Newfoundland, might be considered poor in New York city. Poverty is relative to the levels of income, of expectation and of service.

For example, an appliance which might be considered a necessity in one part of Canada, might be thought a simple luxury in another. In short, the concept and the definition of poverty are entirely relative to the society under consideration. This means that it is probably impossible to formulate a single definition of poverty that will apply throughout all Ontario, or even throughout all of rural Ontario, because there are considerable regional differences in the ways of life and the standards of living. But we might be able to agree on certain absolute minimum standards of existence that could be expected by any Canadian in the year 1965, no matter where he may live. In effect, this is what we have already done in certain spheres in most of our welfare legislation, such as old age pensions, unemployment insurance and family allowances. But this legislation was not designed to eliminate poverty in Canada, and of course it has not done so.

Secondly, as well as being relative to time and place, poverty is also to some degree subjective. By this I mean that families who are poor by contemporary community standards may not consider themselves poor, or may not admit that they are poor. On the other hand, people who are far removed from minimum levels of existence may consider that they are poor because they compare themselves to friends or neighbours with still higher standards of living. To put it in sociological terms, their expectations are higher than their current levels of achievement or status; whereas in the previous case, the family's expectations coincided with their status. There is another factor which makes it difficult to arrive at the generally accepted definition of poverty.

Thirdly, poverty is not simply an economic concept. While we all think of poverty as being basically a question of money, other factors are also involved. A family may have more than the minimum level of income considered acceptable and yet still be living in a condition that might be described as poverty; if, for example, the family's health, hygiene and eating habits were poor; if they lived in a dwelling without electricity or indoor plumbing, or if they had no cultural life either from the lack of education, lack of interest or the lack of opportunity.

So you can see that the concept of poverty is not an easy one to define, or to isolate, yet we feel that we should not permit people to live in dire poverty; that we have a social responsibility to give them the opportunity to share the good life. Here, of course, we are making a value judgment. We are assuming that poor people want the kind of life that more prosperous people want. This assumption has been challenged but nevertheless I believe that it would be the consensus of most Canadians that no citizen of our country should be deprived, owing to the factors that he cannot control, of the opportunity to enjoy the advantages of modern civilization.

If we admit this proposition, we might agree on a general definition of poverty along the following lines: Poverty is a condition in which people are for any reason prevented from enjoying certain minimum advantages or benefits afforded by the level of civilization in Canada today. The most elementary of these advantages or benefits are food, clothing and shelter. We have gone on from there as our resources increased and our ideals progressed to include education, health, old age security, unemployment insurance and universal pensions.

The precise degree of the responsibility of society and the state for the welfare of its citizens will ever be the subject of political review and debate, and depends also what a given society can afford. But the principle is now generally accepted.

If we agree that every Canadian has a right to enjoy certain minimum advantages of our modern civilization we must ask what reasons might prevent him from enjoying them. I think that the reasons can fall into two general categories. First is the question of access. A man might be prevented from enjoying a minimum standard of living either because he cannot afford it or simply because the things were not available where he lives.

In the first case, he is denied access to the minimum benefits of life in 20th century Canada, because of inadequate financial resources. They cost money, and he has not got enough.

In the second case, he is denied access to these advantages, because they are not physically available in his area. This is true most often of such services as electricity, schools, teachers, doctors, hospitals and even in extreme cases, inadequate variety of food.

The question of physical availability is related to the question of money, however, because presumably people with enough money can move to places where these services are available, but they may not be prepared to give up their whole way of life on a farm, or in a small village, for example, and move to a city just to be near schools and hospitals. This brings up the second category of reasons why people do not take advantage of modern standards of living and that is the question of motivation. Although modern benefits may be both financially and physically accessible to them, many Canadians still do not take advantage of them, even where very little effort would be required on their part. This is a very tricky aspect of the problem of poverty and both the area of social responsibility and the solutions are much less clear. It is in this connection that the sociologists speak of a culture or a sub-culture of poverty, of entirely different sets of values, of a closed society, resisting traditional programmes.

How, for example, do you persuade a man to look after his teeth, if he does not want to? For myself, I believe the answer to most questions like that resides in education, provided it is the proper kind. But how do you persuade a man to become educated if he does not want to? We have compulsory schooling up to the mid-teens in Ontario. We force young people at least to go through the motions of becoming educated. Should this practice be extended? Is there a better way of doing it? These and similar questions require a great deal more public debate and discussion and we must do far more research into the psychology and the statistics of rural poverty. ARDA has already embarked on this programme.

Ontario ARDA has been criticized to the effect that its programmes are oriented too much towards resource development and not towards improving the living standards of our people. There are only two effective methods of improving living standards. One is by resource development and the other is through educational and training programmes. Evidence of the importance of education, recognized by the government of Ontario, is reflected in the estimates of The Department of Education and University Affairs. ARDA, however, must be interested in resource development, because in most situations this is the principal means of increasing income in rural Ontario. You may point out that many provinces are using federal ARDA to assist them in carrying out resource programmes which have been, and are now, continuing provincial programmes in this province for many years, such as water conservation, land drainage, reforestation and agriculture research and extension. It is the total programme of the government that the Legislature should be concerned with. The Ontario ARDA directorate, which has been established by statute and provides for senior representation from each of the departments of government that have major interests in rural development, recognizes the need for a total approach to this problem.

In attempting to solve the dual problems of physical and financial accessibility, two approaches are possible in each case. In the first, either the benefit and services in question can be provided where the people are, or the people can go where the services are and the benefit already available. In the second case, services and benefits can be provided free or at nominal costs, or people's incomes can be increased until they can afford the present cost. The first approach in each case, involves major political decisions and expenditures in the field of social policy. Chiefly, a provincial responsibility. In both cases, ARDA emphasizes the second approach, increasing human mobility and developing new opportunities for income and employment. Thus ARDA does not develop new social policies, but rather facilitates adjustments made necessary by existing social policies. This is the most economical and productive way possible.

Let me return, not to the point I mentioned earlier about the minimum benefits that our society should put within the reach of every Canadian. I do not want to attempt to define these because I have said there are many regional variations in emphasis. Naturally the fields of nutrition, health, medical care and hospitalization, education, technical and vocational training, housing, social security and pensions must be considered and probably others as well.

What I want to do today is to present to you some figures on living conditions in rural areas, already compiled by ARDA. Based on the 1961 census survey of occupied dwellings, five household characteristics have been selected as most nearly representing the national level of living conditions. The absence of any of these items from a household suggests some degree of inconvenience and hardship to the occupants. The five living conveniences selected as standards were: First, hot and cold water. Second, furnace. Three, mechanical refrigerator. Four, flush toilet. Five, passenger automobile. Unfortunately the census does not record how many of these conveniences are found in a given dwelling, but only how many dwellings have a given convenience. So we cannot tell how many rural dwellings have none of the conveniences I mentioned. The following table shows, however, the percentage of rural dwellings that are equipped with each convenience in turn.

In Ontario, I will give the percentages compared to the national average.

Hot and cold running water: National, 50.2 per cent; Ontario, 62.8 per cent.

Furnace, that is central heating: National, 43.1; Ontario, 52.1.

Mechanical refrigerator: National average, 78.8; Ontario, 91.3.

Flush toilet: National average, 54 per cent; Ontario, 64.5.

Passenger automobile: National, 70.1; Ontario, 82.2.

Now I would like to read part of an editorial written in the Rural Co-operator of Tuesday, February 23, 1965, written by Charles Huffman, who is the president of that organization.

While effective leadership is one of our greatest needs, we as federation people must not overlook the necessity for creating the proper attitude towards rural development. We must generate enthusiasm for, and belief in, the possibilities of rural development and we must destroy the apathy and complacency and defeatism that is all too prevalent in many rural communities.

If Canadians could only see the degradation and despair of the hordes of people in the rural areas in many countries of the world, we would be shaken by our complacency and realize that we in rural Canada have something worth fighting for. If we are content to let other agencies such as government step in and do everything for us, we then become mere wards of the state and will have lost our most precious possession, our freedom and our right to make our own decisions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Gomme: The editorial continues:

We must continually remind those in authority over us that we demand their recognition of, and respect for, the principles of democratic government, which is government of the people by the people and for the people. Government of the people without respect for the other two clauses is tyranny, not democracy.

So much has been said about ARDA. In some of the townships of my county we have cut and exported most of the lumber but because of the new process of using hardwood, we can still cut pulpwood. To show the co-operation between departments of this government, The Department of Mines had done some mapping in Darling township and had established that good deposits of marble were available. As a result of this Omega Marble, Tile and Terrazzo Limited, Angel Stone Limited and Vermont Marble, carried out extensive explorations in 1962 and the first two companies began quarrying.

Ontario had, previous to this, imported approximately $1.5 million of marble from Italy, Morocco, Burma and Georgia, but now this local material has a perfect test, and as architects become accustomed to it, much more will be used. This is at present a small but growing industry and workers have uncovered blue, white, green and pink marble. They believe this blue marble is the only blue marble in world. The Omega company cuts and polishes the rough marble in its Toronto plant which is the most up to date, and if any hon. members are interested they may see some of this material in some of the buildings in this city.

I appreciate the work of The Department of Mines and the help that it has been but I must urge the department to help us further as we may come up with more material in this area which, a short time ago, was nothing but bush, swamp, rock and trees. I am glad The Department of Public Works has now allowed this marble to be used in Ontario public buildings and I urge The Department of Economics and Development to help us advertise so that we may be able to export this. Building rocks and rare metals are of little importance unless markets exist in which to sell the end product.

Because I have lived in the Smiths Falls area for many years and have represented this area for the past seven years, I think I know something about this part of the province, its life, its people, its economics, its aims and objectives, its hopes and aspirations. I think I know a good deal more about my area than do most hon. members of this House, just as I expect each knows more about his particular area than I do. It was therefore, Mr. Speaker, rather surprising to hear what the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) had to say about the Smiths Falls hospital school; about the programme and policy of this government and The Department of Health. Indeed, it may be unwittingly or by inference, about the staff of this great institution.

First let me say, sir, it ill befits the pot to call the kettle black. The hon. member for Scarborough West should be the last in this House to criticize anyone for throwing up a screen of words. He should recall the story told by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Reuter) which suggested he had swallowed a dictionary.

But, Mr. Speaker, let me return to the Smiths Falls hospital school. I have watched this institution develop since its first building and, indeed, my knowledge and interest go back long before that time; it goes back to the time when the Henry government acquired the land and even the stock of material on the site to begin building a hospital school. Then came the election of 1935 and the dark days for Smiths Falls and the mentally retarded, for the Liberal government stopped the work, sold the materials and abandoned all the plans that had been made for the mentally retarded. Not until Ontario again had a Conservative government was any further work undertaken on their behalf.

As soon as possible, following World War II, Ontario began building the present Smiths Falls hospital school.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Gomme: Of course it was big; that was the usual and accepted pattern of the times. Only 13 years ago, and even six years ago, when the present hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) took over this department—I recall him saying that his advisers told him that 1,000-bed institutions for the mentally retarded were quite acceptable. Now the trend is to smaller facilities and this may be very good and we should be ready and willing to accept it. That this is the attitude of The Department of Health is evident from the fact that they are not building any more large institutions, and, in fact, have demonstrated this policy because the first small hospital school is now almost ready for occupancy.

The hon. member for Scarborough West has made a great outcry about the overcrowding at Smiths Falls and apparently has lost sight of the fact that very active, useful, worthwhile programmes are constantly being carried on there. I am not going to repeat what the hon. Minister said about these programmes; all that is on the record, but I do want to speak of what I have seen. Of course, I differ from the hon. member for Scarborough West in at least one respect; I am not an expert in everything, while he apparently is. I cannot argue about the effectiveness of the programme, but being gifted with good eyes and some commonsense, I can see and understand that great progress has been made and is being made with many of the patients, even in the face of the handicap of crowding which the hon. Minister admitted.

How many hon. members have seen the Cubs, Scouts, Guides and Brownies in action? Those who have ever been involved in these programmes with normal youngsters will know how difficult even they can be. How much more difficult, trying and time-consuming then, the programme must be with the retarded, and with those who are retarded and physically handicapped as well. Many of the patients at Smiths Falls are in this category.

I have watched the summertime programme of activities of games, of recreation on the spacious grounds of the hospital and the swimming programme at the town pool. Many of our local people have been amazed at what is being done with and for these children.

Mr. Speaker, down home I never hear our people scream about the hospital as some of the hon. members in this House do. The people, like myself, depend on their practical commonsense and realize that this work with and for the retarded is difficult and it is not expected that it will result in miracles. They realize, too, that the great majority of patients are far better managed and cared for than could possibly be done even in their own homes. Yes, Mr. Speaker, one parent was talking to me about this overcrowding shortly after his child had been admitted. I suggested we could relieve it by sending the most recently admitted back home, and do you know his reply? "Oh, my God, do not do that. We could never stand it."

And again the hon. Minister said recently on TV that almost daily he receives requests for admissions which say, in essence, We know you are crowded, but cannot you take one more.

One of the newspapers suggested that the attitude of the hon. Minister, by his own words, was not the best for the patient. Well, sir, my commonsense bids me wonder if it is better to risk harm or upset among the normal members of the family than to admit the retarded child to the hospital school. I do not know the right answer and sometimes I wonder if the real experts—not the self-appointed ones—know the right answers either.

Then I look at the situation in other provinces and in the states to the south of us. I find that Ontario provides for its retarded more than half of all such services in the whole nation and achieves a more generous ratio than any other jurisdiction. As for crowding, I looked at the record for New York state, probably the wealthiest in this continent, and I found their smallest hospital school is 750 beds and their institutions last year were overcrowded by 32 per cent.

I get calls and letters from the people I represent seeking help in having their tragic children admitted and I agree with the hon. Minister that there is nothing wrong or evil in this. I was elected to represent my people, all of them, and it is a privilege and, I think, a duty to help them in any way I can. Always I have been reminded that two doctors' certificates are the first essential. Sometimes I have been able to help some family have their child admitted and never once have I heard from such families anything but high praise for the department and gratitude for the help given.

I would like to suggest, Mr. Speaker, and I do this only with the most kindly motives, that the very unfair criticism voiced by the hon. member for Scarborough West does both harm to the patient and their family. He stated no doctor has stayed at Smiths Falls for more than one-and-a-half years; of course he wants to blame this on the government. I wonder if he has ever thought criticism such as he voiced might well be far more responsible for this, than any policies of the department. I have heard good doctors and nurses say they would never work in a situation where they would be subject to such vicious and often unjustified criticism. Perhaps the hon. member should think of this.

Then I wonder if he ever thinks of the effect of his words on those parents who cannot visit and see their children as often as some others can. Does he not think his words may create, in their minds, grave questions and doubts and even fears for the safety and welfare of their children? Surely there are other ways the hon. member could use to rise to power than by exploiting human tragedy and misfortune, as he apparently is dedicated to doing.

I suggest to all hon. members, Mr. Speaker, that we leave the operation of special places like hospitals, reformatories and training schools, to those expert in such things and apply ourselves to the business of governing this province. I think too that hon. members should know that all the letters written about the hospital schools are not critical. I have had more letters of appreciation than I have had of any other kind.

The most recent is fairly typical. Since it is a personal letter, I cannot disclose the name of the writer, but here it is:

Both of us would like to thank you for your assistance in having our son admitted to the hospital school in Smiths Falls. We took him to the hospital on Thursday last and we both were very impressed with the way in which he was admitted and with the interest shown in him by the staff.

In discussing the admittance with the administration officer I learned a great deal about the hospital and was once again quite impressed with its magnitude and the manner in which it is run.

It is unfortunate that people have to become involved directly to discover what a service our government is continually providing for us. Naturally we were both apprehensive at leaving our son with strangers but this feeling soon disappeared when we had seen the ward in which he was to be placed and had spoken to the nurses in attendance.

I know it is not popular to talk of hospitals as industries but in a small semi-rural community such as Smiths Falls, the hospital school, while rendering a great service, is at the same time a very important part of the economy. It is the largest single employer of labour, having a staff in excess of 1,000 at all times. There are no shutdowns, no layoffs. The work goes on 24 hours of every day of every year and the annual payroll is $4,100,000. This has a great impact on my part of Ontario. This indeed, is very important to us.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, I do not want to repeat what has already been said and so I would say to you that I simply concur with all felicitations that have been extended to you in the dispatch of your duties.

Mr. Speaker, I want to embark upon an area which has caused me a great deal of concern over the past few months. I have been closely connected with this fraudulent situation and the people who have been taken by it. I have been in touch with my friend, the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) and he, in turn, has studied it very closely. I am sorry to see that he is not here this morning. No doubt he has other commitments, but perhaps he can read my speech in Hansard.

As a result of representations which I made to him and to other people, we had the anti-racket squad come into my area and investigate these particular charges and this particular situation to see if court action could be taken in such cases. As it turned out, court action has not been taken. Apparently these people to whom I make reference are operating just inside the boundaries of the law and court action was therefore not taken.

However, it is my firm belief that we have reached the time in this province when we must protect the public against what I might term the semi-underworld of fraudulent door-to-door selling practices. I say semi-underworld advisedly because there are, I know, thoroughly respectable and responsible salesmen going from door to door selling very good and worthwhile products. Certainly the honest and responsible salesman who takes the good products to the homes of the consumers and demonstrates them in their homes and in the comfort of the potential buyer's surroundings is to be desired and this is good.

However, I am not concerned with that. I am concerned with the other element in the field which, unchecked by our laws, continues to take ruinous advantage of the consumer and at the same time damages the reputations of respectable businesses and businessmen engaged in door-to-door selling. The kind of selling I am concerned with deals not with the normal exaggerations and minor inconsistencies, it deals with the complete misrepresentation of the product and the conditions under which it is sold. It concerns the fraudulent or near-fraudulent operations of companies involved in selling aluminum siding, pep pills, magazines, cookware, water softeners, and a number of other things, vacuum cleaners included, and so on. Let me interject at this point that not all salesmen of such products, as I have mentioned, operate in a high-pressure and what I might term ruthless manner; certainly there are a good number of them that do not, but a large number of them, on the other hand, do. We have only to look at the Globe and Mail of April 5, 1965, in which an article appeared, entitled "Charge Four Metro Men Over Aluminum Siding." The article says, in part:

Four Metro men are to appear in Kitchener magistrate's court on Thursday on charges of conspiracy to defraud the public. Led by Inspector James Erskine, police raided the offices of Reliable Home Improvements Company, and Central Aluminum Ltd., on Friday. Inspector Erskine said that police have been investigating sales of aluminum siding throughout Ontario for several months.

Another one, once again in the Globe and Mail of March 30, "Widow Lent $3,900, Fraud Trial Here":

An 82-year-old woman testified yesterday that she lent a total of $3,900 after buying an aluminum door and two aluminum windows and awnings for $359.50 from a man and a woman who called at her door.

The article goes on to explain the circumstances under which she bought it, and so on. And then another one, still in the Globe and Mail, April 6, 1965: "Lent $1,500, Got only $50 back—Indian, 84, tells Milton hearing."

An 84-year-old Indian chief bought $1,340 worth of aluminum windows and awnings for a frame house that had no electricity, no running water and was heated by a wood burning stove, Connie Port was told yesterday.

And so they go on and on, and undoubtedly there are a number of articles of a similar nature that have appeared in the newspapers over the past few months.

Such evidence, Mr. Speaker, is a grim reminder of what has been going on for a number of years and what is becoming, in my opinion, even more prevalent in the last two or three years. We have salesmen going throughout this province who are nothing but high-pressure purveyors of over-priced and shoddy merchandise. They memorize their sales pitches as movie stars memorize their lines, and they come into one's home and the potential buyer becomes a part of this whole affair by unconsciously mouthing words which have already been written for him.

Let me cite you a representative case of such a sales pitch and I beg the indulgence of the House while I refer to Pierre Berton's book, The Hard Sell. This particular case will not take very long, and I read it simply because it is representative of what has been going on and is continuing to go on throughout the province.

One evening in the Fall of 1959, Mrs. Donald Bant, a good-looking former model, newly arrived from England, received a telephone call at her home in Scarborough, a middle class suburb of Toronto. "Isn't this a beautiful evening, Mrs. Bant," said the cheerful voice, and Mrs. Bant had no idea he was reading from a script and that she was being sold a story. "I called you this evening to ask your help for a couple of questions," the man on the phone said, "but first I had better tell you whom I am with. This is the research division of International Health Products. We are the people who are introducing the fabulous new Health Maid electric servant, an entirely new concept in modern living. This revolutionary, new, all-purpose kitchen machine is not yet available to the public, Mrs. Bant. We are conducting this research programme as part of our educational programme in order to show some of the wonders of tomorrow and how the average Canadian family can have better nutrition and health from their food."

If Mrs. Bant had not been a newcomer to these shores, she would, in all likelihood, have hung up the phone at this point, instead she found herself nodding in agreement when the voice went on to say: "You are interested in better nutrition and health for your family, if it is possible to get it, aren't you, Mrs. Bant? Most people who think, are. Since you are interested in nutrition and health, Mrs. Bant, I would like to arrange an appointment to see this wonderful work- and time-saver and have you qualify for a chance to win one of these fabulous electric servants. In return, Mrs. Bant, all we ask is that after seeing this amazing machine you will fill out a simple questionnaire giving your honest opinions about it, and that is not asking too much, is it?"

So we see the circumstances being created for the sale. Mrs. Bant had been ill for some time, her husband was out of work, both were heavily committed to payments for household goods. She told the man that she could not afford to buy anything; he reassured her he was not selling anything, he was merely asking for opinions.

"This preview that you will be seeing is solely for research purposes, Mrs. Bant," he said. "We are not selling anything. Health is something you cannot sell but must be earned, so we are only interested in those people who have a desire to do something for themselves."

Mrs. Bant said she did not have much time.

"Well, Mrs. Bant," said the man on the phone, "we only have two things in life to spend—time and money—and if both of these things are not spent wisely, we can neither have health nor anything else for long. Isn't that true?"

He did not wait for Mrs. Bant to say whether it was true or not but plunged on: "For that reason, Mrs. Bant, it is really in your interests to take a few moments of your valuable time to see what we have. We will not try to sell you anything, I promise."

Mrs. Bant succumbed and presently a man named Mr. MacGregor arrived at the door. Mr. MacGregor said that he was deeply and sincerely interested in the health of the nation. He had a letter from his company whose office was identified as the Eglinton Health Centre, he read from the letter which bemoaned the fact that here we are living in the land of plenty with literally thousands of people suffering from malnutrition—the open door through which many other crippling diseases enter to destroy our health and rob us of our happiness.

He talked knowingly about recent surveys which proved that the majority of school children were not properly nourished, because they ate meagre breakfasts. All this, he said, could not be prevented by a few simple adjustments in eating habits. Mr. MacGregor stressed the importance of milk in the diet, explaining that it was the greatest nutritional source of calcium and protein, something most children were not getting in sufficient quantity. He was gathering opinions, he said, on a new form of powdered milk. He brought a package of the milk powder into the house and also a machine, which he said was necessary to mix the milk.

Mrs. Bant again explained that she could not afford to buy anything but Mr. MacGregor kept on insisting that he was not selling anything. He explained that the milk he was demonstrating was ten times better than milk available in the stores because of the process used to mix it.

And I am sure the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) would be interested in that.

He demonstrated the marvellous machine which liquefied, blended, ground, whipped, mixed and pulverized, not only milk powder but also vegetables, fruit, salad dressing, sauces, nuts, meats, cheese, cream, egg whites, baby food and dried peas. It was the world's most sensible kitchen aid, said the knowledgeable Mr. MacGregor.

Mrs. Bant said she could not afford to buy it. Mr. MacGregor again explained firmly that the machine was not for sale. He would like her to fill out a questionnaire, that was all, just a questionnaire. Mr. MacGregor turned to the subject of milk as an important nutritional aid and its cost to an average family. With two children, he said, Mrs. Bant must be paying $16 a month for milk; if she was not spending that much, he said, then her children were not getting enough calories. And Mr. MacGregor who was not selling anything reeled off some figures to prove his point.

"Why," said Mr. MacGregor, "you are spending $2,000 a decade on milk and all you have to show for it is a lot of empty milk bottles. If I were to hold in my left hand all the empty milk bottles you wash in a month, and in my right hand, I hope, the same amount of milk plus this wonderful machine, which hand would you think was of the greater value?"

Mrs. Bant was bewildered. She found herself saying "right hand." And hearing that, Mr. MacGregor said he wanted to ask her a very special question.

"If I could do something very special for you, would you do something very special for me in return?" It is a hard question to say "no" to. Mrs. Bant found herself nodding.

"It is obvious from your answer that you appreciate the importance of your family's health and realize it is something that must have proper care if you are to maintain it. Right? Frankly, there are just not enough people who appreciate this fact, but in introducing new health products, when we do find a family such as yours, we have something to offer them.

Now, if we are able to offer you one of these wonderful units as part of this programme without disturbing your weekly budget a penny, would you be interested?"

Mrs. Bant said that she supposed she would be. Mr. MacGregor then explained that because of her interest in her family's health, his company was prepared to supply her with powdered milk. She would pay no more for it than she was paying for ordinary milk for her family. Furthermore, the company would let her have the machine free if she promised to use it. Mrs. Bant's conscience had been stirred by all the talk of poor nutrition and the way the salesman put it, she did not see how she could lose. She said she would like to have time to think it over but Mr. MacGregor said, "Oh, that is impossible, the offer is only good for one evening."

Mrs. Bant asked, what would happen if her children did not like the milk. Mr. MacGregor replied that the company would take the machine back immediately. He had a form for her to sign. He said it was merely a routine matter but their lawyers insisted that they use it. Mrs. Bant, who thought she was getting a real bargain signed.

She signed up for 15 pounds of powdered skim milk and promised to make 19 payments of $16 each together with a down payment of another $16. In other words, she committed herself to a debt of $320. The form she signed was a promissory note.

The next day Mrs. Bant discovered that one of her children, who had a weak stomach, could not take the milk preparation. She also discovered powdered milk, when bought at a grocery store would cost her about $6 a month. She phoned International Health Products and tried to reach the salesman. He was not in. She left a message for him to call. He did not call. When after considerable difficulty she finally reached him, he told her she must make her child drink the milk.

She called the manager of International Health Products and asked him to take the milk and the machine back. She said she was willing to forego the down payment but wanted neither the milk nor the machine. The manager told her that she had signed a promissory note and was liable for more than $300. She could pay or go to court, he said. He advised her to get a loan somewhere.

Mrs. Bant said that in England, ethical companies took things back if the person was not satisfied. "Well, you are not in England now" said the manager, "things are done differently in Canada. Over here you don't believe anything unless it is written down and signed." She had signed the note, he explained, and she would have to pay it.

Mrs. Bant's husband took the machine back personally. The company representative refused to accept it. It was, he insisted, a secondhand machine now. He refused to give Mrs. Bant a receipt for it and so Mr. Bant took the machine home again.

When Mrs. Bant persisted in phoning again and again the company changed its tactics. It offered to sell her half the amount of milk contracted for, reduce her payments to $13.50 a month. Then it offered to suspend all powder shipments if she would make payments of $11 a month for the machine. But she must pay for the machine, the manager said, or she would be taken to court.

There was no further talk about the nutritional importance of the milk. And it dawned on Mrs. Bant that it was the machine and not the milk the salesman was really peddling. At $11 a month she was being charged about $220 for a combination blender, mixer and grinder, similar to those which retailed in department stores for less than $80.

Mrs. Bant made a final telephone call to International Health Products and was connected with a Mr. Keene. I listened to the conversation on an extension and it was a tough one. Mr. Keene told Mrs. Bant flatly that any arrangements the salesman makes will not stand up; that a man's word is something that is not accepted over here in Canada. And Mrs. Bant had signed a promissory note which in actual fact has nothing to do with the merchandise, it was a loan, and that she was leaving herself wide open to court action which would result in a garnishee of her wages. He said the court would order her to turn one-third of what she earned over to International Health Products and that "if you are out of work we will just watch you until you get a job. There are organizations which will track you down."

The story, of course, has no end. That is just one of them, and as I say, it is a fairly representative sample of what goes on. Certainly the book, The Status Seekers, written by Vance Packard, depicts much the same story throughout. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the case is well established that these people are operating for the most part just inside, the framework of the law. And it is very difficult to get a judgment against them in court.

If I may refer to my personal experiences for just a moment, I have had close to 14 cases involving aluminum siding in which the salesman is a very high-pressure man; he sells a buyer on the fact that this aluminum will be put on his home and his home is picked as a show place. The show place home is the only one, he is told, within a radius of 20 miles and if a neighbour drives by his home, sees the siding on this home and decides to buy some, then the original buyer will get $100 per sale knocked off his original price. This is the basis upon which these deals are made.

As a matter of fact, the deal is made to look so attractive that in the end the buyer feels that he can get the siding for almost nothing, and in some cases I have had people who told me they felt they could make money on the deal. To close out the transaction the salesman points out that in order to make everything proper, of course, the buyer will have to sign a little slip of paper. It is merely routine, there is nothing to it, it is just a formality that is required in order to keep the records straight.

The fact of the matter is that the sales contract is, in effect, a conditional sales contract, and in this conditional sales contract is included a promissory note which states that anything that has been said by the salesman is not binding in any way, shape or form on the company. In addition, this promissory note which I referred to earlier, is a note which usually sets out payments of principal and interest which in most cases extends over a period of 36 months.

To start with, the buyer has to pay at least twice as much as he should for the material. If the buyer were to go down to a local store which handled the same material, he would find that the price of that material was roughly half that the door-to-door salesman had offered it to him for. Secondly, the rate of interest is usually approximately 18 to 20 per cent, in some cases higher. As a result, the contract which was originally supposed to cost the buyer, well, let us say, $2,800, $2,900, $3,000 ends up costing him anywhere from $4,000 to $4,600.

This conditional sales contract is assignable; it can be taken by the original company with whom the buyer had done business and assigned to a finance company. I believe in legal terms that is what is called a "holder in due course." And in most cases this happens.

The aluminum siding company gets the promissory note and immediately goes over to the finance company and is paid the original amount of the contract and that is the end of the deal, as far as the original company is concerned in dealing with the buyer. The onus is then on the finance company to collect that money; the responsibility is on them and it is, in effect, resting with the third party at this point. The contract then becomes a partial mortgage made against the buyer's property. A situation is therefore created where the salesman can tell the buyer absolutely anything as long as he can make the sale—and they do tell them anything, just to make the sale, because it says right in the contract: "Anything the salesman says will not be binding on the company." So, how can you lose?

As I mentioned, attached to every sales contract is a promissory note. The promissory note is a negotiable piece of paper which may be sold, as I said, to a third party, and in some cases even to a fourth and a fifth party. The result, of course, is that the buyer is obliged under the law, to pay for the goods and the services that he may, in the meantime, have decided he does not want. If he does not want them because of one reason or another, maybe because of the cost, maybe because he feels that he has been taken in on the deal, maybe because he feels that the material is defective or fraudulent, for one reason or the other, if he decides he does not want it, in the interim, then he cannot do anything about it because it states right on the contract that if the buyer decides overnight he does not want it, he has to pay 50 per cent of the contract price. In other words, what I am saying is that if a buyer bought and signed a contract for $2,800 and that same night he talked it over with his wife and decided that he did not want the material, he would have to pay $1,400 and not have a thing to show for it.

The fact that the buyer is told that every sale made from his show home will reduce his initial price by $100, is certainly nothing more than a farce. The fact that this contract is assigned to the finance company without the buyer being told about it, to me is certainly misrepresentation to say the least. It must be considered that if the buyer had read the contract carefully, he would have realized this. I would be the first to admit it. If they had read the contract, most people certainly would have realized what they were getting into. But the fact of the matter is that in most cases the buyer does not read the contract because he is told it is a very routine thing, it does not really matter, it is just a matter of routine to make things proper and legal.

If I may refer for just a moment, Mr. Speaker, to Great Britain and their experience in this particular line, the fact that they had recognized even away back as far as 1938 that something should be done about this particular problem—something should be done in the way of consumer protection about this particular problem—is rather interesting and I think that we should take a lesson from them and perhaps study what they have done in this particular field over the years. They have had a great deal of experience with this kind of thing. They have coped with the problem by bringing in what is called The Hire-Purchase Act of, first of all, 1938. It was amended in 1954 and then it was amended again in 1964. I am convinced that in this province as well as in Great Britain, legislation is needed to supplement the efforts of municipalities to control door-to-door selling, through licensing.

This is to me, in reference to the British legislation, very successful and is eminently practical—legislation, which as I say, came into effect originally in 1938, amended in 1954 and then in 1964. The phrase "hire-purchase" is the British equivalent of the practice so well known here as the conditional sales contract. As I have pointed out, a conditional sales contract has a useful and responsible place in everyday business. It is the main instrument whereby we use our credit to buy goods and services that we cannot afford at that particular time and, as I say, it is a very useful instrument when it is in the right hands. But in the cases of unscrupulous operators, and businessmen, it can become a vicious instrument whereby it so often happens that the majesty of the law is twisted to the purpose of what amounts to extortion.

The Hire-Purchase Act in Great Britain does not eliminate the conditional sales contract as such, nor would it eliminate the use of promissory notes. But it does do what I consider to be two very valuable things. Let me outline the main provisions of the British Act, emphasize the two points which I consider to be the most important.

In the new British Act, the protection against unscrupulous door-to-door salesmen is what is called a "cooling off" period of up to four days, during which time the consumer has the right to cancel the conditional sales contract or agreement that he signed at his or her home. The customer must be given one copy of the agreement when it is signed and another copy must be sent to him by mail. Both copies must contain, in red, notices prescribed by regulations, explaining the right of cancellation and when to exercise it, giving the name and address to which a notice of cancellation can be sent. The notice of cancellation must be sent in before the end of the third day after the day on which the customer receives the second copy of the agreement. After the customer cancels the agreement, any deposit or any down payment that he has made up until that point, must be returned to him.

This right of cancellation, to my mind, is the most important provision in this Act. It allows time for second thought. Without exception, the people with whom I have dealt over the past few months have called up the company that very night, and said "I do not want anything to do with this. I really do not think I should have signed up for this. I have changed my mind," and the company has said, "I am sorry, you have signed the contract, we are going to have to go ahead with it, if you do not want the siding you have to pay 50 per cent of the face value of the contract, so take your choice." Of course, in most cases, the buyer goes ahead and says, "Well it is better to have the siding and pay an exorbitant price for it than to have to pay 50 per cent of the contract price and have nothing to show for it," and so he goes ahead.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Were these all the same company?

Mr. Gaunt: No, they were not.

Mr. Reilly: They all requested 50 per cent?

Mr. Gaunt: That is right, yes they did.

To my mind, this particular piece of legislation protects the consumer against the psychological deceit practised by the high pressure salesman and conversely, it does not have any effect on transactions where the purchaser really wants to buy, and the vendor sells the goods fairly and honestly.

Now, the other provision of the Act is one which will, I am sure, commend itself to every hon. member of the House. We all know of the multitude of cases, maybe some of us have been taken in ourselves, where the purchaser has taken the salesman's word for it; the salesman has said that these goods are guaranteed, he has said that they come up to a certain standard as far as quality is concerned and a number of other things, all things for which we tend to take the salesman's word and tend to believe him; and often we find that it just is not so and we have been led down the garden path.

However, in Britain the British Act solved this little problem, simply by stipulating that any commitment made either orally or in writing by a door-to-door salesman is absolutely binding on the company he is working for, notwithstanding what he has said when he was in the house and was talking with you or with your wife or with both of you. So, what the salesman says in your home is absolutely binding on the company. And you may say to me, "Well, that is all well and good but how can you enforce a piece of legislation such as this?" I would agree that there would be a problem here to enforce the kind of thing I have mentioned, however, let me point out that it would be the salesman's word against the purchaser's word and the kind of salesman we are talking about I am sure would not be against perjuring himself. This is a problem. There is no question about it and I am sure they have recognized it in England.

Nonetheless, in most cases, the salesman talks to the husband and I would say in most cases, the wife, and so there are two of them there to hear the story and two of them there to verify the story in court if this particular affair were to go that far.

Even if it would be difficult to enforce the provision I am sure it would go a long way to prevent the kind of misrepresentation which is all too common in door-to-door selling. It would be a form of deterrent, in any case.

I read the British legislation and I have read the basis in Westminster when the bill was presented and I am glad to see that at this point my friend the hon. Attorney General is in the House because he has talked with me about this and we are both very interested in it. As far as I am concerned the debates in Westminster that took place at that time were models of clarity and good sense. Both had the effect of increasing the citizen's liberty, to my mind, in an age when that liberty seems to be suffering from increasing erosion.

It might be interesting for a moment to read from the parliamentary debates of the British House of Commons when the Secretary of State for Industry, Trade and Regional Development and the president of the Board of Trade, Mr. Edward Heath, said in relation to the hire-purchase bill on second reading—and I am going to read the portions from his remarks at that time, that relate to what I have been saying. Mr. Heath says—and I quote from the debate of February 18, 1964:

Mr. Heath: The next change to mention, simple though it is, will help to avoid hardship in those cases in which a man or woman commits himself, or herself, to a hire-purchase agreement without realizing what he or she is doing.

The Molong committee was very concerned about this and suggested that the hire signature to the agreement should have to be in a special place, a box clearly marked, with clear words to warn him that if he signs he was offering to commit himself to a hire-purchase transaction. This we have provided for him. It was also strongly urged in another place that the consumer would understand his commitment better if it were plainly set out.

I will confess that the government had doubts about this which is why it was not embodied in the bill in the first place. We felt that the risk of creating consumer safeguards was that they became so complex that they would confuse the consumer and thus defeated their own purpose. Under the existing provisions of the 1938 Act the consumer already receives a copy of the hire-purchase credit sales agreement after it has been completed. The case for another statutory copy is fairly evenly divided. That was our conclusion on weighing up the argument.

Interjection by Mr. Dan Jones (Burnley): How could another copy lead to confusion?

Mr. Heath: We felt that it would lead to confusion in circumstances in which it would often be given but we felt that the argument was evenly balanced that it would be right to provide that each should receive a copy of what he signs immediately even if it is only an offer. This is now embodied in the bill.

Another new safeguard which in principle is simple is that the consumer shall have the opportunity to reflect and change his mind if he so desires if he signs the agreement at any place other than trade premises and I think that is a very important statement: If he signs the agreement at any other place other than trade premises. This means any place except premises where goods of this sort are normally sold or offices of finance houses.

The House will appreciate that this new safeguard is aimed at the door-to-door salesman who puts pressure, perhaps undue pressure on customers in their own homes and induces them to sign binding agreements.

I simply make reference to this and urge my hon. friend to look over the legislation. We have the law reports here in which mention is made of the hire-purchase agreements and certainly these are given quite a lengthy dissertation in the public general Acts and measures of 1957 so I would urge that my hon. friend look them over and study them to see if he does not concur with what they have been trying to do.

I am sure that hon. members of the House would agree that such legislation is absolutely necessary and could be remarkably simple to my mind. I think it should be done very simply and it would be simple in its application. I cannot think of any reason why comparable legislation such as I have mentioned cannot be introduced in this province. Certainly the reasons for enacting such legislation are both many and obvious.

As a result, Mr. Speaker, I urge the present government to examine closely The Hire-Purchase Act of Great Britain and move toward similar legislation in this province. If they do so, they will certainly have the gratitude of the people of Ontario, I am sure.

In summation of this particular point I am urging the government to enact legislation comparable to The Hire-Purchase Act of Great Britain as amended in 1964 to deal specifically with two areas: First of all, the right of cancellation, and I have explained the details surrounding this and the fact that a copy of the cancellation notice must be sent before the end of the third day after the day on which the customer receives the second copy of the agreement, and the other point—the fact that the salesman's word is binding on the company, notwithstanding what is in the sales contract.

Now, without exception, as I mentioned before, the people with whom I have dealt with over the past few months have said to me that when they have had second thoughts—when the salesman has left and they have a chance to think it over in the quietness of their own home—they have come to the conclusion that they do not want any part of the deal they have made, and in most cases they have phoned up and said that they are sorry and do not want this particular material. As I mentioned before the company simply says that if they do not want it they will have to pay 50 per cent of the contract price in any case so they might as well take it. So, of course, as I said before, they do take it and go along with it and have to pay about twice as much for the product as if they had gone down and bought it in the local store.

The whole approach with a lot of these door-to-door salesmen is to sell the story and not the merchandise. I think this becomes clearer all the time. Such legislation would not be as encompassing as the hire-purchase legislation in Great Britain because there are many other provisions in the hire-purchase agreement in Great Britain that I have not mentioned. However, I feel that this would be a start and certainly a big step in the right direction in thwarting these door-to-door salesmen and thwarting the people who actually misrepresent the company and the product and get these people into what I would consider most unfortunate circumstances.

The one thing that is not affected is the deal which is made by a corporate body. A corporate body is not affected by this particular piece of legislation. However, what we propose would only apply to door-to-door salesmen and, I stress this again, would only apply if the door-to-door salesman sold the goods in the buyer's own home or premises. It would not apply if the buyer went downtown and bought something in Simpson's. Then it does not apply at all. It only applies to the man who comes into the premises of the buyer and tries to sell merchandise of one sort or another.

Once again I urge the hon. Attorney General to read the debates and the revised Acts of 1964 where he might obtain guidance in drawing up an Act of a similar nature which would do the things that I have suggested.

Mr. Speaker, I have come to the conclusion of one portion of my remarks and I am wondering, due to the fact that it is 1 o'clock, if I should carry on.

Mr. Gaunt moves adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will proceed with the estimates. There will be night sittings on Tuesday and Thursday nights and the order of estimates will be, after The Department of Economics and Development, The Department of Highways and thereafter The Department of the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, MAY 3, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the east gallery, the Junior Civics club from Chatham secondary schools; and in the west gallery, Richmond Hill public school and M. L. McConaghy school.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I have three questions that I would like to address to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett).

Is the hon. Minister aware of the threat to the control of water levels in the Grand River due to the reported weakness developing in the privately owned dam at Caledonia?

Has the government a programme whereby special assistance could be provided to the Grand Valley conservation authority in acquiring this dam; and is there a possibility of enlisting federal support in the project similar to the case of the dam at Dunnville?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes. From our cursory inspection, the dam did not appear to be in any immediate danger. The conservation authority branch is planning on making a more thorough investigation as soon as conditions permit.

The answer to the second question is yes. Under present policy, provincial assistance is available to the Grand Valley conservation authority for acquiring dams.

The answer to the third question is no. This is a privately owned dam, whereas the Dunnville dam was owned and operated by the federal government.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Minister would permit me, could he tell the House when their previous inspection was made?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I cannot answer that. I have a report—I think it came to my desk about 30 days ago—but I do not know whether it was made this spring or last fall.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) begs leave to present to the House the following reports:

1. Sixty-fourth annual report of the Ontario Northland transportation commission, for the year ended December 31, 1964.

2. Eighth report of Ontario parks integration board, for the period ending December 31, 1964.

THE HIGHWAY TRAFFIC ACT

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport) moves second reading of Bill No. 115, An Act to amend The Highway Traffic Act.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): It is not in our book.

Clerk of the House: It has been in since last Friday.

Mr. Singer: It is not in this book.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): It is not in mine.

Mr. Singer: It is not in my hon. leader's book.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): We are really seeking to get this bill in front of the committee meeting tomorrow. It is made up of a series of sections. There is no basic principle running through the whole bill. The committee on highway matters is meeting tomorrow and we want to refer the bill there today so the committee may deal with it.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, we will agree if, when it comes back from committee, there will be an opportunity to debate it then in principle.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The sixteenth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS AND DEVELOPMENT

On vote 407:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister if he took care of the three situations that I presented to him last day? The one that is of particular interest to me was the Tom Griffin case.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Yes, I have that here. You gave us three cases, the first was Mrs. Jean Couvillon.

Mr. Newman: There is one in which I am primarily interested.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I will have that also. We have no application from her at all. We are having it checked out by the housing authority to find how we can help her.

Second one was Tom Griffin, and the Windsor housing authority does not have any application from this family either, so we are following that one up.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Minister, he does not live in the city of Windsor. He lives in one of the suburbs.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I appreciate that. We are trying to see if we can help him.

Mr. Newman: May I inform the hon. Minister then that the man, I think, has already been evicted. I have been in touch with the St. Vincent de Paul society in an attempt to have the children taken care of, while his wife, who is expecting—

Hon. Mr. Randall: He will be evicted today, I understand, May 3, and we have got it marked urgent, so they are on it right now.

Mr. Newman: May I then ask the hon. Minister to amend The Housing Act to permit, in senior citizens' housing, individuals that have unusual circumstances? For example, in my own community there is a married lady who is totally blind and has a seeing eye dog. This is the first time in the history of my community that an individual has had the advantage of a seeing eye dog, and because of the dog she finds it practically impossible to get housing accommodation. Were she allowed to go into one of these senior citizens projects—the motel style of accommodation—this would accommodate her very well. I know that the provisions preclude her admittance in there, but I think an exception could be made under a condition such as this.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Would you let me have the name and address and we will take it into consideration?

Mr. Newman: May I advise the hon. Minister that this has been brought to the attention of the authorities back home for quite a while, but I will present it to you.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, on Thursday, I think it was, when we were discussing this vote previously, I asked the hon. Minister a question with regard to the item of $470,000 described as net subsidies. There were a number of questions I asked which the hon. Minister answered, but there was one for which he did not have the information at the time—that was whether any of that figure is for projects in contemplation, as distinct from ones to which the corporation had already been committed in the past. I was wondering if the hon. Minister has that information now.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, I have. The gross subsidy was a total of $600,000, and the subsidy existing from the original federal-provincial housing arrangement was $240,000, and the new subsidy for the 1964-65 year was $360,000, making a total of $600,000. From this were recoveries from other operations, such as the sale of land no longer useable, and administration fees paid to us by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation of $130,000, and that brought the net subsidy to $470,000. Does that answer your question?

Mr. Bryden: I think so, yes.

Vote 407 agreed to.

On vote 408:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I do not have last year's estimate book in front of me, but as I recall it, the comparable figure for advances for housing projects was something like $6 million. I wonder if the hon. Minister could advise as to how much of that $6 million was actually spent.

Hon. Mr. Randall: In the year 1964-65, there will be $2,429,000 spent.

Mr. Bryden: Out of the $6 million?

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is right.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman, what basis have we for believing that $9.75 million is going to be required this year?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We have already committed ourselves for $4 million plus $3.5 million. We know that is going to be spent. We have already contracted and committed for that, for the 10,000 housing units I was talking about.

Mr. Bryden: That is going to be the amount of the hon. Minister's advances?

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is the amount out of the $90 million that we have already committed ourselves to spend.

Mr. Bryden: And that represents ten per cent of the investment in those—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Of the $90 million, which is ten per cent from us and 90 per cent from the federal government.

Mr. Bryden: Does the hon. Minister expect that these units will be completed during the course of the current fiscal year?

Hon. Mr. Randall: On the basis of our commitments—we are on schedule now—we hope that we are going to continue the schedule. If we do, we will use up those funds.

Mr. Bryden: Then there is another $2 million as a sort of a margin; is that the purpose of it as far as the hon. Minister is concerned—in case there are other projects he would want to participate in?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, it is for that, and also for other purposes that that $2 million will be used up.

Vote 408 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF HIGHWAYS

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is fitting for me to say, after the experience of last Thursday night, we thought that we could count on a few minutes more time than we were really allowed.

I should like to say to you, sir, and to the House, that the reaching of a new plateau in the integration of the overall road network of Ontario was one of the most significant achievements of The Department of Highways for the province as a whole in the 1964-65 fiscal year. The substantial progress made in this respect, notably in the field of more advanced planning study techniques—about which I shall speak in some detail later—was a further development of the total roads concept which guides the department in its planning procedures and construction programmes.

As some of you will no doubt recall, I spelled out this concept in presenting last year's estimates to the House and have repeated it on many occasions. To put the concept in capsule form, it is that all road mileage in Ontario, wherever it may be—and regardless of the jurisdiction responsible for it—forms part of the whole.

As would be expected in view of the department's record budget for the year just ended, a new high was made in terms of the amount of construction carried out as King's highway projects. Because each hon. member was given early in January a copy of a ten-page report on some of the highlights of work done by the department in 1964, I am—with a few valid and necessary exceptions—going to forego a review of this type, impressive as the tabulation is. Instead, I propose to give a few statistics which, by themselves, readily establish the great volume of work either completed or in progress during the past year. Before the end of the 1964 calendar year some 460 miles of paving and more than 60 structures were completed on King's highways. In addition, asphalt paving of another 224 miles and 46 additional miles of concrete paving on King's highways was in progress. Work was also under way on no less than 94 structures.

That, I submit, is truly a formidable volume of highway improvement for any jurisdiction, anywhere.

On the Trans-Canada highway route, for example, the work in progress at various points amounted to more than 185 miles. Over and above construction at this pace, the King's highway system grew by some 135 miles through the assumption of sections of road as either a King's highway or secondary highway.

Because of its importance to the economy of the province as a whole and because it serves directly a very considerable proportion of the total population of Ontario, I am going to speak specifically about the Macdonald-Cartier freeway for a moment.

It goes without saying, of course, that it would be impossible to satisfy some critics, no matter how much was accomplished in any one year. However, most people would agree, I believe, that the more than 90 miles of additional lanes placed in service on the Macdonald-Cartier freeway in 1964, plus the opening of a new eight-mile section—with all four lanes in service—ending near the Quebec border, is not too bad for one construction season!

It is interesting to note that the 100-miles-plus of new pavement opened to traffic on the Macdonald-Cartier freeway were divided almost exactly between eastern and western Ontario. By virtue of the excellent progress made, there remained, as of early December, less than 20 miles of the freeway in western Ontario with only two lanes, namely, from east of the interchange for Kent centre—which serves as the eastern access for Chatham—easterly to the Kent-Elgin county line. Over the whole of this distance, moreover, grading was completed and most of the granular base laid, before the winter weather forced a halt. As a result it will be possible to make an early start in 1965 on paving these few remaining miles.

All this did not come about by chance, mere good luck, or exceptionally favourable weather. Rather, it was made a possibility only because of the acceleration of the programme—first in 1963 and then a further acceleration in 1964—to add the extra lanes from one end of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway to the other as rapidly as possible, having in mind, of course, the total highway improvement requirements all over the province. As a result of this acceleration, the expenditure for projects on this freeway in the 1964-65 fiscal year—excluding work done on the Toronto by-pass—rose to $14.8 million, as against a planned expenditure of $7 million originally scheduled. Only through this doubling of money spent was the department enabled to open so much more new mileage. To come down to figures, some 65 miles of additional lanes were placed in service because of this double-barrelled stepping up. Again, let me point out, the benefits of the speed-up were equitably distributed in western and eastern Ontario.

Thanks to the acceleration of work on the Macdonald-Cartier freeway, the department is in a much more favourable position when it comes to the paving of additional two-lane mileage in 1965, so that some mileage to be placed in service this year will be opened much earlier than would have been possible if the original schedule had been followed.

Some hon. members, I am sure, will be reassured to learn that the pronounced stepping-up in 1963 and 1964 in the tempo to complete additional lanes, and open entirely new sections of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway, did not suffer because of the separate project to reconstruct and widen the most critical sections of the Toronto bypass. This is one of the largest and most intricate undertakings we have in progress, and I am happy to report that construction is right on schedule and, in the case of some contracts, ahead of schedule.

People who are away from the scene of this massive assault for any length of time are amazed at what has been accomplished in their absence.

Building a 12-lane freeway is in itself a formidable engineering feat, but building such a highway on the site of an existing four-lane facility which is already heavily overloaded, and keeping four lanes open for traffic at all times, is a unique accomplishment, probably without precedent in the history of highway construction. The reconstruction is going on without causing undue inconvenience to users of the road.

We have completed the paving of 12 lanes between Hogg's Hollow and Avenue Road, and by this fall we will have completed the paving of 12 lanes between Hogg's Hollow and Highway 400. This six-mile section of 12-lane highway will then be opened for traffic.

One of the biggest jobs in the project is the Spadina interchange. Seventeen bridges are completed and nine are under construction and will be completed this spring. The entire interchange will be completed in 1966.

This year we will let contracts for the extension of the widening programme from Yonge Street to Bayview Avenue, from Bayview Avenue to Leslie Street and from Leslie Street to the Don Valley expressway—on the easterly section of the bypass—and from Wendell Avenue to Weston Road, and Weston Road to west of Islington Avenue, on the westerly section.

In the first year of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway reconstruction and widening, the cost was $8,501,909. In the last fiscal year the total cost was $16,963,393 and in the fiscal

Another reconstruction and widening programme in the Metro Toronto area which will be launched in the near future is the widening of Highway 27 between the Macdonald-Cartier freeway and the Queen Elizabeth way. This is virtually a part of the Toronto bypass system which must be expanded to handle existing traffic and the increased traffic of the future. Highway 27 will be widened to six lanes, three in either direction and the existing service roads will become one-way two-lane roads.

There will be new interchanges at No. 5 Highway, the Queensway, the QEW and Evans Avenue, and new interchanges will have to be built on the QEW at Kipling and Islington Avenues. The interchange at the Queen Elizabeth way will provide direct high-speed movement between Highway 27 and the QEW, thus eliminating what is probably the worst bottleneck in our highway system. Tenders for the start of this work will be let in the 1966-67 fiscal year.

With the needs for expanded road facilities growing ever greater all over the province, and for all types of roads—both those under the jurisdiction of the department, and those for which the municipalities are responsible—the necessity for a more comprehensive approach to road planning, at every level of government, is becoming more and more obvious. In order to cope with this problem in the most effective way possible, the fullest co-operation of the municipalities—working more closely with The Department of Highways than ever before—is imperative.

In that connection, I mentioned specifically in my opening remarks the substantial progress the department has made in the field of more advanced planning study techniques, and indicated that I would refer to this matter later on, which I now propose to do.

The trail which The Department of Highways has blazed in Canada—and, in some respects, on the North American continent—in the sphere of “needs studies” is by now widely recognized by a large number of people, and the number continues to grow impressively. I shall here only mention the two initial ones, namely, A Plan for Ontario Highways, dating back to 1957, closely followed by the publishing of the findings of the companion study, Ontario's Roads and Streets.

Those two studies were the forerunner of a new type of study which the department has had underway for almost three years now, namely, area planning studies. For this purpose, the province has been divided into 19 areas which, in total, cover every part of Ontario through which a King's or secondary highway passes.

The first of these, known as the Niagara peninsula planning study, has recently been completed and presented to the local authorities concerned; eight other similar studies are in progress. The second study, identified as the London area study and covering some 3,700 square miles, is now close to completion.

It is indicative of the progressive procedures adopted by the department that, to the best of our knowledge, no other highway jurisdiction anywhere in North America has as yet carried out studies which compare in scope with these area planning studies. That is to say, where as many different factors are being taken into account, where the approach to the problem is as broad, the examination equally as exhaustive and the data compiled so massive, yet detailed in analysis.

In fact, had it not been for the advent of the electronic computer—in the application of which, by the way, this department has led the way—and the adaptation of the study techniques so that the data thus gathered could be efficiently processed and analyzed by electronic computation by the department, such a type of study would have been impossible only a few short years ago. Long before the data could be analyzed by conventional methods, the picture would have changed so drastically that the findings would be of little, if any, value.

A most significant difference between these radical area planning studies and the two needs studies to which I have referred is that in the earlier studies, the attention was focused on examining and making an inventory of the existing facilities—both their condition and capacity—and the demands being placed upon these roads and streets, whereas in the new type of approach the emphasis is on finding out where people are heading, why and by what route.

The most satisfactory way to get such answers is to make “origin-destination surveys” and, in each area study as many as 100,000 people are interviewed, both on the road and in their homes, the Niagara peninsula study—the pilot study—being the only one in which home interviewing was not done. While the department has been carrying out origin-destination surveys for many years now, these area planning studies are the first in which such surveys have been done on an area basis, and here again is a most important new dimension for the new type of study.

In addition to the origin-destination surveys, traffic counts, road inventories, land use, speed and functional planning studies make their contribution to the overall examination. It is significant that all types of road are considered, the only exceptions being roads in the larger urban centres, where we rely on the municipalities themselves to collect the data required in carrying out their own urban transportation studies. Centres of population have the greatest influence on travel patterns, and I am pleased to say that we have worked closely with the municipalities to obtain the best possible information and, at the same time, to co-ordinate their road plans and needs with the proposed future road network resulting from each area study.

Essentially, the critical factor is the origin-destination surveys which form the basis for estimating the actual travel demands of the motoring public. Each area study shows, in broad terms, the best location for King's highways, and determines the respective functions of other roads in the area. As well, it establishes a priority and staging schedule, with estimated costs.

Through the area planning studies The Department of Highways has placed a magnifying glass on the overall road requirements of the region embraced in each study in a way which has never been done before, as far as we are aware. The research preceding the inauguration of this unique type of road system examination, and the invaluable knowledge already gained in conducting the pioneer ones, signals a most significant extension of this department's well-established and clearly defined objective of integrating all road mileage in the province, so that each component will provide the maximum level of service and make the greatest possible contribution to the growth and prosperity of both that particular region and Ontario as a whole.

While on the subject of planning for present and future road requirements on an area basis—as opposed to regarding a particular project as a single entity in itself—it is pertinent to comment on one of the forthcoming urban controlled-access expressway projects. I refer to the Lakehead expressway for Port Arthur-Fort William and the immediate vicinity, toward which the department is contributing 75 per cent of the cost for property acquisition, construction and maintenance. I mention this one—from among several similar urban controlled-access expressways which will shortly become a reality, with the department contributing on equally generous terms—because it illustrates so well the breadth of the department's approach to the problems besetting many urban municipalities with heavy traffic volumes.

The total mileage embraced in the overall Lakehead expressway plan is no less than 32 miles! Much of this is beyond the limits of either city, and these sections will be constructed as King's highway projects. Now, this particular expressway plan is extremely indicative to me of just how far the department has advanced in implementing a "total roads concept." Here is a case where we examined the road requirements of a given area, involving two cities and the adjoining townships, and then came up with an overall plan calling for 32 miles of controlled-access construction which was mutually acceptable to the parties concerned, at least to the extent that all parties to any agreement may be expected to agree fully in all respects. That type of achievement, I say, Mr. Chairman, represents remarkable progress in joint planning on the part of the department and the municipalities.

Lest anyone assume that the present vanguard position of The Department of Highways in the realm of planning has been attained only in comparatively recent times, I would draw to the attention of the hon. members that as late as last month a senior official of the United States bureau of roads noted that, some 25 years ago, the Queen Elizabeth way was, at that time, the only highway in existence in North America having limited access in rural areas. Accordingly, a quarter of a century ago, the bureau used it as a model or guide in establishing standards for rural controlled-access highways.

In assessing the needs for all types of road in totality in this province at any given time—that is, both the need to expand existing ones and the construction of wholly new facilities—The Department of Highways takes into account a great many considerations. If some of these are not actually unique to Ontario alone, they at least present themselves in a most forceful way.

There is, on the one hand, the special case of what the planners refer to as metropolitan areas. The fact that more than 25 per cent of all motor vehicles in Ontario are registered in Metropolitan Toronto—some 583,000 out of a total of more than 2,260,000, in round figures, at the end of 1963—tells its own story. However, there are many more concentrations of population adjacent to other cities which create most urgent demands for new road construction. Some which come to mind are: Ottawa, Sudbury, Hamilton, Kitchener-Waterloo, London and Windsor.

On the other hand, there are the rural areas, with their legitimate requirements for road improvement. In today's competitive conditions, the farmer, equally, needs good roads for the economical transport of goods—both those he produces and those he consumes. Indeed, it has been proven that the rural and urban segments of our population complement each other, from which it follows that one is dependent upon the other for prosperity. To put it another way, we could ask the question, What makes more for a prosperous rural economy than a buoyant urban area adjacent to it? Good roads to link the two in such an ideal relationship are an absolute necessity.

For the sake of brevity, I shall interject here only two of the ways in which the department has taken a most aggressive position in order to ensure that special supplementary help will be given where needed in the case of rural roads. Outstanding, of course, has been the direct aid under the development road programme—on a 100-cents-on-the-dollar basis—for the reconstruction of designated county and township roads—the only exemptions being any necessary property purchases and fencing. To date the department has paid outright for the reconstruction of more than 4,720 miles of road since the inception of the programme. In addition, work is in progress or scheduled to begin this year on some 502 miles of road, and, as well, 206 miles have been designated for pre-engineering, for which the department also pays.

The second example of aid for rural roads which I wish to cite was the announcement early in 1963 of higher rates of subsidy for townships in cases of demonstrated need. Some 200 townships have benefited from the more generous levels of assistance resulting—the amount of such additional aid being determined on the basis of a formula evolved expressly for the purpose by the department's municipal roads division. As I made clear at the time, we are prepared to consider the subsidy rate of any township on request and—if our investigation shows a change to be warranted—to adjust the rate.

In the total planning problem the sparsely settled parts of this far-flung province must also be taken into consideration in any well-integrated master plan. In this regard we find the department again pursuing a comprehensive programme to add new roads and to improve existing ones along several different lines. In the case of existing roads, significant improvements have been made—and will continue to be—under the development road programme. Several highways in some of the more remote regions have been added to the King's highway system in recent years as tertiary roads—known as the 800 series. Considerably more mileage has been placed in service as sections of a secondary highway, in which the roads-to-resources programme has figured prominently in northern and northwestern Ontario.

Still another measure of new aid for road construction in some of the less heavily populated areas of Ontario was extended in 1964 through the enactment of The Local Roads Boards Act which enables the formation—where desired—of a local roads board in place of a statute labour board. Because I have already commented in the House on this more advanced method of providing assistance at a higher level of contribution—specifically, a two-for-one basis, and even higher, in certain cases—for road work carried out by a local roads board, compared with the dollar-matching basis applicable to statute labour boards, I do not propose to go into detail here on this subject. However, I am pleased to report that to date some 32 meetings have been held in various parts of the province with a view to forming the new type of board, that five have already been established, and that 23 petitions to authorize the formation of additional ones are now being reviewed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss briefly the county needs study. It was because of the demonstrated concern of The Department of Highways that all roads in the total road network of the province should make their maximum individual contribution that we called upon each county council in the summer of 1963 to carry out a needs study, to be subsidized by the department at the rate of 50 per cent, including consultants retained for the purpose. As stated at that time, the purpose was to bring up to date the inventory and other data compiled in an earlier study by the department—the report of which was published in 1959 as Ontario's Roads and Streets—which had included an appraisal of the county road systems generally and their relationship to the overall road requirements of the province.

Since that time, many of the county road systems have changed noticeably, due to higher standards of construction necessary to handle greatly increased traffic in some instances, changing traffic patterns, the effects of annexation and other causes.

In extending every assistance to the counties for the carrying out by them of these needs studies, the department recommended certain criteria to be used as guides in determining what constitutes a desirable county road system. The criteria, I might say, were based upon the recommendations of my county engineers advisory committee. Reduced to non-technical terms and factors, the criteria provide meaningful direction for the establishing of county road systems which will perform these functions:

1. Connect towns and villages to each other and to the King's highway system.
2. Provide in each instance a county system which both meets and will serve to foster economic development and, as well, handles suitably traffic demands within a county.
3. Provide county road service in suburban areas where this is warranted by traffic volumes, including, where necessary, connections to King's highways.

Generally speaking, the essential purpose of the criteria is to guide all concerned in the development of an adequate network of county roads and/or King's highways in terms of actual traffic demands, but without regard to population density in any given area.

The current and much more highly detailed inventory and other data which has been so carefully compiled in the county needs study will enable us to establish what additional assistance the counties now require over and above the amount they can raise through a reasonable mill levy; the difference between this and what is required for a satisfactory county road system will determine the extent of additional financial aid which should be provided by The Department of Highways over and above by-law expenditure.

Such supplementary aid will be extended through the development road programme. The county needs study will be, obviously, invaluable to the department in making the most equitable distribution of the funds available for direct aid, or development road, purposes. In other words, we will be able to determine—on the basis of the facts thus gathered—precisely what is required in terms of funds for the legitimate needs of the county road authorities. However, Mr. Chairman, it seems no more than sensible to say here that we will not always be able to provide for all the wants!

It is pertinent, I think, to note here that adjustments in the rate of subsidy to certain townships in cases of demonstrated need, pursuant to the new subsidy formula announced in 1963—a supplementary type of aid which I have previously covered—together with the implementation of the county needs study, will result in still greater emphasis on development road assistance to the counties.

Indicative of the ever-increasing scale on which supplementary assistance is being extended to counties and townships in the form of direct aid under the development road programme is the record figure of $17 million which has been budgeted for this purpose in the table of expenditures for the forthcoming year which I shall present in a moment. This most substantial sum represents an increase of almost $2 million over the amount budgeted last year which, again, represented a new high.

During the past few minutes I have dealt with some of the varied aspects of the total planning problem which confronts the department. There are, as I have said, the pressing needs of the urban municipalities and, in a more particular way, the metropolitan areas, equally, rural needs must be given proper attention and, as well—in still a different category—those of the more sparsely settled parts of the province.

Beyond these challenges, however, is an entirely separate one which makes the matter of planning enormously more complex. It is the unusual circumstance that in Ontario motorists make use of the King's highways, that is our primary highways, to an extent not even approached in any other province.

In 1963, the latest year for which figures from all the provinces were available for the necessary calculations, total travel on our King's highways alone—not counting secondary highways or tertiary roads—was more than 8,080 million vehicle miles, which represents 16 per cent—and I repeat, 16 per cent—of all the mileage travelled on all highways, roads and streets in Canada that year. This somewhat astonishing concentration of the total mileage travelled in Canada on the slightly less than 9,800 miles of King's highways in service in 1963 can be convincingly translated in another way: The province of Quebec was the only one where the total mileage travelled on all roads—all roads in the province of Quebec—was greater than the total on our King's highways alone! In several cases the total for the King's highways was more than twice the provincial total!

For the record, the 8,080 million vehicle miles travelled on King's highways alone in 1963 represented slightly more than 40 per cent of the total mileage travelled in Ontario in that year, a percentage that has not changed much for some years now.

In this connection I think it is interesting to note that the almost 9,800 miles of King's highways—that is, our top category mileage in the provincial system—in service in 1963 accounted for just under one quarter of the total primary or highest class of highway in each province for the whole of Canada, being far ahead in this respect. In terms of paved mileage, the King's highways were and are in an equally favourable position, the paved mileage on our King's highways by themselves being equivalent to more than 29 per cent of the total paved mileage on all primary highways in Canada under the jurisdiction of provincial highway departments in 1963. The only province, again, which comes close to approaching these figures is Quebec where, according to the statistics made available to us for this purpose, their percentage was just over 19 per cent of the total.

In still another regard, the matter of the number of miles of multi-lane, divided highway with full control of access, the King's highways are in a class by themselves. As of the end of 1964 there were some 395 miles of this standard in service in Ontario as King's highway mileage, this figure being more than two-thirds of the total such mileage forming part of the provincial highway systems in the whole of Canada, which was approximately 590 miles. So I repeat, if I may, out of a total of 590 miles in Canada, 395 miles of this standard are in the province of Ontario.

The dimensions of the problem facing the department in trying to reconcile in the annual budget each year a programme which will take into consideration the various types of needs I have outlined and still make sufficient provision for absolutely essential expansion of the primary routes within the King's highway system should, I believe, be apparent to anyone who will realistically weigh the evidence I have given. The budget I am about to present has been prepared on that basis, after a most thorough examination of all the factors.

The following table will provide a comparison of the estimates for the forthcoming fiscal year with the one now ending; and, Mr. Chairman, as I present these figures briefly, the first figure mentioned will be the figure for 1965-66, and the second figure for the year completed on March 31, 1964-65.

So for King's highways, capital, we find in the first category $158,797,000 versus $141,532,000 and the percentage increase over the previous year's budget is 12.2 per cent; King's highways, maintenance, $51,280,000 compared to $46,781,000, an increase of 9.6 per cent; municipal assistance, $121,350,000 as against $112,450,000, increased 7.9 per cent; main office items, $4,746,000 compared with $4,443,000, which is a 6.8 per cent increase.

Gross expenditure is $336,173,000 as against $305,206,000, an increase of 10.1 per cent; less refunds from the government of Canada and other sources of $6,780,000 compared with $5,800,000, which is a 16.9 per cent increase; gives net expenditure of $329,393,000 as against $299,406,000, an increase of 10 per cent.

A few highlights, if I may now, of the 1965-66 capital programme.

The substantial increase in the amount budgeted for capital construction on King's highways and secondary highways, tertiary roads and other work to be paid out of King's highway funds, is indicative of the way the department has taken into account the total road requirements of the province in preparing its estimates. Because of the great number of improvements provided for in the $158,797,000 for which we are asking approval, I shall refer to only a few of them specifically.

Work will be continued on a number of major projects in northern and northwestern Ontario. Among these are: Highway 17 east and west of Mattawa, the new Timmins-Sudbury highway—for which new work having a value of close to $3 million will be awarded in 1965; the further extension of Highway 101 from Highway 129, south of Chapleau, westerly to Wawa—on which a contract for the last 18.5 mile gap on this 80-mile link will be awarded this year; as well, paving contracts will be let from Wawa easterly to secondary Highway 547 and also from Highway 129 easterly for some 15 miles; Highway 105, known also as the Red Lake Road, south of Ear Falls; and the completion of the new 85-mile section of Highway 11 from Atikokan westerly to Fort Frances, scheduled for opening in June of this year.

In southern Ontario the maximum volume of work—having in mind highway requirements over the province as a whole—will be carried forward on the Macdonald-Cartier freeway to complete as quickly as possible the additional lanes on the few remaining two-lane sections. As I have previously stated, the work is well advanced in this connection in western Ontario and we expect to open the nine miles of eastbound, or south lanes, from the Elgin-Kent county line westerly to Highway 21 and the 11 miles from there to Kent Centre sometime this summer, July if possible. Once that is achieved there will be four lanes or more all the way from Windsor to east of Gananoque.

In eastern Ontario our target completion date for the opening of additional lanes over the 11 miles from Highway 16, north of Johnstown, to the interchange for Iroquois is early November.

Other work on this key provincial throughway will include the wholly new alignment between Gananoque and Brockville—all of which mileage will be opened as four lanes as the various sections are completed—and the continuation of the widening of the most critical sections of the Toronto bypass, to which I have previously referred.

Construction on additional mileage of Highway 403 through Hamilton will continue and, further west on another section of this same freeway, paving of the Brantford bypass will be started. On another new freeway, No. 406—which will link Welland with the Queen Elizabeth way at St. Catharines in the first stage—the initial section, within the city of St. Catharines, will be opened before the end of the year.

Other major projects are the Quinte skyway spanning the Bay of Quinte, near Deseronto, and the extension of the programme to widen Highway 11 to four lanes between Orillia and Gravenhurst.

Work on the Trans-Canada highway will include the last section remaining to be completed on the Ottawa Queensway, Highway 7 near Bells Corners—immediately west of Ottawa—and on Highway 17, both north of Sault Ste. Marie and east of Ignace.

One of the largest undertakings on which a start will be made this year is a tunnel under the Welland canal at Thorold. Another multi-million dollar project is the Kitchener-Waterloo expressway system, on which the department is ready to move just as soon as the other parties concerned reach final agreement. Once this is done, the department can schedule the awarding of work with an estimated value of $2.5 million in the fiscal year. These projects will be carried out under special cost-sharing agreements with other authorities. In addition, the department will contribute to numerous projects to improve highway routes through urban municipalities, under connecting link agreements.

Many other projects of varying magnitude will be initiated on the basis of priority of need, to improve deficient sections of the King's and secondary highway system. This programme is an integral part of a five-year programme for the planned improvement of roads throughout the province.

Preliminary planning will be done on the route for a wholly new section of Highway 40 between Wallaceburg and Sarnia, on an alignment east of the present highway. Construction of the new King's highway over a more direct route will leave the existing highway available for eventual assumption as the St. Clair parkway by a commission to be comprised of representatives from the adjacent municipalities in the counties of Lambton and Kent. Until such a commission is fully constituted, planning of the parkway concept will be administered by a committee of local officials representing both the municipalities and the provincial ridings through which it passes. This bold new concept holds tremendous promise for the preservation of the natural beauty of the area adjacent to the St. Clair River, for the creation of a greater awareness and appreciation of its historic past and the development of its tourist potential.

Because The Department of Highways is, in a very real sense, a building agency—one of the largest in the country in terms of annual capital expenditure—many of the research endeavours it carries on year in and year out as a total part of its operation go unnoticed to a large extent. Some of this research, although vitally necessary for sound highway planning—such as projections of population growth and the areas in which it will tend to concentrate, motor vehicle registration and use, and related factors—is not of a nature which makes for spectacular news stories.

An extreme example is an Historical Chronology of Highway Legislation in Ontario, 1774 to 1961, published by The Department of Highways in February for public sale. This most exhaustive work, running to some 235 pages in the main body, summarizes 544 separate Acts and more than 675 amendments pertaining to roads and bridges in what is now the province of Ontario.

The chronology—to the best of our knowledge a first in its field—is a treasure-house of information on the origin and development of roads and bridges and the legal jurisdiction of them in the nearly 200 years covered. As such, it represents a significant contribution to historical research and the field of learning generally.

While the monumental volume of work which was obviously necessary for this undertaking required the participation and contributions of other department personnel, the project was conceived, guided and brought to completion by Miss Irma E. Pattison, MA, an economist with the department. For her dedication to the task—to which she devoted untold hours of her own time at home—for her scholarly achievement and for the service which she has rendered to the government of Ontario, to its people and to historians as yet unborn, I wish to pay fitting tribute here.

Under circumstances which, assuredly, are justified, I have drawn attention to a particular achievement by one employee in a department which, at this time, has a strength of some 13,000. In doing so, Mr. Chairman, I wish to add a word of commendation and thanks to the employees as a whole, from the bottom to the top. Without that sense of responsibility and interest in their work and the willing co-operation which it has been my pleasure to experience, no operation approaching the size of The Department of Highways could possibly function as efficiently as it does. Indeed, the new plateau in the integration of the overall road network of the province which was most definitely reached in the fiscal year just ended—an achievement which I have documented at some length today—could never have been attained with anything less on their part.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am confident the hon. members, and indeed the overwhelming majority of the people of this province, would wish to join with me in expressing my personal appreciation for this fine overall performance of duty.

On vote 801:

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, before the hon. Minister gets firmly established in his seat, I wonder if he would indicate if he intends to make the study of the development of highway legislation and policy to which he referred available to the members of the Legislature?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I announced they were available for sale.

Mr. Bryden: Well, that is not the normal way with government publications.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think I can arrange to provide a copy for each of the hon. members of the Legislature, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, as I rise to take part in the debates on the estimates of The Department of Highways, may I congratulate the hon. Minister on his fine presentation and for the outline of what his department has done in the past and what it contemplates doing in the ensuing year.

Each year, as the hon. Minister presents his report and is more familiar with the workings of his department, he becomes the more capable. May I, through the hon. Minister, thank his departmental officials and staff for the fine co-operation we of the Liberal Party have received from them in the past year. Their assistance in replying to our many problems and requests is sincerely appreciated.

May I also thank the hon. Minister for making available to us, for the first time in quite a few years and the first time in his three-year tenure of office, weeks—yes eight weeks in advance—a copy of the annual report. This is the way it should be. The annual report should be received well in advance of the presentation of the estimates of any department, this should be a must.

No department, and I emphasize no departmental, estimates should be presented in this House at any time, without the Opposition having been given, well in advance, a copy of the annual report of that particular department.

As for the second report, that of the capital construction programme for the fiscal year 1965-66, it also should have been in our hands well in advance of the presentation of the estimates. It is not fair to ask anyone to be constructively critical if the Minister of the department does not make available to the hon. members, who are in the best position to offer suggestions and ideas about the contemplated projects for 1965-66, an opportunity to review the projects for more than just a few hours, as has been given in the past. This year, by accident I assume, we were fortunate in getting a copy of the report two days in advance. Apparently the government's scheduling was off a little.

I hope and trust that in the future this hon. Minister will see to it that both the annual report and the capital construction programme are in the hands of the hon. members well in advance of the presentation of The Department of Highways estimates.

Having made these few remarks, Mr. Chairman, may I emphasize just one reason for such concern. In the 1964-65 capital construction programme on page 11 is listed the following inaccuracy, intentional or not, who is to say?

The total length of Highway 401, Windsor to the Quebec border, is 510 miles, of which 502 miles are open now and the remaining eight miles are under construction at present, and will be open at the end of 1964.

How many more such inaccuracies are therein contained? I cannot say as I am familiar only with the Windsor-Toronto section of Highway 401, and I now, as does the hon. Minister, that there are well over eight miles of 401 still under retarded construction in the counties of Kent and Elgin.

A headline in the March 18, 1964, Windsor Daily Star was: "Minister no prophet—won't promise 401 finish date." The hon. Minister, in this House, said he could not promise a completion date for 401, yet in his own programme on the page I have just mentioned, he does carry a completion date.

However, to be fair with the hon. Minister, I must also state that on the same page he also says just the opposite, and this is in the maps or charts on pages 10 and 11 in which the following is printed, "Not open by 1964."

This is just one example of sitting on a fence, talking out of both sides of the mouth at the same time, saying one thing and the opposite at the same time. Make up your mind, Mr. Minister, what did you really want to say, or who were you trying to fool?

Mr. Chairman, The Department of Highways estimates ask for a total of $329 million in only three votes. Let me review for the hon. members of this House the number of votes of other departments and the amount of money requested, to show that this Department of Highways needs a complete reorganization in the method of presenting its estimates.

Agriculture requires 22 votes for an estimate of $22 million; Attorney General, 12 for $39 million; civil service, eight for $1.5 million. Rather than read all of the number of votes for each of the departments, and the total estimate for that individual department, may I simply bring this one to your attention, Mr. Chairman? The hon. Prime Minister's office, with a total budget of only $252,000, requires two votes. This department wants only three votes for $329 million. The main office vote of this department—and that is $4.75 million—is more than that of five different departments. The maintenance vote of $87 million is greater than that of a total of 14 departments with 125 votes.

Mr. Chairman, the time has come that this department present its estimates in a more logical manner, in a manner that one may be able to use, without any confusion, the public accounts, in looking for an answer.

I hesitate to state a method of reorganization, but I can recall the standing committee on public accounts making such criticisms. These estimates should be organized and presented to the hon. members of this House so that answers to their queries can be easily located. The public accounts in this department are not drawn up to give this information. Why? Mr. Chairman, there should be in this House a uniform method of presentation of estimates and their breakdowns.

There can be no doubt of the profound and widespread influence that highways have had on industrial, agricultural, cultural, economic and social conditions in Ontario. Motor vehicles now serve many communities that formerly lacked direct service by rail or water. As the country's two main railways continue in their policies of eliminating uneconomic runs, and further reducing the number of stops, the problem of highways and highway transport becomes a greater concern, especially to the small, disadvantaged community. In many instances as a result of the accessibility of the concrete ribbon, a community has been able to survive. The cost of freight transportation has been reduced, business has been stimulated, and as a result of frequent and expeditious service to the outlying areas, decentralization of industry has been made possible.

Small communities have been able to prosper and survive, even though they may be quite distant from the large cities. This has been so where these communities have been within easy access to principal arteries. Indeed, by the reason of the basic influence of highways on the cost of doing business, the whole fabric of commerce and industry in Ontario is vitally affected.

Mr. Chairman, The Department of Highways has the following studies either completed, being revised or under way at the present time: 1, a plan for Ontario highways—this was completed in 1956 and was to cover the highway needs for the next 20 years; 2, Ontario's roads and streets, completed in 1958, likewise covering the needs for the next 20 years; 3, nineteen area planning studies; 4, urban transportation studies; 5, township programming studies and 6, county need studies.

This is all well and good, but to date these studies have led to more and to further studies than they have time to take action on. The roads are needed now, and the province should undertake an accelerated programme of highway construction. By its own admission, investment in roads facilities have not kept pace with the needs of mounting traffic, so that today the province is faced with a highway problem of considerable dimensions. This problem should be met without delay, for the economic health of Ontario depends on the solution.

There is a direct relationship between the level of economic activity and the volume of highway traffic. Increasing industrial, agricultural, mining and forestry output, as well as expansion of commerce and tourism, are all promoted by highway transport. In turn, each of these generates new requirements for better highway facilities. The higher standard of living and the more leisure made possible by expanding production are reflected in increased motor vehicle ownership and travel. In a short ten years—by 1975—it is estimated that there will be over four million motor vehicles registered in the province of Ontario.

The hon. Minister, in his earlier comments, has mentioned the fact that on Ontario's highways vehicles travel a total of eight billion vehicle miles. May I inform him that in the state of Michigan it is 33 billion.

Ontario's reliance on good roads is further emphasized in other ways. One is its strategic position with respect to the rest of Canada and the United States. Another is the rapid trend of urbanization. Cities are the focal points of traffic generation and movement. Finally, the geographic distribution of people in the province poses a unique problem in providing adequate transportation services.

Not only has the road building in this province failed to keep pace with the needs but the backlog of highway deficiencies has been increasing more rapidly than during the prosperous post-war period.

Studies have shown that large portions of King's highway systems and secondary roads are seriously inadequate for today's traffic. To rehabilitate the highways of the province to a satisfactory level of service would include new construction, replacement, stopgap work on roads and bridges, and would entail the expenditure of approximately $2 billion.

In addition, traffic congestion in many urban areas testifies to the many deficiencies in other segments of the highways, namely, road and street networks; insufficient shoulder width on our highways; deficiency in width and load-carrying capacity of many bridge structures; poor surface conditions; bad curves; insufficient sight distance. These are but a few of the many inadequacies of our roads system.

The provincial highways, county roads, township roads and urban streets constitute a vital circulatory system which should nourish the province and keep it healthy. Thus, a highly developed, integrated highway system is essential to our well-being and prosperity.

Highway improvement increases the productive efficiency and improves the competitive position of every industry and activity in Ontario. Our everyday lives are so dependent on our roads system that our economy practically would grind to a standstill if the wheels of our automotive transports did not have the roads over which to travel. If this is true today, just think of the future needs for more and better roads.

Mr. Chairman, in an address at the Ontario good roads convention in Toronto earlier this year, Mr. W. Q. MacNee, traffic and planning engineer for The Ontario Department of Highways, made the following statement:

The backlog of our needs is so great that were we to make a mistake it would be years before we could afford to go back and correct it; that the temporary inconvenience would become, in fact, a permanent inconvenience.

Highway 401, the Toronto bypass, is just an example of the mistakes that have been made as a result of poor planning.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to read the following from a letter received by me:

As you will recall, 401 is being widened through a section of Toronto, and the fact that this widening made it necessary to expropriate rows of houses at some considerable cost to the public Treasury seems to smack of slipshod forward planning.

However, the fact that this issue was raised makes it difficult for me to understand why, in that section of 401 to the east of the widened, or proposed-to-be-widened strip, at what will probably be a future main intersection of the area, namely, where the Don valley parkway crosses 401, one now finds at the north-west corner, a large apartment-type building of some sort being erected.

It is inconceivable to me that, in thinking of the transportation needs of the province, this main intersection may not be required to handle the considerably expanded amount of traffic in future years. The existence of a large, expensive structure as is now apparently being erected on the site noted, however, will mean that it will be financially impossible to expropriate additional land in this area, to accommodate increases in traffic.

Since the Don valley parkway is, I believe, to hook into a new four-lane highway shooting up the east side of Lake Simcoe, and since 401 is a main provincial traffic artery, it seems to me a foregone conclusion that the traffic demands will, or should, cause need for increased road facilities in this area.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one who believes that The Department of Highways could operate on the principle of $1 of expenditure for every dollar collected in any given area. I believe that for the total good of the province, the "have" areas must subsidize, compensate or make up for the "have not" areas, the areas of slow growth, designated areas or defined areas, whatever name is given to them must be assisted by the more fortunate, the rapid growth, the better blessed areas.

The highway revenues obtained from the better built up, the heavily trafficked southern stretches of this province, must be used to a greater extent to build more roads in the lesser populated, lesser trafficked areas of northern Ontario. Ontario will profit most when all parts of Ontario have equal opportunities; when northern Ontario is given the necessary roads for good, sound development.

I had intended to comment at some length on the means, other than highways, for the mass movement of people, but since the hon. Minister is studying this problem at the present, I shall delay my questions until next year, at which time I expect he will have a report from his advisers.

Private cars and public transit systems are not competitive but complementary. The major role of public vehicles like buses, trains and underground trains or subways, is to handle commuter trips to and from downtown business districts along a few main travelled corridors. When the city of Washington looked into the matter in 1960, the official report said:

Any attempt to meet transport needs by highways and private automobiles alone will wreck the city; it will demolish residential neighbourhoods; violate parks and playgrounds; desecrate the monumental parks of the nation's capital, and remove much valuable property from the tax rolls.

It has been pointed out that a bus route, subway system or commuter train service can carry as many passengers per day on its right of way as the 10, 20 or 30-lane boulevard. This theory takes for granted that provision of convenient, speedy, competitively priced public transportation will remove motorists from the road. It is well known that when emergencies arise, such as severe weather conditions or motor trouble, or when parking fees are too high, many drivers turn gratefully to mass transport.

Mr. Chairman, for such reasons, we of the Liberal Party endorse financial assistance by way of subsidies for the subway system in Toronto. The sooner this means of mass transportation is completed, the sooner will the pressure be taken off many of the main arteries in this city.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): The member for Owen Sound does not agree with that—

An hon. member: Where is the member for Owen Sound?

Mr. Newman: The member for Owen Sound speaks for the Owen Sound district.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): There is the Liberal Party—united as everyone goes his own way!

Mr. Newman: I have expressed our policy on subways. Mr. Chairman, toll roads come up for discussion every year. The Department of Highways says that it is opposed to toll roads; that it has a toll-free policy. If this is the case, may I ask why tolls are charged on the Burlington Bay skyway and the Garden City skyway? Are not both part of our provincial highways system? There is not a toll, nor should there be one, for the use of the Gardiner expressway. This expressway, I am told, will be far more costly than both the Burlington Bay and Garden City skyways combined. Now is the time, Mr. Chairman, to remove the tolls from the two aforementioned skyways, and from any other provincial highway, if there is one, on which a toll is charged.

The state of Michigan is contemplating removing tolls from its $100 million-plus Straits of Mackinaw bridge. I think that such roads are of such economic significance that a study should be made into the feasibility and the costs of integrating international and interprovincial bridges and tunnels into our highways system. Would it be to Ontario's economic advantage, for example, to have the bridges at Niagara Falls and Fort Erie combined and made part of the Ontario and New York state highways systems and be made toll free? Would it be to Ontario's and Minnesota's advantage to have a toll-free bridge between Fort Frances and International Falls?

There is quite a clamour in this western part of Ontario for this facility. I am told that the House of Representatives in the state of Minnesota has passed a bill, HF 125, authorizing this construction, and that Ontario is, for some reason, hedging. I hope that when we return in 1966 to discuss the estimates of this department, the hon. Minister will be able to have such information for us as to the feasibility, and the cost, of integrating international bridges and tunnels into the Ontario highway system.

Most communities can have bypasses constructed—sort of ring roads around them—to facilitate and speed up traffic and take a sizeable amount of traffic off the urban roads. However, cities on the U.S. border—Fort Erie, Niagara Falls, Sault Ste. Marie, Sarnia and Windsor, just to name a few—have a unique problem. Their problem arises out of the large number of tourists entering and leaving Ontario through their gateway. These tourists contribute substantially to the economy of the whole province. However, an undue portion of the expense of accommodating them roadwise, falls on these border municipalities. Roads that normally would be satisfactory to take care of the urban traffic must be built up, widened, and so forth, to compensate for this added traffic burden. Likewise, this puts an added strain on roads adjacent to the link roads in the community.

Just as the department has a different subsidy for Metro, it should consider a higher link road subsidy for U.S. bordered municipalities, to enable these municipalities to cope with a road programme that is not of their making, and which when undertaken and completed, is of greater advantage to the rest of the province, than it is to the community. This is also a problem with the trans-Canada highway going through a municipality. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister to comment on the following resolutions as approved by the Ontario good roads association in their convention held this year.

One is from the city of Port Arthur asking for 90 to 100 per cent subsidy on King's highways in trans-Canada highway municipalities.

Whereas municipalities along the route of the trans-Canada highway are faced with ever-increasing costs for road construction and maintenance of these roads designated as King's highways within the boundaries of the municipality, because much of the traffic on these routes is made up of heavy transport trucks requiring a high standard more expensive pavement to withstand the weight of the loads which continue to grow heavier and heavier each year, and which contribute to the early disintegration of the older existing roads; and whereas the King's highways within a municipality are merely connecting links in the national transportation network and are of great benefit to Canada as a whole much of the heavy freight traffic which they carry is not connected with the municipality and does not benefit the municipality in any way: Therefore be it resolved that the provincial government be petitioned to bear from 90 to 100 per cent of the cost of constructing and maintaining King's highways in municipalities situated on the trans-Canada highway system.

This recommendation, by the way, was approved by the convention. One of the other resolutions submitted, which I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister and ask him for his comments, is the one from the city of Barrie asking for an increased schedule for provincial subsidies.

Whereas studies by various committees established by the provincial government have reported iniquities of subsidy payments to local municipalities under The Highway Improvement Act; and whereas the Ontario's Roads and Streets report of The Department of Highways, dated 1958, sets out that over $2 billion will be required during the next 20 years—seven of which have already elapsed—and whereas all municipal associations have approved of resolutions in varying degrees asking for relief of that portion of cost from real estate taxation for highways which is not a proper charge for service to real estate, with little result; and whereas the province of Ontario has the exclusive right of taxation of vehicle fuels, sales tax, licences and permits for its own revenues: Therefore be it resolved that The Ontario Department of Highways pay 100 per cent on freeways and connecting links, 70 per cent on arterial roads and streets, 50 per cent on all other municipal streets in the (a) cost of land, (b) construction, (c) maintenance.

The resolutions committee of the Ontario good roads association took the following action:

That we request The Department of Highways to reach an early decision and announce its policies regarding subsidies on streets and roads.

This was approved by the association.

Mr. Chairman, in looking over The Department of Highways municipal roads division subsidies, I notice that for the Metropolitan Toronto area the road subsidy is 50 per cent. For cities and separated towns, and in some cases some townships, it is down to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. Were the subsidies given to cities, separated towns and some townships made the same as that for Metropolitan Toronto area, development in these other areas would probably be accelerated to the same extent as it has in the Toronto area that is much favoured, much more so favoured than are these separated towns and cities. Just imagine, Mr. Chairman, if just a portion of the total additional expenditures that were allocated in the Metro area were divided over the large expanse of northern Ontario the great number of miles of highways that could have been developed in northern Ontario.

We ask nothing be taken away from the Metropolitan Toronto area, we simply ask that cities and separated towns be brought up on a par with the Metro area.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring up the matter of fair wages and government contracts at this time. The brief presented by the united brotherhood of carpenters and joiners of America to this government in March of this year has the following comments, and this is on fair wages and government contracts:

The Minister of Labour in introducing the order-in-council establishing fair wages in government contracts was quoted: "Not only will fair wage schedules protect construction workers throughout Ontario, but it will guard responsible contractors against unfair competition and undercutting based on payment of low wages."

This was a very profound and much appreciated statement from the Minister of Labour for our province. However, it is inconceivable that The Department of Highways should have been excluded from application of this order-in-council. It is rather strange that this Ontario government should say, in essence, we will adopt schedules to protect workmen against exploitation by unscrupulous employers and responsible employers against unfair competition where all government contracts are concerned, but pass the highways department. Employers in this one department of government were thereby given the virtual blessing of Ontario government to work their employees killing hours without overtime pay at menial wages. How can one of the biggest spending departments of government be overlooked when important principle is being established? In statistics released by The Department of Labour we find that inspectors uncovered cheating in wage payments by contractors performing government contracts to the extent of $2,184 in one month. It is true and accepted that highway construction as related to paving work can be impeded by severe weather, but we might do well to consider giving work to more people at normal work hours rather than imposing 60, 70, 80 hours of work per week on the workmen in this industry.

Considering the locals affiliated to district councils and the number of cases where the district council has agreement or is supplying contractors, the great majority of our construction locals and their members have been involved in construction of overpasses or appurtenances to highways and normal work hours have prevailed in accordance with our collective agreements. This information serves to confirm that fair wages and normal hours of work on structures connected with highway construction does not disrupt the general progress of highway work.

It is recognized that we cannot speak for the peculiarities which might pertain to the rest of highway construction, but it is our contention that at least all structures in connection with highway construction should come under fair wages and government contracts. This will protect construction workers on overpasses against meagre wages and the responsible contractors against unfair competition. Such extended coverage would, of course, serve the interest of greater sharing and spread of employment to more workmen in Ontario industry.

Form work on overpasses is not unlike form work carried out on a year-round basis in the rest of the construction industry. New techniques have made it possible for this work to proceed during extreme weather.

The federal labour code is designed to provide fringe benefits to employees on government projects. This is regarded as a most progressive step, noticeably being followed in the United States of America by an amendment to the Davis-Bacon Act. The American bill signed into law by President Johnson in the latter part of 1964 provides for a matching of prevailing area standards of fringe benefits where cash equivalent may be added to the hourly pay.

In view of the fact that the province has adopted the federal fair wage schedule, it should follow that the Minister of Labour would allow for the application of fringe benefits under Ontario fair wages, thus recommended by the carpenters and joiners.

In carrying on with their recommendations, Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister their comments concerning pre-qualification for contractors.

The restrictive trade practices commission exposed bid fixing in connection with collusive tendering on provincial and municipal government contracts.

Workmen in this province are adversely affected by the nefarious practice of cutting, slashing and fixing of bids in the construction industry. This breeds familiar backwash in wage cheating, the breakdown of conditions.

The Combines Act makes it an indictable offence punishable by two years imprisonment. Obviously the matter is taken so lightly in Ontario that the pre-qualification system for contractors leaves the whole question of penalties to the discretion of the Minister. The three months suspension from bidding imposed by the Minister in the case of 13 roadbuilders involved in bid fixing was too insignificant and ineffectual to serve as a deterrent. The suspensions, as a matter of fact, come at a time when the least harm was done the violators.

It is therefore suggested that consideration be given to establishment of some penalty suitable to prevent any further spread of price-fixing practice under government contracts.

Mr. Chairman, when this was first made known to the public, the Windsor Daily Star carried a very strong editorial on this topic. I will read its headline only, and that is: "Free enterprise thwarted by rigging of contracts."

Mr. Chairman, allow me to bring to your attention the indiscriminate, inconsiderate and dictatorial approach used by this department in the matter of service centres on limited access highways, such as the Macdonald-Cartier freeway and Highway 400. In its policy of setting up service centres this department does not take into consideration the deteriorating effect a service centre may have on a small businessman, gas station operator, motel keeper, restaurant owner and so forth when this centre is located near a community in which a large number of small operators depend in a large measure on the automobile and truck traffic for their source of livelihood.

I would like to focus my comments on the new service centre to be or being constructed on Highway 400 within a mile or so south of Barrie. Rather than go into any too great detail, I would like to read simply the following letter from the Toronto Telegram on February 12, 1965.

We have sent the following letter of protest to Minister of Highways MacNaughton.

We, the businessmen of No. 11 highway wish to protest the construction of the government-sponsored service centre on No. 400 highway. Having collectively invested millions of dollars in service stations on No. 11 highway, we feel that it is grossly unfair of the provincial government to pass legislation that restricts our entrance signs, position of buildings and so forth, to the point that, in conjunction with the stranglehold the oil companies have on us, it has made it almost impossible for us to operate profitably.

This not being enough, The Department of Highways of Ontario now proposes to finish the job completely by building another service centre. Although this is supposed to be an aid to the motorists, the only persons who, we feel, will profit from this are the stockholders of the oil company involved. This centre, if constructed, will employ 100 people, but by closing dozens of small businesses will place several hundred people in the ranks of the unemployed.

The claim that the motoring public needs another service centre is nothing but hogwash and we can all prove this by our records.

The letter is signed by G. G. Stanley, businessmen's group, chairman, Orillia township, Orillia, Ontario.

After a formal protest and after submitting resolutions from three township councils opposing this centre, and after an eventual meeting with the hon. Minister, the delegation of businessmen seriously affected by this action on the part of this Minister had no choice but to return home. Mr. Chairman, this delegation would never have demonstrated in front of the Parliament buildings were they not locked in a life-and-death struggle over the proposed construction of this service centre so close to their own businesses.

Mr. Minister, you can still cancel the agreement to construct this centre at this location and relocate it on Highway 400, miles north of Barrie. If you fail to do this, Mr. Minister, you may be affecting directly, I am told, $38 million worth of private investment which may wither, dry up or be destroyed. You owe it to your fellow man, you owe it to private enterprise. Let us stop destroying private capital, let us help the small businessman to stay in business, let us not sacrifice him to big enterprise.

At this point I was going to read a paragraph from a letter written by Mr. Stanley, but his previous letter, I think, covers the topic well enough.

The group were so disturbed over this, Mr. Chairman, that at the one stage, back approximately the last week in March, they were responsible for the complete tying up of all gas station operators from the Barrie area, if I am not mistaken, as far north as North Bay and Sudbury. The comment in the Toronto Telegram on Wednesday, March 24, is as follows:

A service station, restaurant strike is threatened on all major highways north of Barrie as far as Sudbury and North Bay.

Last night's decision was taken after a long fight with The Department of Highways over construction of a proposed new service centre on Highway 400, a mile south of Barrie. A centre in this location, the group contends, would rob all district stations north of Barrie of about 40 per cent of their business. The new station will siphon off about 3,000,000 gallons from our annual volume, said Mr. Gordon Stanley of Orillia. The newly elected chairman, a Mr. Mike Cavell, who operates a service station and restaurant on Highway 11, said a petition containing 25,000 names would be presented to the Ontario government within two weeks. If nothing is done, the strike will start immediately after that, he said. He claimed that the British American Oil Company, which operates the new complex, told its dealers it would be closing up all its outlets between Barrie and Gravenhurst once the new centre was built.

Mr. Chairman, may I conclude my remarks on this topic by making the following suggestion: On limited access highways no service centre be located near any community that presently has all the facilities necessary for the motoring public.

In the state of Michigan, Interstate No. 94 from Port Huron through to Detroit and then on to the Indiana border, a distance of about 225 miles, and Interstate 75 from Ohio to Detroit to Sault Ste. Marie, a distance of about 385 miles, and Interstate 96 from Muskegan to Detroit, about 170 miles, do not have any service centres. The motoring public must leave the freeway to obtain services.

This same state today has a total of about 1,184 miles of limited access freeway built to the higher federal government design standards. If I may interject here, Mr. Chairman, 784 miles of the aforementioned distance was started and completed within the last eight years. In eight years they have built 784 miles, and we have been working for approximately 20 years and we still have not the 510 miles—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That is 90 per cent federal.

Mr. Newman: I am not mentioning as to where funds are obtained—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: But I am mentioning it to the hon. member.

Mr. Newman: —I am telling you it was completed; they did it in eight years. Yes, eight years, and not the 18 years that we in the province of Ontario have been trying to complete Highway 401. On all of these 1,184 miles in the state of Michigan, there is not a single service centre. There are, however, signs adjacent to exits or interchanges pointing out to the motoring public the types of services available. The state of Michigan claims this has not inconvenienced the motoring public because it makes no difference to the vehicle operator whether he drives 500 feet off the main road for services or 2,500 feet. This allows the small operator and the free enterprise to compete fairly for the traveller's dollar. This does not give a monopoly in a given area to a large oil company.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, the state of Michigan claims it is no more hazardous, as far as highway safety is involved, for the motorist to be entering the main highway from the service centre as are now set up than entering the main highway from an interchange.

I do not suggest that service centres do not serve a useful purpose. However, I do suggest that before any more are developed this department study the proposals, study the potentially deteriorating effect of service centres on businesses adjacent to them. The federal law in the US forbids the erection of service centres on its interstate highways network.

Toll roads in the US do not come under this control, and are allowed to have service centres. But interstate highways in the US do not have service centres.

Mr. Chairman, if I may interject: One of the complaints registered by the joint board of Ontario travel associations to the standing committee on highways and tourism, was that service centres on the Macdonald-Cartier freeway only allow five per cent on US funds. Such a policy by a service centre on government-controlled lands does harm to our tourist industry, and gives it a black eye. The depriving of the visitor of his rightful currency exchange is most undesirable. Mr. Minister, I think that you should insist that all service centres refrain from such unethical practice.

May I suggest to the hon. Minister that he not only expand his roadside park programme along our King's highways, but also that he build, in stages, a whole series of rest areas along all limited access roads. The state to the west of us, Michigan—a state that has had considerably more experience with the horseless carriage than have we—has done the following: It has 34 freeway rest areas, each about eight acres in size with parking space for 50 cars and 20 trucks. These areas are spaced about one hour's drive apart on all interstate and Michigan limited access freeways. Like roadside parks, these rest areas are equipped with rest rooms, picnic tables, grills and safe drinking water. In addition, they have an information bulletin board, a pay telephone and are lighted all night. Here is a programme worth copying.

The Highway Improvement Act prohibits the erection of large signs immediately adjacent to controlled access highways. Most communities are bypassed by such controlled access highways, so that no idea of their outstanding features can be gained by the motoring public. Since information signs tend to promote the commercial, industrial and cultural welfare of communities, the government should amend The Highway Improvement Act to permit each municipality served by a controlled access highway to erect, adjacent to the highway, a sign or signs, the wording, size, layout, colours and construction to be subject to the Minister of Highways, to enable that municipality to inform the motoring public of some of its outstanding features. Let us never lose sight of the fact that the visitors to our province, to our municipalities, and to our tourist areas contribute in no small measure to our economic growth. We would be remiss if we were to allow a visitor to enter our province at one end, gas up, have lunch and leave at the other end in one day without placing before him all the inducements which we have to offer to instil in him a desire to spend a goodly portion of his holidays and his money in Ontario.

Mr. Chairman, there has been brought to the attention of the members of the standing committee on highways and tourism an excellent example of a lost opportunity by this department, and by The Department of Tourism and Information, to sell one of the province's outstanding tourist attractions, namely, Upper Canada village. A good and properly placed information sign, well in advance from both directions of this historic attraction, could have a most marked economic effect on adjacent communities. This is but one example of the lack of co-operation between departments of this government.

I would like to make a few comments on telephones on highways, particularly on expressways and controlled access highways. It is time the department extended its policy on roadside emergency telephones to all expressways first, and then to controlled access highways. The Burlington skyway, I understand, is so equipped. The Gardiner expressway and the other Toronto expressways need such service. Were the hon. Minister to adopt the Michigan state rest area idea, no traveller on a limited access highway would be more than half an hour away from a telephone.

Mr. Chairman, earlier in my comments, I mentioned the use of information signs on Highway 401. May I suggest to the hon. Minister that in the planning stages of any bypass, he inform—by newspaper advertisement, or press releases—the exact location of the bypass, and that the department consult with service operators in an attempt to lessen the adverse impact of the bypass on their business. Perhaps the allowing of certain types of information signs, such as food, lodging, and gas before the bypass, may be a partial solution to the newly created difficulty. The Madoc bypass certainly was an example of poor public relations on the part of this government.

I would like to bring up four different items, as taken from the Independent Businessman. The first is in August of 1963 and concerns a couple, Maria and Romuald Back:

Romuald and Maria Back are small business folk, but they are a little different from many of Canada's small business people. They are two of those who withstood all of the torture and brutality that Hitler's beasts could devise. Today, a very few petty civil servants in Queen's Park are excelling the Nazi monsters, for they have bent Romuald and Maria Back to the point of breaking.

I do not intend to read the whole article, but I will read three comments in here.

When The Department of Highways first went to expropriate a 50 by 50 foot section of the corner of the property that these people owned, Mr. Back fought against it, one official threatened him, and I quote now:

We can kick you right out of this corner if we want to.

Another time, another department official came along and, after Mrs. Back was on the point of tears through anger and frustration, made the following comment: "You can go right to hell for all I care."

Mr. Chairman, surely this does not speak too highly of the public relations aspect of The Department of Highways.

The second case is that of a veterinary surgeon being squeezed out of his property in the same location as Mr. and Mrs. Back and were squeezed out for a mere pittance.

The third is concerning Mr. and Mrs. Beckford.

Government plans to kill this business. The Ontario Department of Highways has put another small businessman up for the kill. He is Ted Beckford. He has a motel, restaurant and service station on Highway 7 at the third line west, a few miles west of Brampton.

In the past 25 years, Mr. Beckford has built his business from nothing to one with a value of about a quarter of a million dollars. Within days of your reading these words, The Department of Highways will have cut the value of his business to nil by bypassing him with a new section of highway that seems to have no rhyme, and less reason than many of the insane acts The Department of Highways has perpetrated upon small businesses and the Ontario public in the past.

This is from the September 1964 issue of the Independent Businessman. The editorial in that same issue has the following comment, and is worthy of some thought:

LOGICAL DIVERSION

If a miller were to build a mill on a river using water power to drive his mill, and the government were to divert that river and so cut off his energy source, the miller surely would be compensated. The water provided his energy. He would not have built this mill on that river if the energy source had not been available. Therefore, when the government takes it away they must pay him for having taken away the water that provides his power to mill his wheat and so to earn his living.

This is in direct reference to the Beckford properties.

The next is the October 1964 issue of the Independent Businessman, and the headline is:

ONTARIO'S DEPARTMENT OF HIGHWAYS CONTINUES TO TOLL KNELL

Ontario Department of Highways has condemned the hamlet of Eastwood to death. Already four of the seven businesses in the community have closed. The three that remain are in grave danger.

For the sake of time, I will not read the balance of the article, I will take out three paragraphs from the editorial on that same issue and they are:

Several times we have reported instances on these pages of Ontario's Department of Highways bypassing an independent businessman's business, either without telling him of the department's intention, or without showing any concern for the consequences. It would seem that the development of even the primitive feudal system would require that the government at least allow the uprooted businessman compensation equivalent to the value of his business before The Department of Highways deflated and destroyed it. In this case the end does not justify the means.

This is in reference to the Eastwood situation:

A little consideration and a little better planning could have saved a life's work of half-a-dozen people, and the jobs of twice as many more.

Mr. Chairman, for the past several years I have been most critical of this government in its snail's pace in the completion of all four lanes of Highway 401, or the Macdonald-Cartier freeway, in reference to the Tilbury-London area. Year by year, this portion of unfinished or incomplete roadway became less. Today, I can foresee the 1965 completion of the western portion of 401. However, I am very pleased to see that the hon. gentlemen to my right likewise agree with that.

An hon. member: Just what the hon. Minister said he was going to do.

Mr. Newman: I know, this has been said by this government for 18 years. For 18 years now, 401 has been in its stages of completion. All you have to do is go right back into the records. Five years ago I criticized them over Highway 401, four years ago, three years ago, two years ago, last year and then again this year.

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): You spoke about 18 years.

Mr. Newman: Well, I was not here 18 years ago, but this is how long it takes you people to complete a road.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): What is the distance between Montreal and Windsor?

Mr. Newman: What is the distance between Montreal and Windsor? Are you asking the question now?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am telling you.

Mr. Newman: Oh, you are telling me! When the hon. Minister is on his feet later, you can ask him any question you wish. He will be more than pleased to answer them for you.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): How many miles opened last year?

Mr. Newman: However, one of the reasons for my remarks was the danger involved in coming off a four-lane roadway into a two-lane one. The western Ontario unfinished portion of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway was called death strip, suicide row, and every other name that you could possibly think. It claimed about 120 lives, and will continue to claim more lives until it is completed.

Mr. Chairman, the department took all types of precautionary and supervisory and patrolling action in an attempt to cut down the number of fatalities, but those actions are not the solution to the problem. The only answer is completion of the project. The press in western Ontario was most critical of The Department of Highways in its approach to this area's request for immediate completion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the same thing is taking place at the other end—the eastern end of this highway. Allow me to read from the Prescott Journal of Wednesday, April 21, 1965:

GOOD FRIDAY TRAFFIC FATALITY

Trapped when a jackknifing car transport skidded into their westbound course on the Macdonald-Cartier freeway early Friday morning, a Montreal woman is dead, her husband in serious condition and two companions taken to hospital with undetermined, but lesser injuries. The fatality scene is three miles east of Prescott where the freeway reduces from four lanes into two lanes.

And in that same issue of the same paper:

401 FATALITIES! ONE DEAD, FOUR INJURED

A Toronto woman became the second highway accident victim of the Easter holidays when she was instantly killed on the Macdonald-Cartier freeway at 11 o'clock Monday morning. The scene of this tragedy was 1.3 miles west of the Shanley road, and only two miles east of Friday morning's fatality scene.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Ontario provincial police made certain recommendations to The Department of Highways to overcome some of the hazards here. No action was taken by the department.

On April 21, the Prescott Journal had the following editorial:

THE SIXTH FATALITY

What will it take to move The Department of Highways into taking action to do away with that short section of accident-prone roadway on Highway 401 near the Highway 16 interchange where the four-lane roadway ends and squeezes into two lanes and two-way traffic?

Six lives have already been lost here during the past two years and countless thousands of dollars of damage have been caused in scores of other accidents where the drivers and passengers have been more fortunate.

Department of Highways safety experts have to give this death bottleneck top priority in the very near future. Heavy summer traffic is starting to crowd the speedway and more fatalities and more accidents are in order if conditions remain the same.

This is just a duplication of what happened on the extreme west end of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway—the area between Chatham and Tempo, I think it was.

The hon. Minister took great pride in expediting Highway 401. Here is an editorial dated Friday, July 24:

FACTS DENY EXPEDITION IN CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY 401

Highways Minister Charles S. MacNaughton, while touring the danger strip of Highway 401, declared completion of the highway has been accelerated.

"A year has been shaved off the completion date," he said.

What completion date is he talking about? The original objective was to have it finished long ago, but each year the completion date appears to have been set back. The new one is August of 1965. If a year has been shaved off, then the department must have been contemplating its finish in 1966.

Mr. Chairman, during the past year Highway 401 was renamed the Macdonald-Cartier freeway. With this we concur and we hope that the department will continue its policy of naming other highways after historic personalities but at the same time using the number designation for simplicity's sake. Macdonald-Cartier freeway will always be known as Highway 401.

Mr. A. E. Reuter (Waterloo South): How about Newman bypass?

Mr. Newman: If the hon. member wishes to have a Newman bypass it is quite all right with me. I would rather have that than none.

Mr. Chairman, maintenance costs now form a substantial portion of this budget. Municipalities are also confronted with such rising costs. They have no one to turn to for guidance in attempting to meet this problem so that their expenditure of funds may bring back to them its greatest return in value and serviceability of its roads. This department should undertake a detailed study of the maintenance methods and procedures to ensure that the most economical organization and operation is possible. Only after such studies will it be possible to give to municipalities the benefits of such studies.

It was not too long ago that the department would not subsidize the full purchase price of graders of more than 125 horsepower. It took municipalities to show The Department of Highways that it was false economy to buy such equipment when graders of a greater horsepower rating were more economical to operate in the long run. The Department of Highways should have been able to advise municipalities of this in the first place.

On June 12, 1964, a comment in a local paper was concerned with the purchase of such road equipment being left in the hands of the district engineer and one of the interesting comments is:

Since The Department of Highways pays for 50 per cent of the equipment, everyone is losing in the long run as the result of lower horsepower equipment being purchased, equipment not serviceable to meet the conditions.

The hon. Minister, earlier in his comments, had mentioned a St. Clair parkway. We are most pleased that this is eventually going to be put into fruition, but even then it is still only in the planning stage.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to conclude my remarks by reading the following article from the Eganville Leader of Thursday, November 19:

QUADEVILLE-FOYMONT ROAD TO BE ASSUMED A SECONDARY HIGHWAY

Mr. Paul Yakabuski, MPP Renfrew South, read a letter from the Honourable C. S. MacNaughton, Ontario Minister of Highways, in which he said that the department had taken the necessary steps to assume the Quadeville-Foymont road as a continuation of secondary Highway 515 from Combermere by way of Palmer Rapids to Quadeville and connect it with Highway 512, Foymont to Eganville by way of Cormac. Effective date of assumption will be April 1, 1965.

Of particular note is the following, and this is the hon. member for the area speaking, he said that:

The Department of Highways was impressed by the magnificent majorities which the electors of both Quadeville and Palmer Rapids polls had consistently given the government over a lengthy period, and in this way the government was showing its appreciation for past favours.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the following questions of the hon. Minister and he can possibly have his officials get the answers—

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): Mr. Chairman, I have been listening to the hon. member—

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Order! What is the point of order?

Mr. Yakabuski: The point of order is, Mr. Chairman, that I do not believe that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville was at the meeting that he mentioned. He read from the newspaper. A report of that appeared in the Eganville Leader some time last fall. Now, we are all aware—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): That is no point of order, Mr. Chairman!

Mr. Yakabuski: The press sometimes—very often—gets the story confused, and I think that is what happened in this case.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Yakabuski: Actually, Mr. Chairman, the editor of the Eganville Leader was only assuming in his own mind why the department took this particular road over and designated it as a secondary highway.

Mr. Singer: That is no point of order!

An hon. member: Yes, it is!

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, just to put it straight on the record, this is from the Eganville Leader, Thursday, November 19, 1964, and I am only reading what the press carries. If the hon. member wishes to deny the thing, that is quite all right; I will take the hon. member at his word. Here is what the paper says:

He said the Department of Highways was impressed by the magnificent majorities which the electors of both Quadeville and Palmer Rapids polls had consistently given the government over a lengthy period and in this way the government was showing its appreciation for past favours.

Mr. Singer: Just as shocking as it was before.

Mr. Newman: Yes!

Mr. Thompson: Who said that, by the way?

Mr. Newman: This is being attributed to the hon. member. If he wishes to deny it; I will take him at his word.

Mr. Yakabuski: The paper is wrong.

Mr. Newman: The papers are wrong; they are not always right.

Mr. Chairman, may I ask of the hon. Minister the following questions? There will only be four or five, and his officials possibly can give us the answers later on.

1. What is the tender price index on road contracts for this year; that is the 1964-65 year.

2. What is the average cost per mile of rural multi-lane limited access roads; urban multi-lane limited access roads?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: A little slower, if you do not mind.

Mr. Newman: Pardon? I beg your pardon.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: A little slower, if you do not mind.

Mr. Newman: Oh, I am sorry, yes.

Rural multi-lane limited access—average cost per mile? Then urban multi-lane limited access.

Then rural, the King's highway; that is the two-lane. Then urban King's highway. These are all rural-urban.

The other two are rural secondary highways, and urban secondary highways.

The last question, and this perhaps the hon. Minister can comment on instead. Has the department ever considered double-decking highways through metropolitan areas?

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Is this from the Eganville paper, too?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to congratulate the hon. Minister in continuing to be the second biggest spender in the provincial government. Also on the success with which he is normally able to conceal the remnants of pork barrelling that apparently continue to exist within his department. Every now and then he has a friend, such as the hon. member for Renfrew South who pulls the curtain aside a little bit, and we get some suggestions of what is going on behind the scenes. But usually, unfortunately, the majority of the hon. Minister's supporters are not that co-operative.

I think it was rather interesting that the hon. member for Renfrew South rose on a point of order, but did not deny the words specifically attributed to him. Now, if he had meant to deny them, I think he should have denied them, and we can only assume that as far as he is concerned the pork barrel system is still in effect in Renfrew county. If that is not so, then I think perhaps the hon. Minister should make that abundantly clear, and give us some reasonable explanation of the statement attributed to the hon. member for Renfrew South in the press.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Would you like me to do that now?

Mr. Bryden: I expect I will only be a few minutes. Perhaps I could finish off, and then you can deal with all the matters that are raised, both by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville and myself.

As a matter of fact, I have only three items that I wish to deal with here, and I think I can deal with them reasonably quickly. Others of my hon. colleagues, and no doubt other hon. members of the House, will have other comments to make with regard to the estimates of The Department of Highways.

One of the difficulties of this department, Mr. Chairman, is to differentiate between general comments and specific comments. As the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville pointed out, we have only three votes all told to cover the second largest volume of estimates in the government.

This is a matter with which I have been concerned, along with some other members, for some time. I have been batting away at every department that comes along whose estimates, in my opinion, are not adequately broken down for consideration by this House, and although the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville has already mentioned the point, I will also put in my two cents' worth. I believe that it should be possible to break down expenditures totalling $329 million into more than three votes.

I realize there are complexities in The Department of Highways, and I am not suggesting that there is any deliberate effort on the part of the department to make its estimates difficult to deal with. I do not think that is true at all. I know there are real complexities in presenting these estimates. I still think they could break them down, nevertheless.

For example, The Department of Public Welfare has a great many grant programmes and capital programmes, and they seem to be able to break them down a good deal more than this department has up until now. I realize the two things are not comparable, but I think if the department would approach its estimates from the point of view of the various administrative agencies concerned with various programmes, and then break them down that way, I think it would be helpful to the House. However, I will not belabour the point. The point has been made before. There are very few departments now which, as far as I can see, fail to present an adequate breakdown of their estimates. I think Highways and perhaps Municipal Affairs are the few remaining hold-outs, and I hope perhaps they will find ways of getting into line in time.

A somewhat larger matter I would like to deal with, Mr. Chairman, relates to the development of transportation policy generally, with regard to this province. I am happy to note that The Department of Highways approaches its responsibilities with some attempt to relate them to overall needs as far as transportation is concerned. It is, as I understand it, conducting a good many transportation studies in major areas throughout the province, with a view to determining the highway needs in relation to the overall transportation problem. For this I think it is to be commended.

I think it is regrettable, however, that apparently The Department of Highways has had to move into this most important area of planning because of what can only be described as the lamentable policy weakness of The Department of Transport. I have suggested on other occasions, and I repeat, that fundamentally this is a responsibility of The Department of Transport. After all, it is more than a highway problem.

Highways, naturally, are a vital part of the total transportation problem, but they are only one part. We should have some overall planning in the government, and what department, other than The Department of Transport, is more suited to consider transportation in all its implications; to work out co-ordinated and integrated transportation problems for the province as a whole and for its various major regions; and to co-ordinate such a programme with a similarly integrated federal transportation policy? We are not going to solve adequately the transportation problems of a growing economy unless we develop ways and means of taking this overall view.

I have had this out many times with The Department of Transport. It seems useless to talk to them; they do not even know—or they did not know when their estimates were before us—what was going on with respect to the one project for which they are supposed to be responsible, and that is the one relating to the Metro Toronto area. The hon. Minister of Highways knew far more about that than the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett).

I am not going to push the point any further; it is a matter we can take up again in Transport estimates.

As for The Department of Highways, I am happy that they have filled the breach, at least to some extent, but I think it is the wrong way of approaching the problem. It fails to produce the overall view of transportation that is desirable. After all, as the hon. Minister said, this is mainly a highways department, it is mainly concerned with, or one of its major concerns is, the construction of highways. I think it has a major task on its hands with that one responsibility, and overall planning should surely be the responsibility of The Department of Transport.

I think the failure to take the global overall approach to the degree that is necessary manifests itself in many anomalies, and, shall I say, serious deficiencies in policy. I am going to present only two examples of that, and I am sure there must be hundreds of them throughout the province. But I will present two with which I happen to be familiar.

First of all I would like to refer to the question of the Toronto subway. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville said that his party, as distinct from the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent), supports the present government's policy with regard to the subsidization of the east-west subway in Toronto. Well, I could try to speculate as to the reason why the Liberals support that policy, but I would like to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that this group here does not support it. It is a grossly inadequate policy. It was a policy that was developed as an emergency in an election campaign when the previous refusal of the government to take any cognizance at all of the need for subway construction became a serious political matter in this area. It brought out a half-baked, half-adequate and half-thought-out programme to meet an immediate political exigency, and that is the programme with which we are still stuck. It is not a proper programme.

What is its subsidization policy with regard to subways? It will pay 33½ per cent of the cost of constructing the actual right-of-way. And in the same Metro area—this is a Metro project—it pays 50 per cent of the cost of constructing expressways. Of course, once an expressway is constructed and paid for, it is then a going concern, it is a transportation unit.

But when a subway has the right-of-way built, it still is far from a going concern.

So there is a discrimination to begin with in the difference between 50 per cent and 33½ per cent, but there is a further discrimination in the fact that the subsidy does not apply to the subway as a going concern.

So what we have is a continuation in a less dramatic way of the previous inadequate and, in my opinion, completely stupid policy of the government. What it does is it encourages, it puts a premium, in the Metro area on constructing expressways. Yet everyone knows that expressways without rapid transit will compound rather than solve our transportation problems.

So it continues to discriminate in favour of expressways, continues to give only a grudging acceptance of the proposition that rapid transit is at least as important in solving transportation problems in an area like this as expressways.

In fact, I think if you are going to give priority to any phase of transportation it should be to rapid transit as against expressway construction, so that you should certainly give not less than 50 per cent subsidy to the subway as a going concern, as an instrument ready to transport people. I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that this is just good economics, even as far as the province is concerned, because to the degree that it encourages rapid transit, it will be able to cut down on the need for expressways and save itself money in the long run.

But we still have this penny-pinching attitude, this failure to look at transportation as a total problem. The policy for, lo, these many years, I think, as a matter of fact, from 1901 when the first road grants were offered in the province of Ontario, has been to provide grants for roads. And to get that out of the head of the department, that transportation grants are only for roads, appears to be a programme that is going to take a great deal of effort. We have a grudging acceptance of the proposition that rapid transit is a necessary part of the transportation picture.

While I am at it, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the hon. Minister that not only should he recommend to the government that subways or rapid transit in this area should be put on the same basis for grants purposes as expressway construction, but while he is at it perhaps he could arrange to get that traffic light in Meaford, and that may stop the hon. member for Grey North from complaining about the consideration given to Toronto as far as subway construction is concerned.

Another example of the defective type of planning that takes place because of the continued orientation towards highways as over against other forms of transport, I think, is well illustrated in the schemozzle that is developing in the Metropolitan Toronto area with regard to the Spadina expressway. Now, here we have a six-lane highway, I believe, a limited access high-speed highway that is being built from the Macdonald-Cartier freeway down, as far as one can make out, to Dupont Street or Bloor Street, somewhere in that area.

As far as I can determine, the decision to go ahead with the Spadina expressway may not have had too much to do with overall transportation policy at all. I think it was perhaps indicative of the power of Eaton's and Simpson's in this area, because the decision to go ahead with it, out of order or priority, seems to have been taken mainly to accommodate the Eaton's and Simpson's Yorkdale shopping plaza. But the results that are going to ensue in terms of transportation problems in this area are really fearful to contemplate.

This high-speed expressway is going to pile traffic in great volume into ordinary city streets in the vicinity of Bloor Street and Dupont Street, and heaven knows where the traffic is going to go to from there. This is the sort of distortion of transportation planning that continues to take place because, as I have suggested, of the orientation, the continued orientation, towards highways instead of towards transportation as a unified, overall problem.

Now then, Mr. Chairman, I have one final matter that I want to deal with while I am leading off on the estimates of this department. It is a matter to which I attach the greatest importance. That is why I consider it important enough to be brought up under what is normally the more general type of subject that one deals with in the introduction of estimates.

A few years ago we had, and continuing over a number of years we had, a good many real battles in this House on the whole question of fair wages and other working conditions on government contracts. After a great deal of pushing and badgering and cajoling we finally got the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) into line and I think practically all of the contracting departments in this government; all except the biggest one, The Department of Highways—in fact, one of the biggest letter-of-contracts in the whole province of Ontario, private or public. In fact, I would suspect it is probably the biggest.

The government, finally, under much pressure agreed to adopt a fair wage policy administered by The Department of Labour. But it continues to exempt The Department of Highways. Now I have no doubt, if the hon. Minister's past performance is any indication, he will advise me that this is a matter for The Department of Labour to consider and The Department of Labour has not yet seen fit to extend the fair wages policy to The Department of Highways, therefore, as the Minister of Highways, he has no particular responsibility. I do not know if that is what he will say, but that is the sort of line he used to take.

Mr. MacDonald: He might have changed it this year.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I do not know, I hope he has a better one than that, but I doubt it. He may also say, as he has said in the past, that in effect The Department of Highways has a fair wage policy.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We have good news for you.

Mr. Bryden: What is your good news?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Do you want me to tell you now, on that one?

Mr. Bryden: Well, if you have changed your policy, is there going to be an amendment to order-in-council 166, vote 65, of January 14, 1965, to make that order-in-council applicable to your department? If so, I will not continue the matter.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: If the hon. member would permit me, we can answer the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville at the same time.

I would say that in a matter of about two or three weeks a fair wage schedule, which will embrace the operations of The Department of Highways, will be implemented. Four weeks or somewhere in that vicinity. The reason it has not been implemented before, of course, is because there has been no way of tying it into the federal fair wage schedule, because the federal authorities have no counterpart of The Department of Highways. They have set up nothing for it. There was nothing comparable to deal with.

But I can tell you that just prior to the presentation of these estimates, I consulted with the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree), and I think he can provide you with the reassurance, if you need it, that within a matter of the two, three, four weeks period that I mentioned, a fair wage schedule will be implemented in The Department of Highways contracts.

Mr. MacDonald: Why could you not have done it ten years ago?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: You did not want to hear that reason. I gave you that one last year, so I am not using that today, I am just giving you a better answer.

Mr. Bryden: I will agree with the hon. Minister that that is a better answer, in fact it is the only good answer he has given on this question up until now.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): The only answer!

Mr. Bryden: It is the only answer as the hon. member for Eglinton says. I really cannot understand the reason now given for the failure to act before. Surely The Department of Labour was competent to determine what the prevailing wages in the area concerned were, without having to have the federal Department of Labour act as wet nurse for it.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Nobody acts as wet nurses for us.

Mr. Bryden: Well, in applying the fair wage policy in the last two or three years, it has not been effective for very long for other departments. I gather that The Department of Labour relied largely on the federal department for schedules that it inserted in contracts.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It is nice to be in concert if you can, I think.

Mr. Bryden: I do not object to the policy. All I say is that it really is remarkable that it took The Department of Labour three years to be able to work out its own schedules, especially since there is not that much difference between the schedules you have. You have much the same trades working on these different operations, so you can use the same schedules.

However, the hon. Minister says—and this is the main thing—that he has finally seen the light, and I take it that for the major part of this construction season there will be a fair wage policy in effect.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I would hope so.

Mr. Bryden: You would hope so. Well, I would hope so, too. I would also hope—perhaps the hon. Minister will be able to clarify this point for me, too—that it will apply to all phases of highway construction. I would also hope that it would include reasonable limitation on hours of work.

I use the words reasonable limitation advisedly, because I think there are different phases of highway construction in which the hours probably have to be dealt with differently. But I hope we will not continue in construction work on structures, for example, with the 63-hour week that one contractor that I could name usually follows on structures, when other contractors who are also working on structures are following a 40-hour week. I hope we can get this down to a 40-hour week, or at least to the 44-hour week that is set forth in the current fair wage order-in-council.

As for paving work, I can understand that there are difficulties there. There are only certain times when you can do paving work, and you want to get as much in as possible. But I still think that it should be possible to regulate the hours on paving work to some degree, even though perhaps 44 or 40 hours a week might be a little too restrictive.

At any rate, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the announcement the hon. Minister has made. I am glad he made it. It saved me maybe another ten minutes in my speech. I welcome this.

Mr. Reilly: That is why he made it.

Mr. Bryden: I may say that I am going to watch the application of this policy very carefully. I just want to make sure there are not any ifs and buts and exemptions and exceptions. You see, I got fooled once before, back in 1963, when they passed the first fair wage order-in-council. I thought the problem had been solved, and we did not need to worry about it any more, and then I discovered that the biggest contractor had been left out of the thing. So, I am going to be watching it.

But I am glad to hear the hon. Minister's announcement today. I take it as the culmination of a campaign that has been carried on over a good many years from this side of the House, and, I think I can fairly say, by both groups on this side of the House.

I remember in the past, that Mr. Edwards, who used to be one of the members from the Hamilton area, pursued this every year along with hon. members over here, and I suppose one can say that it is indicative of the fact that opposition has a role. I know that the gentlemen over here think we talk too much, and the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) sometimes thinks we are filibustering. But if we had not been talking a lot and frequently and persistently about fair wages, I am quite sure we would not now have achieved the implementation in Ontario of a policy that was first implemented in Canada—that is in the federal jurisdiction of Canada—about 50 years ago.

So Ontario, which sets itself up as leading the way is now, after 50 years, catching up to the government of Canada, and with many of the other provinces. This, I am happy to know, and I congratulate the hon. Minister on having finally seen the light on this, and I will be looking forward with some interest to see the manner in which the policy is applied.

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Deputy Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report that it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will proceed with the estimates of The Department of Highways and possibly those of the Attorney General; and if there is time tomorrow evening we will go on with The Department of Public Works.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 5.50 o'clock, p.m.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton), from the standing committee on highways and tourism, presented the committee's first report, which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills with certain amendments:

Bill No. 66, An Act to amend The Public Service Works on Highways Act.

Bill No. 115, An Act to amend The Highway Traffic Act.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table in this Legislature the third annual report of the Ontario police commission covering the activities of the commission for the calendar year 1964.

The report is submitted pursuant to section 39, subsection A-7, of The Police Act. It deals with all phases of police training, administration and activity in the field of law enforcement and the administration of justice, which is an important area coming within the purview of The Department of the Attorney General.

I would draw the attention of hon. members of this House to the progress which has been made in developing the organization of the Ontario police commission, and you will note the addition of three advisers on police services as well as an intelligence section, consisting of two intelligence officers with an executive officer and secretarial staff. This additional staff has equipped the commission to carry out the functions and duties which it was designed to perform, pursuant to The Police Act; and a perusal of the report will, I believe, satisfy the hon. members of this House that the duties of the commission are being performed capably and effectively.

The report contains very considerable information with respect to municipal police forces in the province, of which there are 280 responsible for their own policing and maintaining police forces of various strengths. A survey of police forces and policing throughout the province, commenced in the year 1964, has now covered almost all of these municipalities, 182 having been surveyed during the year under review. It is expected that the survey will be completed in June of this year. This is the first time that such a survey has ever been undertaken. Sufficient information has been obtained to show the pattern and problems of policing in Ontario, and the report contains suggestions and recommendations of the commission which I commend to the attention of hon. members.

Part of the report is devoted to the Ontario police college. The expansion of the facilities of the college, and the additional training which can be afforded to members of municipal and provincial police forces, is having a very beneficial effect upon policing generally; and the expansion of the work of the Ontario police college is an important part of our programme to assist municipalities and improve local police forces.

One section of the report describes the installation of a telecommunications system, commenced in the latter part of 1964 and now practically completed. In the words of the report it:

—is considered the finest and only system of its type in the world today. This system will immeasurably facilitate the apprehension of accused persons and, by covering the province with such a system of fast, accurate intercommunication, will help to bring the province to the highest degree of police efficiency.

I would draw the attention of hon. members to the excellent liaison and co-operation which exists between the Ontario police commission and the Ontario provincial police force which, for certain purposes, comes under the direction of the commission pursuant to section 40, subsection 2, of The Police Act. The report also notes the constant liaison which is maintained with other police forces in Ontario as well as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Quebec provincial police, Quebec municipal police, and police forces in foreign countries, particularly those of the United States, and other foreign law enforcement agencies. Much is being done to co-ordinate the police forces of Ontario as well as to co-operate with police forces outside the province.

A section of the report deals with the subject of the investigation of crime, for which the intelligence section was particularly designed and established. On this subject, I may add to what is said in the report: that, from my own knowledge, the intelligence section is functioning quietly and efficiently and without undue publicity which, in my view, is the way it should perform.

There are other matters of much interest which are not referred to in this brief statement, and I would urge all hon. members to read the report.

The report of the commissioner of the Ontario provincial police force is submitted as a separate report pursuant to section 41(a) of The Police Act. It covers the calendar year 1964, is a very complete document and is also tabled herewith.

Additional copies of both reports are being printed for the use of hon. members.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, if I may comment just very briefly in connection with what the hon. Attorney General has said: The hon. Attorney General's estimates are likely to be reached perhaps today or tomorrow, and it places some of us under a very severe difficulty if we do not have these reports available for study so that they can be properly discussed when the estimates come up.

I was wondering if the hon. Attorney General could make available immediately at least one set of copies of each of these reports to one member of the Opposition?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would say, Mr. Speaker, that I will do my best. When the hon. member says "immediately" I do not mean that I can do that perhaps this afternoon but I am quite sure, by the use of duplicating equipment, that we can certainly make a number of copies of the report of the Ontario police commission available. I would be very glad to do that. The report of the Ontario provincial police commissioner is quite a voluminous thing. I think we can duplicate it. Perhaps it may take a day to do, or something like that, but I can certainly have extra copies available, I am quite sure, perhaps by this evening or, at the very latest, tomorrow.

Mr. Singer: Well, I hope so. If we are going to debate the hon. Attorney General's estimates we should be given a fair chance.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would like to say that these reports have not been held up; they have just been received during the last week.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan), notice of which has been given him.

Would the hon. Minister explain how a syndicate of life insurance firms, headed by London Life Insurance Company, was able to quote on February 22, 1965, on the medical-surgical plan mentioned in the civil service arbitration award, when that award was not tabled in this House until March 1, 1965?

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, I may say, in reply to the hon. member's question, that the arbitration award does not set out specific terms of a medical-surgical plan; it only limits the costs of a plan to be determined by the staff and official sides of the Ontario joint council.

This determination as to the type of plan has not yet been made; therefore the government has not been able to request or receive quotations on the medical-surgical plan, and cannot do so until agreement is reached concerning the details of the plan.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. Minister for his answer. I would like him to answer a supplementary question.

Can the hon. Minister give us assurance that the government will not oppose the association's request—which, I understand, has been made—that their present carrier, PSI, be given an opportunity to bid on the medical-surgical plan?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, I may say that due consideration will be given to their representation.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which has been submitted to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and it is:

What are the provisions decreed by protocol as to the position and height of the Maple Leaf, Canada's new flag, in relation to the Union Jack or any other flag; is it the plan of this government to conform to protocol in the erection of the new flagpole at Queen's Park; does the government plan to fly the Maple Leaf on its provincial government buildings?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to the position and height of Canada's new flag in relation to other flags, so far as can be ascertained no regulations have yet been issued, or discussed with the provinces, by the federal government. So far as this government is concerned the national flag takes the position of precedence when flown with other flags.

On the grounds in front of the Parliament buildings a second flagpole will be erected. The Canadian flag will fly from a pole on the right and the provincial flag will be flown from a pole on the left, according to custom.

The policy of this government is to continue to fly such flags, including the Canadian flag, over provincial government buildings as the occasion requires and custom and usage may determine.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask of the hon. Prime Minister by way of order of business, if there is any possibility of getting an answer to question number 51, prior to consideration of the estimates of The Department of Insurance. It has been on the order paper now for a couple of months.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I do not really know what question number 51 is, but I will look it up and see if we can get an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The fifteenth order; House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

ESTIMATES,
DEPARTMENT OF HIGHWAYS

On vote 801:

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the specific matters associated with the votes on the estimates of the department, I would like, if I may, to reply briefly to some of the matters raised by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. Newman) when he addressed the House yesterday. I would say to him that these matters may not come up in just the order in which he presented them when he commented.

First, the hon. member proposed in his speech yesterday that the department should undertake studies as an aid to municipalities dealing with maintenance methods and procedures. I am pleased to advise the hon. member and the House that such a study is currently being planned. In an address I gave at the 1965 convention of the Ontario good roads association on February 23, I stated:

But to deal for a moment or two with the important matter of maintenance, hand in hand with the construction of new road facilities and the assumption of additional mileage of provincial highways, as can be expected, our maintenance problems and expenditures have increased to the extent that maintenance costs now form a substantial portion of our highways budget. It is no more than logical to assume that municipalities are confronted with similar costs and problems.

It would also seem timely for us to undertake a comprehensive study of maintenance methods and procedures to ensure the most economical organization and operation possible, and if this is a sensible procedure at the level of The Department of Highways, it seems equally sensible to extend such a study to include problems of maintenance confronting the municipalities.

We hope to embark on such studies shortly and I will bring this to your attention now—since the conclusions we reach can be of benefit to all road authorities in the province—in the hope that an excellent opportunity of not only improving maintenance procedures but effecting substantial savings can result.

I would add, Mr. Chairman, that since I made that statement, officials of this department have held discussions with both the county and the city engineers advisory committee, which have promised their unanimous support. An early start can be expected, with the cost, of course, being borne by The Department of Highways.

As to the matter of the resolutions from the cities of Barrie and Port Arthur, I believe it will be interesting to the hon. member to read from a letter addressed recently to the secretary of the Ontario good roads association by the Deputy Minister, particularly because his remarks are pertinent to the resolutions to which the hon. member referred yesterday.

The resolution of the city of Barrie: "Increased schedule for provincial subsidy."

Over the last few years there have been a number of changes resulting in increased subsidies affecting all levels of municipalities. These changes came about as a result of study, and in this regard I would point out that we are continually giving the matters of subsidies attention, and if the past record can be considered as establishing a trend, increased subsidies in the future are entirely within the realm of possibility.

Before the provincial government has exclusive rights, as pointed out in the brief, to registration and vehicle fuel taxation, the amount collected does not equal the amount being spent by the province for construction, maintenance, safety and control of traffic on highways and subsidies to municipalities for the same purpose.

Recognition of the municipalities' need for assistance for the construction and maintenance of roads and streets is borne out by the fact that the amount being devoted to municipal subsidies is increasing at a faster rate than that directed toward the construction and maintenance of King's highways and secondary highways.

In any event, as pointed out, the matter of subsidies is continually under review.

Concerning the resolution of the city of Port Arthur requesting a subsidy of 90 per cent to 100 per cent on King's highways in trans-Canada highway municipalities, the general statement regarding Barrie's resolution would apply. I would further point out the fact that any particular connecting link that forms part of the trans-Canada highway does not in itself mean that the traffic will be heavier than on other connecting links. As a matter of fact there are many connecting links on highways, particularly in southern Ontario, which have much heavier volumes of traffic and a much larger percentage of heavy truck traffic than the designated trans-Canada route.

The resolution of the united counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry, with respect to the use of rust inhibitor in salt, I think was dealt with rather comprehensively when I commented on that subject before the orders of the day a number of weeks ago.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's next observation—although I may not be dealing with it in the order in which he made it—made reference to the completion of the four lanes on the Macdonald-Cartier freeway and I do not propose to comment on this at any great length. There has been altogether enough said on it over the last few years. While I have usually refrained from using the device of reading newspaper articles and editorials as the basic portion of any address I have given in this House, I am going to resort to the expedient used by the hon. member to such a considerable extent and read an editorial dated January 11, in the Windsor Star, a paper that he quotes widely and frequently.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): It is so good you really cannot resist it.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think this one is really significant. I notice that this was not one of the editorials that he felt disposed to read yesterday. It is not my material; it is written by John Lindblatt, an editor on the Windsor Star with whom I am sure the hon. member is familiar. He says:

Remember all the moaning and groaning about the incomplete Highway 401, Macdonald-Cartier freeway—soon to get a political name that had people from these parts ready to burn the government in effigy? Yes, and more than one Ontario Cabinet Minister will recall that the death toll kept increasing because it was being stalled in this area. Drivers took Highway 2 to London and back.

Scores never lived to see the end of the trip over the years. When work on 401 dragged, motorists would zoom along the city sections of the four-lane divided highway and when they hit the unfinished sections and went back to undivided two-lane driving more died. The people screamed and their screams paid off. All but 20 miles of the road is now completed. Work on that section is moving well. When it is completed Windsorites will be able to drive from here to the Quebec border on safer highways but people will still die.

We were among the loudest screamers for government action. We still are but a test drive of the highway just completed left us feeling sorry for the government. Frankly, we submit that much of the death talk against the government was a bum rap, as they say in the late or late-late movie.

Item, you are now sitting on the passenger's side with us. We are on the divided section heading out of Windsor. Traffic is light, the road is dry, it is in the late morning. Visibility is good. Look behind you. See that car coming up on us? We are doing 60. At the rate he is approaching he must be doing 80. There he goes. See how he roars past and is starting to "leap frog" those trucks ahead. Sure the road is divided but what could he do in an emergency? At the speed he is going he could not control his car.

We are on the unfinished section now. All around us there are signs saying, "Don't pass," warning that the 60-mile-per-hour speed limit is rigid. Look behind you. Keep your eye on the red sports job coming up. He is speeding. He is coming past us now. A truck is coming the other way and behind him a car is trying to pass. He cut back in forcing us to hit the brakes.

Drive it at night and the same stuff happens, only it is worse. Signs are ignored and so is safety. It is in the odds that someone will die on that section soon. Whose fault? The government? Hardly. Yet the way drivers pass the buck they blame the government for accidents. They also blame the car.

There is only one place where the blame lies: behind the wheel. So when do we wise up? Drive that highway, finished or unfinished, and you realize that some will never wise up. We are still jittery, but do not blame the government.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Sounds like a good Tory!

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: He did not always write that way, I can tell you, as most people in Windsor will know.

Now the matter of the Highway 400 service centre. I would like to comment on this briefly, if I may.

Highway 400 was the first fully controlled access highway to be constructed in Ontario. This control of access eliminated the establishment of independent gasoline/restaurant operations on the highway and, consequently, motorists were required to obtain such services at off-highway establishments. It was, and probably still would be, a source of annoyance to highway travellers who were forced to take long inconvenient hauls off the highway.

In addition, there was no guarantee that service would be available since facilities were not open on a 24-hour basis. There was, therefore, a very definite public demand for the establishment of service centres on Highway 400, to provide assistance to the travelling public, not only in respect to mechanical breakdown of vehicles, but also for telephone service and washroom and restaurant facilities.

To meet this demand the department investigated service centre operations in both the United States and Europe and formulated a policy to establish six centres at various interchanges between Highway 401 and Barrie.

I would point out, in connection with the matters raised by the hon. member, and I think this is highly significant, that traffic volume on the section of highway concerned has risen, since 1954, at the site of the present British American Oil site, from 5,400 to 10,000 AADT; at the present Shell site, from 6,000 to 14,500; and at the proposed site, south of Barrie, from 5,200 to 10,000—or, in most circumstances, have doubled.

The installation of these service centres, I might point out to the hon. members of the House, is to provide a much needed service to the driving public. And again, to resort to the reading of the comments of others, I do feel constrained to read an editorial from the Orillia Newsletter, headlined:

PUT DRIVERS' RIGHTS FIRST, ROADS MINISTER ASKED

Move to stop further service station and restaurant licences on Highway No. 400 between Barrie and Toronto is not regarded in the general interests of the motoring public. Motorists who travel this highway, in particular, are concerned with the lack of service station facilities.

Motorists who have car trouble on the highway should be of prime concern to the government, according to a representative motorist who made a typical comment. He said he could understand the desire of businessmen farther up the highway to seek business but the relatively few service centres on this highway had been a real hardship to some. If the government deserves criticism it is not for allowing more service centres rather than fewer, said the motorist, who expressed the general view of many using the highway.

The Minister of Highways is expected to listen to representations against the proposed new service centre but the viewpoint of motorists, transport and truck drivers using the highway should also be considered. Motorists are not particularly desirous of an elaborate centre but they feel more ordinary service stations along this stretch of highway is a real need.

I read that, Mr. Chairman, into the record, to point out simply that this is a two-way street. There are two sides to the story. The driving public, the motorist, the tourist if you like, upon whom we place such reliance, is entitled to this kind of service.

The hon. member yesterday, or someone, in commenting mentioned that a Mr. Stanley had indicated a gasoline gallonage loss, by virtue of the location at the Barrie station, of some three million gallons a year. In pursuing this matter we find, and we can substantiate, that the busiest service centre on Highway 401, or Highway 400, has not yet reached the one million gallon per year figure; so this is quite an exaggeration.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Minister, this is a total volume loss to all the retailers in the area.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, if it is a total volume loss, then it all would have to accrue to this service centre; and no service centre is capable, I think, as yet, of doing that volume of business. The inference is that, as a result of this installation, they would lose three million gallons of gas in terms of patronage. We know of no service centre which, as yet, has reached one million gallons in terms of volume. So, if this one reaches a million, then of course your friend, Mr. Stanley, has exaggerated the situation by about three times.

Another item referred to by the hon. member was the consideration of "double decking" highways. I would point out that this is a matter which has been given consideration from time to time, when planning work in urban areas. However, I would also like to point out that any decision to undertake this type of work would have to be justified from an economic standpoint; and, to date, this type of construction has proven much too costly, so it has not been undertaken.

It should not be assumed, however, that such construction will not take place in the future. Our decision in this matter could be affected by relative costs, possibly new developments in construction techniques, availability of land, and a number of determining factors; but I repeat that, up to this point, it has not been felt expedient or economical to "double deck" our roads as you suggested.

The next matter of interest, I believe, refers to the lack of planning. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville yesterday referred to lack of planning which involves certain expropriations, and the high cost of acquiring right-of-way requirements for the Macdonald-Cartier freeway in the Toronto bypass section.

Actually, Mr. Chairman, I could tell the House that the reverse is the case. To make a comparison, and with complete respect to Metro and the problems they face, the cost of land requirements for the elevated sections of the Gardiner expressway involved some $7 million per mile. But because of the fact that long-term foresight and planning provided for acquisition of the major portion of the department's land requirements in the Toronto bypass section, to accommodate the widening now under way, the total cost of additional land requirements involved a total of $12 million, or only about one-and-a-half times the cost per mile of Metro referred to above. Actually this cost works out to about $600,000 per mile.

I say this because, in all substantial terms, the major portion of the right-of-way requirements for the Toronto bypass were acquired many years ago. And while no one would attempt to say that this is not a large amount of money—of course it is a large amount of money—I leave it to the hon. member to judge for himself what the cost would have been if the long-term and farsighted planning to which I have made reference, had not been implemented many years ago. In other words, if we had left it till today to acquire this property, the costs would have soared and risen to very, very substantial proportions, vastly in excess of the figure to which I have made reference.

And now, Mr. Chairman, as I recall it, yesterday the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville was somewhat critical of my reference to 8,080,000,000 vehicle miles travelled on provincial highways alone, contrasting this with a much larger figure in the state of Michigan. But to use a fair comparison, he should have said that more than 22 billion vehicle miles were travelled in the province of Ontario on all roads, including those under municipal jurisdiction, because this was the comparable figure he used when commenting on the per-vehicle mileage in the state of Michigan.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may reply to that at this moment on this same topic, I was using Michigan 1960 figures, not 1965.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We took the time and trouble to check this out today and the comparable figures now for Michigan are something in excess of 30 billion vehicle miles per year, as the hon. member says, but the comparable figure in Ontario is 22 billion miles. I think I should point out to the hon. member and to the House that it should be seen, and I think should be admitted, that Michigan has a higher population approximating nine million, and one of the highest if not the highest per-capita ownership of vehicles of all kinds in North America.

The figure referred to by the hon. member as related to the state of Michigan exceeds by only minimal proportions the same figure when applied to the province of Ontario. In fact, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member made repeated references involving the extent to which other jurisdictions were much better than our own province of Ontario. I say to you, sir, that I rather prefer to think that our own excellent jurisdiction is one of the best in terms of road facilities and I would point out to the hon. member that this opinion is widely held, not only on the North American continent but indeed in other countries around the world.

Mr. Singer: The Patagonians speak well of you, too.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: This is a great province—this province of Ontario—just as good as Michigan any day in the week.

As I recall it, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville made reference to the completion of some 784 miles, I believe, of controlled access highway in the state of Michigan. The state of Michigan comes up quite frequently in the remarks he made. He contrasted this with a somewhat slower pace of progress in terms of completion of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway—some 510 miles stretching from Michigan to the Quebec border. When I pointed out to him yesterday that this U.S. figure was very largely part of the interstate highway system and as such it was eligible for a contribution of about 90 per cent by the federal government, the hon. member indicated it did not really matter where the funds came from.

This, Mr. Chairman, is an attitude I find very difficult to understand. I would point out to him that outside of certain cost-sharing agreements associated with mining and access roads and roads to resources, the principal contribution of the federal government toward roads in Ontario amounts to 50 per cent of the cost of the trans-Canada highway only. All other provincial highways, including the Macdonald-Cartier freeway, are built from funds made available to the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) from the earnings and the savings of the people of Ontario. I leave it to him, or anyone else for that matter, to say whether contributions from the federal government in terms of 90 per cent of the entire capital cost toward the Macdonald-Cartier freeway, which conforms identically to an interstate freeway in every respect, would not have made possible a very great acceleration in our programme of construction. Also, as I said, the hon. member stated that it really did not matter where the funds came from. I contend that it matters a great deal.

I would like to draw one more comparison with the state of Michigan and I think it is fair to point out that its total mileage of roads or streets approaches a figure of 111,000 miles, whereas in the province of Ontario the comparable figure is 85,000 miles. Again, when population and vehicle registration are compared, the figures I think are favourable and speak for themselves.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member requested some information concerning tender price indices and I have this information for him here today. We go back, Mr. Chairman, I should explain, to the base year 1950-51, which constitutes 100, and then we take the composite index for each year thereafter: in 1951-52, 135.9; 1952-53, 128.3; 1953-54, 107.8; 1954-55, 111; 1955-56, 129.4; 1956-57, 156.8; 1957-58, 135.4; 1958-59, 124.2; 1959-60, 129.1; 1960-61, 124.2; 1961-62, 112.3; 1962-63, 129; and 1963-64, 150.6. The composite average for the year just completed—I might say from April 1 to December 31, 1964—is 151.9. These figures are made up of a grading index, a paving index, and a structures index, resulting in the composite index that I have indicated to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the House in reply to the hon. member's question.

Finally, I have the requested information regarding cost of construction associated firstly with rural multi-lane road facilities, including structures. To answer his question, we have taken some samples which I think will serve the purpose quite nicely. On the Macdonald-Cartier freeway for instance, one mile east of Lancaster, easterly to the Quebec boundary, the total value of this section of eight miles was $5,697,000, and the cost per mile $712,125. This was concrete pavement. Highway 405 is from the junction of the Queen Elizabeth way to the International bridge, a distance of 5.4 miles and similar in every respect. The total value of this section of 405 was $4,540,000, and the cost per mile $840,741, again concrete pavement.

Second, I will deal with urban multi-lane facilities, including structures. For sake of illustration we have chosen the Ottawa Queensway, a total length of 10 miles. The total value of this section of the Queensway is $35 million, for a cost per mile of $3.5 million.

Thirdly, I will take a rural King's highway, including paving. Reference is made here to a section of Highway 46 in the Balsam Lake area from secondary Highway 505 easterly to Highway 35, a distance of 9.1 miles. The total value in this instance is $1,060,000, and the cost per mile $116,484.

Again, for comparison purposes and getting down more into southwestern Ontario, on Highway 6, from Dornoch to Chatsworth is a section involving 9.3 miles. The total value here was $1,130,000 and the cost per mile $121,505. In this instance we have taken two examples—one in the more northern part of the province and one in the southern part—and you will find the figures in this instance compare very favourably.

The fourth is urban King's highway, including paving. For example purposes we use Highway 60 and 62 at Barry's Bay—one mile of road. The total value is $277,000. On Highway 8, .87 miles in the vicinity of Seaforth is work on a connecting link, I believe. The total value is $195,000, which makes the per-mile cost $224,000. This, of course, would be a situation where curbs, gutters and the usual improvements are associated with the urban King's highway.

As to a rural secondary highway, which usually involves no more than grading, drainage and granular base—they are not always paved—reference is made here to Highway 631, southerly from Hornepayne 6.7 miles. The total value here is $519,000, the cost per mile $97,463.

He asked about an urban secondary highway; there is no such thing, to my knowledge, as a true, urban, secondary highway.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that—

Mr. Newman: If you will excuse me, Mr. Minister, will you repeat the cost for the rural, secondary type of highway?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Rural secondary highway?

Mr. Newman: Yes, the last figure you quoted.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes. The total value of the section—and it is on Highway 631 from Hornepayne southerly, a total of 6.7 miles—is $519,000 and, per mile, $97,463.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would briefly reply to the observations of the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden). To comment on the subject matter of his comments, I would first make reference to his criticism that the Highways estimates are presented under three votes. When contrasted with the number of votes employed by other departments this may appear to be somewhat irregular, but I would point out to him that each of the votes is itemized in rather comprehensive detail and does provide ample opportunity for full debate.

I was particularly interested and gratified to have him comment in commendatory fashion regarding the planning function of the department, and the manner and extent to which all areas of transportation requirements associated with the department's programme are undertaken. Certainly, we feel that too much stress cannot be given to the importance of these studies; we regard it as particularly important to know and to show why and where the road facilities of the province should be built, now and in the future. The matter of how, of course, is important but it is technical in character; our engineers not only can, but do, keep abreast with techniques such as design, engineering, and construction methods.

I would further bring to his attention, and to the attention of the hon. members of the House, that there is a greater degree of liaison and co-operation between various departments involved with these overall matters than he is probably aware of. We are in constant and close touch with The Department of Transport, and the The Department of Municipal Affairs in particular. The results of their studies and statistics are made available to us constantly and we share such information with them. And to this extent I believe it is fair to say that certain of the criticisms he levelled, when he addressed the House yesterday, are not as valid as they appear to be. Nevertheless, I concur with him completely regarding the importance of planning, not only at the level of The Department of Highways but by all associated agencies working in close co-operation.

To refer once more to the matter of the three votes under which the estimates of The Department of Highways are presented, I believe he, as a member of the public accounts committee, is aware that this matter has been taken into consideration by the committee. No doubt some recommendations will eventually be placed before the department and the government, at which time, I think I can give the hon. member assurance, the recommendations will be given proper consideration.

Mr. Singer: Yes, Mr. Chairman, on the first vote, and I am not too sure whether this matter comes under the first vote or the third vote; I would imagine it could be dealt with, really, under either one. It deals with a series of complaints, which I have received from constituents of mine, on the effect made on their homes by the construction of Highway 401.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It should be vote 803, but it does not matter.

Mr. Singer: I would imagine that several other hon. members have received the same sort of complaints. The hon. member for Armourdale (Mr. Carton) is not here but the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) is here, and there was a meeting a short time ago when five or six—pardon?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It should be vote 803, but it does not matter.

Mr. Singer: Well, it does not matter; as I say, it could be argued either way. We might as well do it now.

The problem is, and I am going to refer to this gentleman particularly because he has quite an extensive file of correspondence which I have seen, and which I know the department has seen. This gentleman lives very close to Highway 401, or the Macdonald-Cartier highway; and, as the widening process began and went along, the quiet street that ran in front of his home suddenly became an access route for the heavy construction vehicles which have to use it.

There was a lot of building, and there were a lot of vehicles, and the vehicles were carrying heavy rocks and stone and all sorts of construction materials. This gentleman believes that, as a result of this sort of activity, his home was seriously damaged; cracks began to appear in the walls and various signs of deterioration in his home were observed. He was of the opinion that this damage was caused as a result of the construction activities. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that through the course of discussions involving this matter anyone has denied either that damage was caused to this gentleman's home, or that the damage resulted from the widening of the highway.

The amount of the damage, as I understand it, is apparently minimal—a few hundred dollars perhaps. Now, how does our friend go about getting some satisfaction? He says, "Through no fault of mine, my home has been damaged, and the damage has been caused because the province is widening a highway. I feel that someone should repair that damage or pay me the cost."

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): What did you tell him?

Mr. Singer: Well, let me tell you. In the fall of 1964 he communicated, first, with various officials of The Department of Highways. And I gather the answer that he got was: We will look into it, and we will see what we can to help you.

On February 9, 1965, he addressed a letter to Mr. Tregaskes, who is the construction engineer, or one of the construction engineers in The Department of Highways, and he said this:

Further to our telephone conversation of yesterday, as I explained, we have now waited several months since your various inspectors visited our home and we have heard nothing from you. We should very much appreciate discussing this matter with you since we want to arrange for the cleaning and repairs necessitated by the movement of trucks during the construction period in our area.

We trust that we will have your prompt attention and co-operation in this matter and look forward to hearing from you at your first convenience.

That letter is dated February 9. He is in receipt of a letter, marked, "without prejudice" dated March 2, signed by Mr. I. S. Bailey, assistant supervisor, insurance and claims office, Department of Highways.

Mr. Bailey writes:

Re your damage claim with regard to the widening of Highway 401—

I guess the new name has not quite gotten through to the department because the heading on the letter is:

RE HIGHWAY 401

This is with reference to your letter of February 9 addressed to Mr. Tregaskes, our construction engineer, and our telephone conversation yesterday.

You will recall that I mentioned to you that on November 2, 1964, I wrote to the contractor concerned, namely, Dufferin Construction Company, of 2700 Dufferin Street, Toronto, and advised them of your claim, although up to that time, as I told you, we had not received an official claim from you in writing.

The reason the matter was referred to Dufferin Construction Company is that, under the terms of the contract, the contractor indemnifies the department and holds it harmless from and against any damage claims arising out of the contract. In these circumstances, it is regretted that the department is unable to accept any responsibility and I can only suggest that the matter be pursued with the construction firm.

I think I also mentioned to you that I received a letter dated November 20, 1964, from Dufferin Construction Company, who informed me that the matter had been referred to their insurance company for investigation and whatever action they considered necessary.

I am writing to the Dufferin Construction Company today and I am sending them a copy of the letter which you wrote to Mr. Tregaskes on February 9.

And then there is a copy of the letter, enclosed with his letter, that Mr. Bailey wrote to the Dufferin Construction Company.

Time moves on a bit and eventually the Dufferin Construction Company referred the matter to a firm called J. W. Randall and Company, insurance adjusters.

Finally this gentleman gets a letter dated March 30, 1965, from J. W. Randall and Company, insurance adjusters, which reads as follows:

We refer to our recent telephone conversation.

And I might say, in an aside, that none of these letters seems to have come forth without a couple of telephone calls in between to rather push them forward.

We would confirm our interest in acting on behalf of the liability insurers of the construction company in which the claim advanced by you has been passed on for our attention. Our investigation reveals that, from the time the work commenced on highway widening projects, on or about March 9, 1964 until its completion, there were in all eight contracting firms involved in this construction project, identified as follows: Alnor Earth Moving Limited of Oshawa; Valentine Enterprises of Toronto; R. A. Farley Construction Company of Guelph; Inspiration Limited of Toronto; Crawford-Ontario Sand and Gravel of Maple; Johnson Brothers Trucking Limited of Milton; MacNamara Construction Company of 42 Industrial Road, Toronto.

And here comes the punch line:

This is to advise you we are not prepared to accept responsibility for any damage to your home allegedly resulting from highway widening projects.

Mr. Chairman, the message is obvious as stated here in the correspondence.

The Department of Highways says that under the terms of our contract with Dufferin Construction we have asked them to take out liability insurance because we want to protect you, Mr. Citizen, in the event that any damage results to your home. So, in letting our contracts, we tell our head contractor, Dufferin Construction Company, "Before we will give you a contract you must have a policy that is going to protect any citizen against any damage."

Good! Then poor Mr. Citizen suffers from damage and he tries to find out who is going to protect him. Well, says The Department of Highways, "We did our job. We gave the contract to Dufferin and they have a policy, so off you go to Dufferin; or, if you want to, write them a letter and tell them that they must have a policy and they must do something about it."

So off he goes to Dufferin, and Dufferin sends it off to their adjuster who says, "Oh, ho. In the period during which the highway was being constructed not only were we there but seven other fellows were there as well. We do not know whether our trucks caused the damage; we do not know if it was one of the other seven we named; we do not know if it was Alnor, or Valentine, or Farley, or Inspiration, or Crawford-Ontario, or Johnson, or MacNamara. And you, Mr. Citizen, you have to prove it; you have to tell us whether it was a Dufferin truck that damaged the house; and if it was not, you are out of luck. Even if you cannot prove it was a Dufferin truck, but that it was one of these other seven, you are out of luck, too, because apparently the chain of command does not extend that far.

What is poor Mr. Citizen supposed to do? Is he supposed to sit out in front of his house, from the time the highway construction is started, and take the name and licence number of every truck that goes by his house; record the time carefully; and then, in the meantime, run back and forth from inside his house, from front to back, so that he can check inside to see if the cracks have appeared and be able to say that "On August 7, 1963, at 4.14 p.m. a crack suddenly appeared in the side dining room wall of the house and, at 4.13, a truck from Dufferin Construction passed by"?

Mr. Chairman, the wool is being pulled over the eyes of any citizen who believes that, under this system, he has any possible protection. Here is a citizen who says he had damage occasioned to his home by the construction of the highway. In all of this correspondence—and this has gone on for several months—nobody has seen fit to deny that damage took place; and I would think that if there was any suggestion that no damage took place it would have been revealed in the correspondence.

No one has seen fit to put an estimate on it, so that there is not even the suggestion that what this gentleman believes would be fair compensation for him is an exorbitant request. Nobody, in fact, has ever discussed with him the dollar damage, but he says—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: They have.

Mr. Singer: Not as it was revealed to me. But he says, "Fine. The damage took place and I would like somebody to assume the responsibility."

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Who?

Mr. Singer: Who? Well, I would say that it is the responsibility of the hon. Minister; I would say that it is the responsibility of the province of Ontario; because it is by the department's action in widening the highway that damage has taken place to this man's home.

Now, for a $300 or $500 claim, surely the hon. Minister cannot expect the average citizen to pursue, through the courts, the province of Ontario, the Dufferin Construction Company, and the seven other companies I named.

Can the hon. Minister just imagine—and I am sure his legal advisers have told him this—can he just imagine the complication of an action like that, and the expense of an action like that? The examination for discovery could go on for days and the cost of that sort of procedure would run into many thousands of dollars; and the chances of ever being able to pinpoint a specific truck and a specific driver and a specific firm which caused the damage are almost negligible—even if someone was able and prepared to undertake that kind of legal expense.

But the basic facts are obvious, Mr. Chairman. The highway is constructed; it is constructed by the province of Ontario; and the citizen who sits beside the highway minding his own business has his house damaged. So he looks to the province for compensation, or for some remedy, and there is none.

I would say, sir, that this is a very serious result caused by a reasonable activity of the province; that individual citizens are being forced to bear a very substantial burden unjustly, and that they are being denied any remedy.

What are the solutions? Well, there are two or three. And I may say here—and the hon. Minister knows this—I have discussed this with his deputy and with Mr. Crosbie, the senior man in his legal department—that there are two or three solutions. I think that one of these has to be undertaken almost immediately by the department and by government so that it will be fair with the citizens of Ontario who are affected in this way.

Number one is that if these insurance companies are going to give citizens the run-around, by what they are doing, then this kind of insurance policy should not be accepted.

When you let these contracts, and if you let it to Dufferin or to anybody else—and I do not say Dufferin is the villain, I think it is the system that is wrong—you should be in a position to insist that the type of policy that is written will protect the citizen against this type of damage if it can be attributed to the widening of the highway, no matter which subcontractor or which truck was the cause of it, or which combination of vehicles. I think that is the most obvious solution.

You are going to hear the cry from the contractors, or from the insurance companies, "Oh, we could never write a policy like that"; but I suggest to you, sir, if you get that sort of an excuse or that sort of a complaint about this suggestion, then it is just not factual. Because if the highways department, which is the biggest contractor in the province, says this is the only way we are going to let contracts, then there will be insurance companies to write this kind of policy; and in that case, if that kind of policy is there, then there is going to be no excuse for the type of letter written by J. W. Randall and Company, insurance adjusters.

I cannot blame J. W. Randall and Company, insurance adjusters. Their job is to save their principals as much money as they can. They say, "Well, we know it is going to be almost an impossibility to attach any blame to our insured, almost impossible to attach blame to Dufferin, so let us just be pleasant. After all, the department has written us a letter and we want to get along with everybody; we will just be as pleasant as we can. We will have a look, and we are going to write lots of nice letters, and we are going to disclaim responsibility."

But if the department insisted that the type of policy that I suggest come with every contract, then this problem would be completely removed.

Another suggestion, sir, is this, that the province act as its own insurer. Maybe this has even more merit than the other suggestion because I do not think that this gentleman and his neighbours are ever going to be able to understand why, when their houses were damaged through no fault of their own, that the people who built the highway—the province of Ontario—were not able to do something for them. The responsibility, in the mind of this gentleman and his neighbours, is the responsibility of The Department of Highways, and is the responsibility of the government of Ontario.

Perhaps, sir, there is abundant good sense in suggesting that the department should be its own insurer. When this comes about, then the department through its investigators will say, "Yes, Mr. Smith, your house was damaged. Yes, it is reasonable to expect that the house was damaged as a result of the construction of the highway. Yes, the dollar value is X."

I would not be concerned—if this was a complaint—about whether the damage was $1,000 or $100; this is not the sort of complaint I would be talking about in this House. I am concerned about the principle that lies behind it. Here, sir, is an obvious case where a citizen has suffered damage and he has no remedy. I suggest that The Department of Highways has a real responsibility for rectifying this situation.

Just as a postscript, may I add one word? The hon. member for Yorkview and three or four other hon. members of the House, as well as I, were at a meeting at Armour Heights school several weeks ago where perhaps 400 citizens gathered who were concerned with the effects on their property and their homes being caused by the widening of Highway 401. During the course of this discussion—which brought up another thing, the question of expropriation, and several matters that we discussed last year—the question of damage to individual homes came up. In that group, I would guess that at least 50 per cent of the people who had gathered there on that occasion were concerned about the same sort of problem that my friend is concerned about. They just did not know how to proceed. They had phoned and they had written and they had got the same sort of story that my friend has done. He was determined enough to follow it up with correspondence. He was determined enough, that having had the correspondence, he turned it over to me and there, Mr. Chairman, is the story, and I think there is a duty incumbent upon the government to do something about it.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, just following up the hon. member for Downsview, I am not going to repeat what he has said. I have similar letters in my files here, but I will not read them at this moment, because I think the hon. Minister understands the problem. It has been forcibly put. But there is here, I think, the one theme that what these people want is some assurance that the damage that is being done to their homes is somehow going to be compensated.

I have a letter here which I want to read. It is from a member of my constituency. He wrote me some time ago on the same problem, in the same vein, with the same kind of correspondence. I got in touch with the insurance company and immediately the insurance agent went to see him. That was some weeks ago. He took a look and he has vanished. Now, it may well be that these people are better off not to have damages assessed until construction is completed. I think this must make sense. But, on the other hand, some assurance that that compensation is coming, is all they ask for at this moment.

The other aspect that I want to deal with is one which I discussed with the hon. Minister and the deputy Minister on various occasions, and that is the extension of the 50-foot rule, so that the first-line houses along the highway will be considered as soon as the 50-foot houses are looked after. I bring to your attention this letter, which came to my desk this morning. The gentleman called me yesterday, because I had taken up his case before, and now he was a bit desperate again. I said, "You had better put this down in writing so I can read it to the Minister." He did that immediately. I did not expect such prompt action, but I certainly got it. But he says this:

Dear Sir:

Further to our telephone conversation of May 3 concerning the damages and health of my children. Since my last letter to you the situation has rapidly got worse.

This is at 367 Culford Road, just south of the highway.

We now have our eldest child dangerously ill with meningitis, which we believe has been caused through the filth and the constant dust from the highway. As I have stated before, our house is only 65 feet from the driven part of the highway to the side of our house. The damage to the house is getting worse every day. Each day new cracks appear in every room.

Now that the warm weather is here the dust is getting worse. Our backyard is just one filthy hole with damage done by the construction of last year. Holes that were prepared for tree planting since last fall are full of water that is green with contamination. I have been continually onto The Department of Highways about this.

As I have stated to you before in writing, The Department of Highways or the construction company will not take any responsibility concerning our problem, which has occurred since this project has started. As I have stated to you before, our house is far too near the highway and should have been taken.

We feel we cannot take much more than we have taken. How many more of our children will get some illness through the inability of The Department of Highways to come to some agreement with us? I trust that you will look into this matter once again for us.

Sincerely,
Leonard Rice

I read this letter to you and you are quite familiar with the general situation it portrays, but I would like to urge upon the hon. Minister that just as soon as this first undertaking is completed—and when the hon. Minister concerned with housing has bought out the first houses which are designated within the 50-foot line—then a look should be taken at other houses, because those homes in many cases are closer than the homes that are now being bought. Some houses side-on to the highway, and a dozen or so houses on Lorne Bruce Drive particularly, of which the hon. Minister heard so much a year ago, are directly affected by the highway and by the construction and by the traffic, even though they may be beyond the 50-foot line.

I bring to the attention of the hon. Minister a letter of September 14, written by Gil Pascoe, the president of the 401 ratepayers association, in this case to the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall). A couple of paragraphs say:

Since the 401 ratepayers association is appreciative of the fact that the Ontario government created a precedent on behalf of a number of homeowners adjacent to 401—and I might say that is appreciated and the people there do feel grateful for it:

—it is the contention of our association that the government did not give adequate consideration to the problems of a majority of our members. In view of this, the executive must continue with the aim of the 401 ratepayers association which is:

To have our provincial government offer to purchase at fair market price prior to their announcement of May 23, 1963, all first-line homes adjacent to and adversely affected by the expansion of the 401 highway, and the resultant service or collector roads, entrance and exit ramps.

Our executive met with the officials of The Department of Highways in August, 1964, and that meeting is a matter of history. The Minister advised us that his jurisdiction over our problem is presently limited and suggested that, as your department is implementing—this is the hon. Minister of Economics and Development:

—is implementing the purchasing of property, as authorized under the ruling, we should meet with you to see how our situation could be resolved.

This is simply, again, the ratepayers association backing up the fact that the first-line homes should be considered, and all those homes adjacent to the highway should have another close look when the present undertaking is completed.

One other item I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Minister, of which he is likely aware, concerns the properties adjacent to Highway 401. It is a resolution from the North York township, a recommendation regarding those properties just adjacent to the highway. And I trust, and perhaps the hon. Minister can give us assurance here, that this recommendation is being implemented.

It is therefore recommended that this municipality be advised, prior to the offer for sale by The Department of Highways, by tender or otherwise, of any properties adjacent to Highway 401.

This is so the municipality concerned can plan adequately and, if necessary, purchase lands which might be used for parkland or for township purposes along Highway 401. I think this likely has come to the desk of the hon. Minister. The second part of the resolution is:

That the board seek some assurance from The Department of Highways that, in the sale of these properties, steps will be taken to prevent the assembly of sites which might be proposed as apartment sites in undesirable locations at a future date.

This is simply a case of notifying the township of the sales so that the township can take a look at the planning situation and can determine what should be done, in its wisdom, with these lands. Perhaps the township and the department can co-operate here to see that development along Highway 401 is effective and attractive.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, firstly I can say to the hon. member for Downsview that I find I am obliged to concur very largely with the sentiments he expressed today. Certainly, in a situation such as he described, someone should be liable. At the moment I can only tell him that we will pursue the matter. I do not know in detail how this can be done but I am obliged to confess that if I were in a similar situation to the person he described, I think I would feel just exactly the same as he does.

It may well be that some of the firms he recited when he read the letter are subcontractors to the Dufferin Construction Company; maybe all of them, with the exception of MacNamara, are. If that is the case then we, of course, hold Dufferin responsible and you may rest assured we will pursue the matter. Certainly, in a situation like that, somebody should pay. So if it can be left like that, we will pursue the matter.

I think perhaps a similar situation obtains with respect to the observations of the hon. member for Yorkview. And if the damage to which he makes reference can be attributed in the same manner as the situation described by the hon. member for Downsview, then this merits a look on the part of the department.

Mr. Young: Can some assurance be given, Mr. Chairman, that this kind of a look will be taken by the department?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, I would simply ask the hon. member to make available, if he will, the name; or even let us have the letter that he has in his hand.

Mr. Young: I will do that.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We certainly will conduct an investigation and see where the responsibility and the liability lies.

With respect to the matter of changing the criteria which was established some time ago for the acquisition of certain properties along the right-of-way of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway, this was a matter, at that time, of government policy. I simply say that we departed from the normal, in terms of some generosity, when we established the terms of reference and the criteria which have enabled the Ontario housing authority to move in and acquire these properties.

I think it is fair to point out to him that, now, maybe his representations should be made to the hon. Minister of Economics and Development, because while we were involved in the original discussions with the then-styled 401 ratepayers association, and while we did advance the criteria associated with this purchase plan, it was subsequently turned over to the hon. Minister of Economics and Development; because the Ontario housing authority was the vehicle through which the plan could be implemented. It might well be that it should be referred there again for consideration.

I certainly am not prepared to say that we will depart from the criteria which was established in the initial circumstances. I hardly think the hon. member would expect me to say that. Nevertheless, any proposal he wishes to advance, I think, should go to the hon. Minister of Economics and Development and it can be jointly considered.

With respect to notices to the township, I think perhaps we have been approached re this subject already; I can only then assure the hon. member that this proposal will receive consideration. I understand from the deputy Minister that this has reached his desk and is the subject of some consideration at the moment.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister is in an extraordinary mellow and co-operative mood this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Do not press your luck too far, now.

Mr. MacDonald: His boiling point is sometimes low and I will hasten to try to raise a couple of points with him in the hope that I can elicit the same kind of reaction.

Two of the hon. members on this side of the House have championed the interests of people who are within the Metro area. I would like to move out into the hinterland.

The first question I would like to raise with the hon. Minister is on the level of policy—some aspects of what I am going to raise might come under later estimates, but I am more interested in the basic policy, therefore I think it should come under the main office. I have been very interested in the department's recent production of the Niagara peninsula planning study. I want to make one comment, and it is my secondary comment. I will come to my primary one in a moment. I will say to the hon. Minister that I have never seen a production as plush as this one.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Pretty wonderful, is it not?

Mr. MacDonald: It is so wonderful that I make my point and then I leave it. I do not think anyone looking at it will not wonder whether an excessive amount of public funds is being spent. I invite hon. members who have not seen it, or anybody, to examine it. This production is something which should be entered in some art or printing contest.

I would not be a bit surprised if it took a prize. But I come back to the point as to whether or not such a de luxe edition as this is necessary for the purpose of planning.

However, I am more interested in another aspect of it. This study, as I understand it, was the result of investigations which tended to come into focus a few months ago at a meeting that was held on January 13, 1965, at Prudhomme's in the Niagara peninsula area. At this meeting The Department of Highways was instrumental in drawing together various people for consideration, in finalizing I presume, decisions which have finally gone into this rather plush report.

I am informed—and if I am wrong on any point along the way here, which in detail I may be, I invite the hon. Minister's correction—I am informed that, for example, invitations went out to municipalities involved in Lincoln, Welland, one-half of Haldimand, but, if I am correct, no municipality at all in Niagara.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: There were representatives from Niagara there.

Mr. MacDonald: The whole of the county?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Of the township.

Mr. MacDonald: Of the township?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: As far as I am aware the appropriate representatives were there.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, just let me put my queries all in one bunch. I am back to a point where I spent a considerable amount of time, during the consideration of the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development, on the whole proposition of regional development and the necessary co-ordination of all of the groups involved in it.

My information is that the department came and presented their plans for a 20-year programme; that, for the most part, this programme is based on traffic counts and projections on that basis; that there was no serious consideration given to the further encroachment on the fruit belt that might arise from the proposals which have emerged in this plan; that in general it overlooked many of the other factors that should go into planning over a 20-year period on a regional basis; that it took no account, for example, of the official plans of the various municipalities. I think I would like to have some comments from the hon. Minister on this, and some pretty solid assurances that if one department is moving into planning as serious as this kind of de luxe production suggests, we are not likely to be going off in one direction, with three or four other departments that should be co-ordinating their activities not being drawn in.

For example, were officials of the Niagara regional development association involved? This is the body which has been authorized through the government structure established through legislation here, to be the co-ordinating body for regional development in that area. My information is that there was nobody from the regional development association invited to participate there. I wonder if the hon. Minister would care to comment on this?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I would indeed like to comment on that, Mr. Chairman. First of all, I would like to thank the hon. member for speaking in such commendatory terms about the transportation study report. It may look like a high-priced affair; it is attractive, I think. Most of the preparatory work is done in our own department with our own staff, so when you say it is an excellent reproduction or production then you are in effect congratulating the members of staff who prepared it, and for this I—

Mr. MacDonald: Printed by your department?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Actually printed, or just planned?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, oh, no, but all the layouts and everything were prepared in the department. It is prepared in that fashion, I think, probably for durability's sake. That is a report that will be used over and over again, and widely by many, many interested people. I think it has been prepared so it will stand up and be used. There will be constant reference made to it by the various agencies involved.

Mr. MacDonald: For the next 20 years?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Certainly for a long time. We are not going to accomplish it overnight, so that it has to last for a while.

With respect to representation at the meeting, as far as I am aware invitations were sent out to all interested parties. I have a note here; it says that all planning boards and all municipalities were consulted and invited to the meeting. This is the matter of Niagara township, not Niagara county. There were some 200 representatives at the meeting. I was on familiar terms with quite a number of them and I must confess that I was gratified at the extent to which the invited representatives attended. They were there in strength; they were there from the cities, the townships, the counties; they were there from all associated and interested agencies. The significant thing about it to me, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to comment on and point out to the hon. member, was that after the presentation by our transportation people—our planning studies engineer and his staff—the report was adopted unanimously on a resolution that was presented from the floor. A resolution was submitted from the floor of the meeting to the chairman; it was put and it was adopted unanimously without dissent, so that the whole thing must be widely acceptable down there, I am sure it is.

I am sure, frankly, that we went to that meeting with misgivings. It is a far-reaching plan, it is new, it is different. We went there with some misgivings that there would be a great controversy about it and that the member townships and municipalities might have exceptions to what was proposed. This was not the case. They were loud in their praise of the report and, as I have mentioned, it was unanimously adopted upon a resolution submitted from the floor of the meeting.

To discuss what goes into one of those would really take a great deal of time. I can only say to the hon. member—and, as a matter of fact, as I did briefly on the estimates of the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) when asked a question by your hon. colleague, the hon. member for Woodbine—that all matters concerning land use are exhaustively studied. We take our land-use information from The Department of Municipal Affairs. It is the most up-to-date information we can get, so that all the travel patterns and projected travel patterns and requirements for the future are premised on such things as land use and the impact that development now and for the future will make on travel patterns. I explained to the House at that time that we go beyond the boundaries of the study area to determine this, to some extent.

I have told the House before but I will mention it again that in this circumstance I think 85,000 personal interviews were made. Stations were set up over the entire area in strategically located positions for the accumulation of the information required. When all this data, a tremendous wealth of it, was gathered up it was adapted for computer use and the result is the plan you see before you. Significant in the plan—and I mentioned this before but I would like you to examine it—is the extent to which earlier planners were able to hit things on the head, because even today the route of the Queen Elizabeth way as it travels through the Niagara peninsula is still predominantly the great traffic artery and will be for the next 20 years.

I am not going into as much detail as I could, Mr. Chairman, but I simply tell you that the intensive nature of the work that goes into these transportation studies now is as accurate a projection as present study techniques will produce. They will be improved and they will be updated. As a matter of fact, we think that even for the supplementary studies that are underway, the experience in this first one has shown us techniques we can apply to improve them as we go. This will be in the light of experience. But basically I do not think it is possible to apply study techniques, on the basis of today's knowledge and technical information, which will produce anything better than that.

To repeat this background then, all the townships and municipalities have been interviewed. They know that it is going to involve some changes in their road patterns within the various townships and municipalities to conform to this overall plan and they are willing and ready and happy to accept it. As I say, they unanimously resolved to accept this report. If there is any detail that I have overlooked here—

Mr. MacDonald: Were the regional development association and its officials present?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I would presume so, Mr. Chairman; I would presume so but that I cannot say. I will find out because I agree with you that they should have been represented. But I would presume they were.

Mr. MacDonald: But my point, Mr. Chairman, and I leave the matter there, is that it seems to me that if the government has fixed responsibility for co-ordination and regional development with these associations, clearly they should be there on any project of the proportions of this one, which is going to have far-reaching consequences.

Second, if I were assured in my own mind that all of the good people who were there, who were presented with as impressive a document as this and with all the formidable explanations with regard to the studies that have gone into it, had adopted it in the full knowledge that all other bodies that should have been co-ordinating their activities were doing so, then I would be impressed with the unanimity and the fact that a resolution came from the floor.

But this really is missing the point I am raising. Our problem at the moment is the educational problem of making people aware of all the factors that should be involved in regional development. They may take a look at this, be impressed by it and say "aye," 100 per cent, in a unanimous vote. They may be ignoring the fact that two or three other important government departments should have been involved, and because of their not being involved, we are going to run into difficulties five, or 10 or 15 or 20 years from now.

I am raising it as a general proposition at the moment and I leave the matter there because the hon. Minister indicated that there are six or eight similar studies in process elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: There are 19 in process covering the whole province. The province has been divided into 19 study areas and eight of these are actively underway. The London area transportation study report can be out any day—very shortly—and there will be a succession of them. I think eight are actively underway and the other 11 will be implemented.

Let me just say this about the study that is referred to here. That report in itself was not actually available at the time of the meeting, but the material in that report was explained graphically and in great detail in a series of illustrations, and subsequently the report was distributed. In the course of the study, I am convinced that as broad a cross-section of all the interested people in the area were contacted. I have no doubt about this. It is possible to miss people, of course, but if it was done that way, it was omission rather than commission, because it was intensively done.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there is a second area in the far northwest of the province that I wanted to raise; and may I preface the point I want to raise by asking the hon. Minister a question? Is it government policy, or have you decided, on whether the Noden causeway will be tolled? That reversed the hon. Minister in his tracks, I can see.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, we have decided.

Mr. MacDonald: It will be?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, it will not be.

Mr. MacDonald: It will not be tolled? Well, Mr. Chairman, this raises a question which has puzzled me for quite some time—as to what line of reasoning there is in government policy with regard to tolling. I go back to seven or eight years ago, when I sat on a committee, and I think that any examination of the testimony of that committee will confirm the fact that the only person on that committee who was consistently against a policy of tolling in this province was myself. The Liberal member, the hon. member for Essex North (Mr. Reaume), vacillated back and forth. He had a very flexible mind. The government members, for a time, were in favour of it. Finally we came down unanimously against toll roads, in favour of free-ways; but we got into a very mixed-up policy on bridges.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It was not mixed up at all, really.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, we now have tolls on the Burlington, and on—what do you call it—the Garden City skyway?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The Garden City.

Mr. MacDonald: We do not have tolls, for example, on the Pigeon river bridge.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: May I explain why?

Mr. MacDonald: Fine, yes.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It is the policy of the government to impose tolls only where there is an alternative free facility. In the case of the Burlington skyway, there is a free facility. In the case of the Garden City expressway, there is, side by side, a free facility—if you want to wait for the bridge to go down and get across it. Now, in the case of the Noden causeway and the Pigeon river bridge, there is none. We are not going to impose tolls unless there is at least the option of a free facility side by side.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I will give the hon. Minister some credit for consistency on this then; because this was the principle upon which we were operating some years ago and if the principle is still alive—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Very much alive.

Mr. MacDonald: —and acknowledged in his department, fine.

But I want to go back to the northwest and that situation there because, in the 1959 election, the Prime Minister of the day in his magnificent way—when I think of Leslie Frost at election time, I think of that picture in springtime of the person scattering the seeds around in the plentiful soil, you know? He went around the province, and he scattered promises in such a profusion that it would take a computer to keep up with them. One of the many promises was that there was going to be a new bridge from Fort Frances to International Falls. I was a little curious afterwards, in doing a little checking, to discover—and I think my checking was at a fairly authoritative source in The Department of Highways; it does not involve the deputy of the day, so I will not get him involved in this discussion—that the bridge was not very high on the priority list. So I immediately came to the conclusion that this was something of a political promise that did not have too much backing within the department.

However, I have been the recipient in recent months, as I think other hon. members have, including the member for Lambton, so I am told, of some documents from a gentleman who had been, for a number of years, mayor of Fort Frances and who was—perhaps is—on the bridge committee as they call it. This consists of a certain number of people from the Fort Frances side and a certain number of people from the International Falls side, and they have gotten themselves into a real predicament. As a matter of fact, I understand the bridge committee on the Fort Frances side has really become pretty moribund.

The honorary chairman—the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Noden)—is sitting over there gazing at me intently with his hand cupped to his ear. If something of the same enthusiasm and energy were put into that committee, perhaps it could be reactivated. There are members of that committee who have not received notices of its meetings for three years. There are members of that committee who have left town two years ago. So it is not very active; though, on the International Falls side, it is very active and there is a continuing interest.

But the main problem is the proposition that this government is apparently insistent that a bridge, if it is to be built, must be a toll bridge; whereas, on the American side, it is simply impossible, both in view of federal and state law, to become involved in the financing of a toll bridge.

For example, I am informed by the gentleman in Fort Frances, back in 1959 the hon. member for that area announced that he had secured an appropriation for the construction of the bridge; and, of course, celebrations were in order. Up in the north, after you have waited for promises to be fulfilled for 40 years—

Mr. W. G. Noden (Rainy River): Mr. Chairman, to a point of order. I never made any announcement that an appropriation was set aside for the building of the international bridge.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, what exactly the hon. member said, I cannot vouch for at this point. I am a little surprised, if he did not put it in terms of the appropriation, that this kind of information would be passed to me, but I accept the correction as to the word “appropriation.” What exactly he said, I will let the hon. member inform the House, if he so desires.

However, certainly, whatever he said inspired celebrations and they had a gathering.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Always, always!

Mr. MacDonald: They arranged a gathering, which included members of the Minnesota highway commission, Governor Freeman, Congressman Blatnik, Ed Chilgren the state representative, Premier Frost, members of both the Fort Frances and the International Falls bridge commissions, and many other supporters of the bridge. Premier Frost could not attend, but the hon. George Wardrope was there.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): He always is, especially if you are not there.

Mr. MacDonald: That was rather an unkind remark.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: It was not meant to be, at all.

Mr. MacDonald: Somebody must be putting vinegar in the hon. gentleman's tea these days. He is obviously not in the best of moods.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I hear you have made some inquiries, too.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I am informed, if I may quote directly from the local source:

—that when the meeting opened, Governor Freeman paid warm tribute to the Canadian attitude and predicted the bridge would be a wonderful and a lasting tribute to those who had worked for its construction. When Bill Noden was asked to give his report we sat in silence waiting for the good words.

This is the local enthusiasm, you see.

Bill opened his talk by saying that the Ontario government had decided to meet the U.S. federal-Minnesota appropriation—

there we are——the U.S. federal-Minnesota appropriation, but that the bridge must be a toll bridge.

And, as it is pointed out, the hon. member knew, as did everybody else, that that meant the bottom just went out of the whole project.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, it is all changed; we will bring you up to date in a minute.

Mr. MacDonald: Good. If you could bring me up to date. I would like to be brought up to date as to exactly what the government is planning to do, because I am told, by people who are intimately involved in the bridge committee up there, that the hon. member from the area has stated that it would be unfair, for example, to have a toll bridge. It would be competing, in an unfair way, with the bridge between the village of Rainy River and the American side. This International Falls bridge is a very old bridge; it is a bridge on which the traffic can go only one way at a time; it is a bridge on which I am told there is something like $250,000 profit being made each year by those who have calculated carefully the amount of revenue that must be taken in.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It is privately owned.

Mr. MacDonald: Privately owned by Ontario/Minnesota; but whether or not, it is a bridge which is not providing the kind of facilities—the hon. Minister undoubtedly has seen it. It is a bridge, as I recall, with a railroad track running down the middle of it; and if a train is coming there can be no traffic, and the traffic can only go one way at a time. I mean, this is “Toonerville trolley” style of about the year 1910. That this privately owned bridge should be reaping a profit of something like $250,000 a year for any private concern, it seems to me, is not the kind of thing that the government should contemplate for very much longer.

However, if the hon. Minister has an up-to-date statement of policy I would like him to announce it to the House because it certainly is not known by some people in the area who normally would be aware of what is going on.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I would not like to say it is an up-to-date statement of policy; it is an up-to-date statement of fact with which the hon. member has little affinity, I might say.

Mr. MacDonald: Do not get nasty.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, it is just one of the factual statements. The facts of the case are that the whole matter is in the active stages of discussion between representatives of our Department of Highways and representatives of the similar agency in the state of Minnesota. I do not think the matter of tolls poses a serious problem any more because the premise is now being fairly considered, I think, that if a new bridge is built between Fort Frances and International Falls as a toll bridge, it might be the basis of providing and generating the revenues that are required to build a similar bridge from Baudette to Rainy River. The matter of sustaining that bridge as well is under consideration. I can tell the hon. member that as recently as a few weeks ago we corresponded with the state highway commissioner, and advanced certain recommendations from our point of view that he very favourably entertained.

Mr. MacDonald: Has there been a change in U.S. law that permits them to participate?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Presumably there has, because it does not seem to impose any serious obstacle in the way of what is being considered at the moment.

This whole matter is under active consideration, I can assure the hon. member of that. It is our proposal that when the complete briefing on the Minnesota side is completed, following an investigation from the point of view of the government of Ontario, these findings I think will be turned over to a central committee, something along the lines of what the hon. member mentioned, and it will be taken from there.

I have been taking this off the top of my head. I think the hon. member for Rainy River can even bring us up to date a little more. I believe he is prepared to comment on it now, Mr. Chairman, and I think I would like to hear some observations from him, too.

Mr. Noden: Mr. Chairman, I am rather interested in the mixed-up statement that has been made in connection with this proposed international bridge between Fort Frances and International Falls, Minnesota. We are dealing with two governments, one on each side of the boundary, which makes things very complicated. But I must say this, that when this bridge was first promoted and was mentioned—and I refer to the statement that I made a few moments ago—at no election time or at no time did I ever make any statement that funds had been appropriated to build this bridge.

At the request of the people in Fort Frances and International Falls, a committee was set up by the municipal councils to study this, and based upon this request The Department of Highways of Ontario and The Department of Highways of Minnesota each appointed a committee which met in Fort Frances in June, 1962, to study the need for a new international bridge between Fort Frances and International Falls.

When this group met with the departments of highways of the state and the province they set up terms of reference to prepare a study by both departments of highways, and once this study had been made final they were to submit a joint report to the committee of Fort Frances and International Falls at a future date for its study, and to move forward in whatever direction the joint committee intended. This is where the matter stands today. Both departments have submitted briefs, they are continuing to do this and the final report has not been submitted as yet. I understand it will be very shortly.

I do not think I have ever mentioned anything about tolls. It is entirely up to the joint committee of the two communities to arrive at where the bridge is going to be built and how they are going to raise the money. All of these details have to be worked out. This rests with the joint committee of International Falls, Minnesota, and Fort Frances, Ontario. That is where it stands today and I think a great deal of misunderstanding has taken place.

I want to make one other reference. The Fort Frances committee met here during the Easter recess. I was in attendance at the meeting, as were all the committee members, and they are fully organized. I might tell you that the committee over in International Falls was recognized only within the last three weeks.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that we have been able to continue the discussion of this in a relatively quiet manner. I do not appreciate the hon. member getting up and referring to "mixed-up statements" on it, and I do not appreciate the hon. Minister lapsing from his geniality—with which I was so impressed—and saying that my comments had no relationship to the facts when, if I may be so unkind, he immediately then refers to building a bridge in Fort Frances that might assist in Rainy River and Baudette, which has been built for quite some time.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, I did say that.

Mr. MacDonald: Right. So let us keep our relationship to the facts. The fact of the matter is that the bridge at Rainy River is losing money and now the hon. Minister suggests that he thinks they can make enough money on a toll bridge at Fort Frances to bail out the one up there. Is that what the hon. Minister is saying?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No. If tolls are going to be considered at all, Mr. Chairman, this will involve the establishment of an international bridge authority, and if an international bridge authority is established as a result of these meetings and considerations that are taking place, then the authority can embrace the two bridges. This is the point.

Mr. MacDonald: Am I not correct, Mr. Minister, that the bridge at Rainy River is now privately owned by a U.S. company—that is the bridge from Rainy River to Baudette?

Mr. Noden: It is owned by the municipality of Baudette.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That is right, it is not privately owned, it is municipally owned, but there is not a great deal of material difference there.

I might just say for the information of the hon. member, too, that the final report will be ready for submission to the state of Minnesota in a matter of about four weeks. This is our report. So we are probably more abreast of the situation than one might realize.

Mr. MacDonald: I will just make this one comment to show what validity there is in my observations, and that the suggestion on the part of the government that it is suddenly coming to grips with something at the moment and that there had not been earlier plans simply is not the case. For example, I have here a copy of a letter which was sent to the hon. Minister's predecessor, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass), from L. P. Zimmerman, commissioner of highways on the Minnesota side, dated May 17, 1960.

Dear Mr. Cass:

You will recall there has been correspondence between this office and yours concerning a new vehicular bridge from Fort Frances, Ontario, to International Falls, Minnesota. There has also been a meeting held at Fort Frances on August 19, 1958, at which you were present and at which meeting I was represented by Mr. A. O. Torgerson, then assistant commissioner of highways.

On March 14, 1959, a meeting was held at International Falls at which you were represented by the hon. George Wardrope, Minister of Penal Institutions. Also present was William Noden, MP.

Representing the state of Minnesota were Governor Freeman, representative Ed Chilgren, representative Hofstad and representative La Bosse and our chief engineer, Mr. Swanberg. Present also were the mayors of Fort Frances and International Falls and representatives of the international bridge commissions of the two cities. There has also been considerable activity on the part of the international bridge commission.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, in fact prior to 1960—now listen to the next paragraph:

From the information I have had concerning this meeting, it has been my understanding that the position of your department has been that such a bridge would have to be constructed as a toll facility. This, of course, we cannot do as both state law and the federal enabling Act S3437 required that the bridge be a toll-free structure.

I have recently been informed that your department may be presently agreeable to participating in the construction of a toll-free bridge. In view of the fact that the present structure is very much inadequate and further that the great river route is routed through these two cities, I believe that a modern toll-free structure would contribute substantially to a very much increased volume of traffic with its attendant mutual benefits.

I should point out that our present federal legislation enabling the state of Minnesota to participate in the construction of such a bridge provides that the Act shall terminate if actual construction is not started within three years which would be July of 1961.

Apparently they will have to revive their enabling legislation back to that date. He concludes:

We believe that the construction of this bridge is of such importance and urgency that our two departments should, as soon as possible, proceed with the necessary negotiations. We would like very much to work with you on this matter to the end that, in the not-too-distant future, this bridge will become a reality. We are looking forward to hearing from you at your earliest convenience.

Mr. Chairman, that is 1960, and I do not know how anybody can come to the conclusion that, five years later, this department has not been dragging their feet on this issue. If it takes five years to get to the stage of holding the meetings and making a decision, this is not the kind of speed that is going to deal with an urgent matter.

However, I am encouraged. I am also encouraged to learn the hon. Minister's policy with regard to tolls, at least on the causeway. I can remember the days when the chamber of commerce and other bodies up in Fort Frances, were clamouring for no tolls and this government quite insistently said there would be tolls, and told them flatly; and the hon. member had certain embarrassing political situations to deal with locally. If the hon. Minister has reverted back to what I think is the correct policy, I congratulate him, and I hope that he will extend it to all of these main arteries on what are international highways.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): I wanted to clear a point, Mr. Chairman. Although one of the most attentive members of this Legislature, I was out for just a few minutes when there was a question brought up about Niagara Falls and a meeting there. I recall the hon. Minister of Highways inviting us to Downsview to see this proposed plan of road development in the province of Ontario up to 1985, projecting his plans into the future for 20 years.

I would like to be kind this afternoon and give credit where credit is due. The hon. Minister was good enough to invite me, as the member for Niagara Falls, to that meeting to look over the plan before it was given to the general public, or the county representative and municipal representative. We did attend that meeting, and there was a meeting called for the members to attend at Prudhomme's. I did get an invitation—I want to put that on the record. I did get an invitation to that meeting. I do not know how many others in the area were invited; I imagine all whom we discussed would be invited; so, if the others had done what I did on that occasion, they stayed away. It was not the fault of the hon. Minister; I was invited and did not attend. Up to this point, you see, I am on his side. As the votes go on I may have other things to say about it. I want everyone here to know that I was invited and it was my fault that I was not there.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to get into the debate for a minute and ask for a little further consideration of the north's equity in these highway estimates. I will try to relate my remarks, if I can, to the much-talked-about regional development. In that connection I want to ask this government how it expects to implement regional development in Ontario when it continues to allot such a small percentage of its major highway construction to the north.

As far as I can determine, The Department of Highways intends to spend something like $11 million in 1965-1966 for major new construction in northern Ontario. This is only a very small percentage of the total amount of $158 million to be spent in construction of highways in Ontario in this fiscal year. The ratio of money to be spent in the north does not even conform to the population ratio of people in Ontario who live in the north—roughly 778,000 people.

Northern Ontario, as it is generally defined, represents 78 per cent of the total land area of this huge province, or 323,500 square miles. Mr. Chairman, there are many and varied definitions of what we call northern Ontario, but I like to think that, for most purposes, northern Ontario should include all of the province except the counties and the provisional county of Haliburton. This is not what The Department of Highways calls northern Ontario; I quite recognize that. It seems reasonable to me. However, trying to relate the expenditures to this particular area certainly takes some doing.

This area, as I have mentioned, comprises some 78 per cent of the total land, or 323,500 square miles. I could easily have been mistaken in my computation of the dollar value of new construction—new major construction—since the information does not come in readily this way, from the estimates or the reports; and if there are figures, related to these areas, which are more correct, I would be glad to be advised.

This area, of course, is largely undeveloped and is one of the areas that could conceivably be a target for development and economic stimulation in the eyes of any other government. As the hon. Minister well knows, there are many areas in northern Ontario where the only immediate hope for stimulation is through tourism; yet no amount of publicity, regarding beauty spots or recreational areas, will do any good until at least the roads leading into, across, and out of these areas become something other than a deterrent. Yet, instead of a clearly defined overall government policy to open up the north and expand it, we find this infinitesimal allotment for new highway construction this year.

I listened with interest, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Minister told us of the importance to the overall economy of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway. No one would disagree with this. I have already cited the population figures of the north but I must ask if this government ever stops to consider that the north is not growing in population because of the very policies of this government, policies which concentrate major road building, for example, in the already populous south. Obviously, no area of this or any other province can develop without adequate transportation facilities.

This government, I maintain, provides no clear-cut statistics outlining its highway building programme. I would hope that there is more construction planned for the north than I can find in the maze that makes up the capital construction programme report for the fiscal year 1965-1966. I can find estimates of $2.9 million for the Sudbury-Timmins highway; $1.7 million for Highway 101 from Chapleau; $2.8 million for Highway 105 to Red Lake; $600,000 for Highway 11 from Fort Frances to Atikokan; and $3 million for work on the trans-Canada highway. Mention is also made in the report of a grading project at Hornepayne, but no figure is reported.

I also find out, listed under "Work to be done" on other King's highways and secondary highways, a note to the effect that it is expected that approximately $14 million will be spent during the fiscal year. Presumably some of this money might be for construction work in the north, but the department is extremely vague about its intentions along this line.

The hon. Minister made much of his advanced origin-destination studies. I applaud the department for this work but I wonder at the same time if they ever considered the north as either the "origin" or "destination" of highway travel. I personally have found the divisional engineer and his staff extremely co-operative, as far as my own riding is concerned. The co-operation at this level of the department is always what could be expected. I have had many occasions on which to discuss priorities and emergency repairs and maintenance projects within the riding, with the divisional engineer, and I will have to say that he and his staff are constantly ready to accept suggestions within the confines of overall allocations. I maintain that the allocations for the northern division are not adequate and, from what I can determine, in consideration of these estimates, the hon. Minister and his staff at the upper level here have yet to get the message in relation to northern Ontario.

If I have been incorrect in some of my figures I would be glad to be corrected by the hon. Minister; and I would also be glad to have him make any comments with respect to any more intentions than these that I have mentioned, for northern Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Certainly, I cannot argue with the figure that the hon. member has indicated, except to say that I am convinced that it is not correct.

He made reference to new work and to certain highway projects. I heard no mention of work to be undertaken on Highway 71; I heard no mention of work to be undertaken on Highway 72; I heard no mention of work to be undertaken on Highway 614 from the trans-Canada to Manitowadge; I heard no mention of work on Highway 129; I heard no mention of work—now, I may be wrong, perhaps I did not hear the hon. member, but certainly there is extensive new work planned on Highway 68 which runs through his own riding.

Now these are only a few, but there are many projects to which the hon. member failed to make reference at all; and I am convinced that when these are all put together they will add up to a rather more formidable figure than the $11 million to which he made reference. I think it is only fair to say that he referred to only new work; I simply ask him to go back to the programme and take a look at carryover work.

Carryover work is equally important in terms of the expenditures as new work. I think it is only reasonable to say that there are many projects that cannot be commenced and finished in the same year. Needless to say, these projects have to be carried over and there are full disclosures here of all carryover projects in the north and, indeed for the whole province. So that I think it might be fair to examine the value of this carryover work because this adds up to rather formidable figures too.

To say that the north has been ignored is, of course—and I am bound to say this—substantially incorrect. There is nobody in The Department of Highways and there is nobody in government who does not have a very great appreciation and realization of the extent to which roads are important all over the province; and certainly where areas in the north require road facilities for development, then that awareness carries through in the department's consideration.

The same proportion of our budget—and we try to distribute it as equitably as possible—is allocated to roads in the north as it is allocated elsewhere in the province.

Now continued reference to expenditures on facilities such as the Macdonald-Cartier freeway, if you wish, in terms of comparison with road requirements of northern Ontario are not fair. They are not fair because of the fact that the Macdonald-Cartier freeway is in a densely populated area and performs an altogether different function to the function that roads are required to perform in northern Ontario. So that there is no real basis of comparison to say that heavy expenditures are made on certain types of facilities in the southern part of the province and not in the north. Of course they are not, because the functional requirements are at complete variance with each other.

I now have some information and I hope that this will be of some interest to the hon. member because I see that from North Bay to Kenora, in the northern districts as we call them—North Bay, Cochrane, New Liskeard, Sudbury, Sault Ste. Marie, Fort William and Kenora—the programme value of the work that is referred to in the capital construction programme is $22,862,000, of which expenditures in the current year will be $13,485,000. On carryover, the work to which I made reference and to which the hon. member failed to make reference, the value of work on our carryover programme in the same areas is $11,455,000. This adds up to a total of $24,940,000 worth of work, either carryover or that portion of new work that can be done in the current and up-coming construction season, approximating $25 million.

Now this is a far cry from the $11 million to which the hon. member made reference. I think it is a very fair share of our capital budget for the areas that we are concerned with. Associated with all this, of course, are the normal amounts of subsidies that go to the participating municipalities throughout the north; work associated with statute labour projects; work associated with the new local roads boards. It all adds up to what can only be considered as a fair portion of the budget for the ensuing year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Farquhar: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister will remember that I only made reference to new and major projects that were readily available, and I wanted to use them as examples of comparisons.

I will ask the hon. Minister just one further question: In his opinion, the amount of money for both maintenance and new projects that has been allocated to the territory that I consider northern Ontario and have spelled out as being northern Ontario, is adequate in light of the budget; does the hon. Minister consider that northern Ontario is getting its fair share, considering the mention I have made of the need for roads to help development in that area?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I do not know whether I am prepared to comment on that. I think that $25 million—to use the round figure—being that proportion that can be expended against the value of the new work in this year, plus the carryover work, represents about one-sixth of our entire capital construction budget, if the hon. member has examined the figures. When that is related I think across the length and breadth of the province and contrasted with the requirements of the other areas, their population density and all those related matters, I am inclined to think that this is very fair.

The hon. member may disagree, but one-sixth of our entire capital construction budget being expended in the north strikes me as not being a bad proportion. This goes up sometimes. In some years it will be higher and some years it will be lower, because of the very nature of our programming and the exigencies of the work we cannot always complete the work projected in the current construction year. This, I think, has to be admitted, as the seasons are much shorter up there. But by and large one-sixth of the capital budget seems like a reasonable proportion.

As a matter of fact, I think that the opinions expressed by the hon. member are not generally shared by all the people in the north. I think it is fair to say that there are a good many people in the north who think our programme is not too bad.

An hon. member: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to get back to one item that the Minister had remarked on in reference to my original comments and that is the service centre in the Barrie area.

What was the thinking in the department for placing the service centre so close to the city? I understand it is only one-quarter of a mile away from the entrance to the city.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: You cannot go much further north than Barrie until you reach that point where there is no controlled access highway.

Mr. Newman: Well, Mr. Minister, if there is only one-quarter of a mile to go before the individual—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Would you like me to finish my explanation?

Mr. Newman: Yes, all right.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The service centres on the Macdonald-Cartier freeway are spaced strategically 50 miles apart. This was, after much consideration, deemed to be the sensible spacing of them. We are applying the same spacing application to Highway 400. It is 50 miles from Toronto, if you would like to put it that way. To go another 50 miles, or even a few miles north, why of course 400 does not go that much further. It will some day, and presumably as we get Highway 400 pushed further north, which is certainly programmed and contemplated, and it is put under control of access, there will very likely be another service centre located further north.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Minister, I hope that you are not always just sticking to a 50-mile distance, regardless of where the centre is to be built. Is it just to be built 50 miles away from the previous service centre? Otherwise you may be going right into a community.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Give or take some miles.

Mr. Newman: And in this case you were so close to the city of Barrie that the individual, the motoring public, could go right into the city for the service; and there are services available on a 24-hour basis in the city of Barrie. Why could you not have built that service centre north of Barrie? You would have still been on Highway 400, and you would not have interrupted or interfered with the economy of the many motels, service centres, and restaurant operators in the city of Barrie.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Actually, Mr. Chairman, these things are not just taken off the top of the heads. There was a good reason for placing it there, as I have mentioned. I can say to the hon. member that the people of Barrie are not upset about this. They welcome this service centre, to be quite frank to the hon. member, as a new industry; and a new industry it is to them. It will employ 120 people; it will buy all its provisions largely in the city of Barrie. I say, frankly, that the people of Barrie are quite happy to have it there. We have had no complaints from the city of Barrie about this thing at all.

Mr. Newman: Did you consult with the city of Barrie when you were selecting the site?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I did not, specifically.

Mr. Newman: Well, did your department?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The matter, of course, of its location approximate to Barrie, would be reviewed and considered before the site was selected. I simply think I will revert to what I said, and say that the people of Barrie are not unhappy—and are, I think, happy—that it is located there.

Mr. Newman: Was the central Simcoe area planning board consulted at all? They would be the ones you certainly would have gone to in seeking advice.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Not necessarily.

Mr. Newman: They were not?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I do not think so.

Mr. Newman: Was the chamber of commerce ever taken into confidence concerning the location of this service centre?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think the chamber of commerce has expressed itself, Mr. Chairman, as being quite well satisfied and pleased with the location of this service centre.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I have a communication from the chamber of commerce to the effect that it was not advised of any proposed service centre being planned, prior to the announcement in the press.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Chairman, I might say that, previous to the announcement, I spoke to the mayor of Barrie about this service centre being located south of Barrie. As far as he was concerned, he said that he was in full agreement with the service centre, although he had not talked to his council about it. I also talked to several members of the chamber of commerce. They had a meeting on it and they had no objection to it whatsoever. I would say to you that the majority of the people in the city of Barrie and surrounding country have no objection to the service centre whatsoever. It is the people away north of the service centre who have objections—not from Barrie.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to hear the hon. member mention the fact that the citizens of Barrie are very pleased with the service centre being set up in their location, because if they were so pleased they certainly would have never come into the city of Toronto and demonstrated, as they did at one time. But, as the hon. member has said, they are pleased with it; we will let it stay at that.

Mr. Evans: I would just like to say that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville said the people from Barrie came into Toronto and demonstrated here. I would say that I was told only two people from the city of Barrie and surrounding communities came into the city of Toronto—they were all people from away north of Barrie.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the hon. Minister for putting in his estimates this year sufficient funds to complete that portion of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway—south two lanes—in the riding I have the honour to represent. Much has been said about this—much criticism of the hon. Minister for not doing this sooner, or for delaying it. One of the reasons why I thought it should be speeded up was as a safety measure. Also, it was one of the things to encourage industries to locate in that part of the province. The hon. Minister has said, in his statements last year, that it was highways such as Macdonald-Cartier freeway which were aiding the decentralization of industries across the province. However, the people in our area will certainly be glad to read that you have set aside funds and are going to complete that portion this year.

Another matter which I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister is that, last year, there were 13 companies price fixing and rigging contracts, municipally and provincially, in the province of Ontario. It is quite confusing to some of us that this was first brought to our attention by the federal government. I must say that we thought that this should have been brought to the attention of the people of the province of Ontario by The Department of Highways because they were no doubt contracting with these people.

Another thing was that for some of these contractors who were charged for doing this, the penalties were: suspension of bidding for six months. This, I think, was ridiculous. If a man goes out and steals enough bread to feed his family, he goes to jail. But companies like this go out price fixing or contract rigging, and only get a sentence of being suspended from bidding for six months! I think that whatever Act they were charged under certainly should be amended because this is confusing, and it is serious, to the people of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, to reply to the hon. member for Kent East, I would first of all say that, as yet, no charge has been laid against these people under The Combines Investigation Act, and only in terms of charges can the federal Minister of Justice undertake to do this. The suspension, if you wish to refer to it that way, or the prequalification penalty imposed by the Minister of Highways following the tabling of the report of the restrictive trade practices commission last August, was a measure that was undertaken entirely in association with the procedures set up in terms of our prequalification.

One of the provisos in the schedule of prequalification procedures enables the Minister—and I might digress long enough to say that these procedures have been developed over a period of years with the department and the Ontario road builders association itself, so that the Minister has the authority under the prequalification procedures to which I refer, to impose prequalification penalties. I think I will read the section, if I may. This is section 8 of the prequalification procedures, used by The Department of Highways as revised. It simply says:

Fraudulent, false, deceptive or misleading statements. Any contractor who, himself, or whose employee or agent, makes or causes to be made any fraudulent, false, deceptive or misleading statements under these procedures or on any documents relating to a tender to or a contract with the department may be prohibited from bidding on contracts for a period of time determined by the department, or may have his basic rating adjusted in accordance with section 1 of these procedures.

It was under this section of our prequalification procedures that we took the action we did. It is hardly up to us to usurp the functions of the appropriate tribunal that may arise if the federal Minister of Justice decides to lay charges under The Combines Investigation Act against these people.

On the other hand, we employed the only means we had available to implement, if you like, some punitive measures and this was done. I might simply say to the House, in concluding my observations in reply to the hon. member, that it is difficult to measure the extent to which these people may have suffered. Some of them are more than road resurfacers. During the 90-day period—it was not a six-month suspension or penalty—the normal amount of work would be called for tender by the department and it would run into the tens of millions of dollars. Some of these 13 would have been eligible to enter bids for that work, and probably might have been successful in obtaining some contracts. However, because of our policy of awarding contracts to the low bidder, you understand that they would require to have been the low bidder. But it is safe to assume that there was a great potential value of work available to these people and that for a 90-day period they could not bid on it. They could not take out tender documents.

I do not propose to debate whether we were right to impose the penalty at all, or whether it was too little or too much, because I do not know. Certainly we did let it be known to the road building industry that these penalties were there, and that we could impose them. And we did, because the statement tabled in the House of Commons by the restrictive trade practices commission indicated that there was admission on the part of these people that they had adopted these practices. So I say to the hon. member, this was as far as we felt we should go and I am not prepared to debate the severity or laxity of the penalty that was imposed here. It is up to the federal Minister of Justice now to decide what charges he will lay.

Mr. R. Welch (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, although my comments may be a little out of context now in view of what has transpired—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, we are roaming all over the estimates, I can tell you that. Just roaming all over.

Mr. MacDonald: You have three great big votes.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: With all kinds of items under them, if you want to pick them.

Mr. Chairman: What item do you want to speak on?

Mr. Welch: I wanted to make reference, if I may and you consider me in order, to the comments made earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for York South dealing with the Niagara peninsula traffic survey. Am I in order?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes. If he was, you certainly are.

Mr. Welch: Except that two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. Chairman, following the remarks of the hon. member for York South, I had occasion to consult with my colleagues, the hon.

member for Niagara Falls and the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Morningstar), in order that I could be sure we were in agreement that every effort was made by the department to have adequate representation at this meeting on January 11, to which the hon. member for York South makes reference.

I cannot personally support the proposition that the Niagara regional development association was represented there, and this is a matter of fact which can or cannot be established. However, I could not let his comments go unchallenged insofar as they concern the great riding which I have the privilege to represent in this House. I have a tremendous respect for the officials and the staff of The Department of Highways. Indeed—

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): With the attention you are getting down there, you should.

Mr. Welch: I was just going to comment on that, because we, indeed, have been the beneficiaries of very generous treatment on the part of The Department of Highways.

Mr. Gisborn: Wentworth does not get it.

Mr. Welch: I think anyone who travels in this part of the province would appreciate that, notwithstanding the comments of my hon. friend to my right.

Mr. Chairman, having said this, I know of the efforts that were made by the officials of The Department of Highways to ensure that adequate representation be at the meeting referred to from the county of Lincoln, and all of the municipalities within that county, and the officials who would deal with and who would advise these particular municipalities, insofar as planning is concerned. I can share with my hon. friend from York South many letters and many comments from the municipal leaders of Lincoln who were very complimentary with respect to the way The Department of Highways conducted this particular meeting, and I know that since the report has been issued in its present form, it has been made available to many of these authorities. I just want the record to be clear insofar as I am concerned; that, regardless of any comments which have been made, this has been a very significant contribution, insofar as our region is concerned and we are proud of the leadership of the hon. Minister of Highways and his department, in this regard.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to return to this particular point, but the hon. member is setting up a straw man and beating it down. Neither the hon. Minister nor he has yet been able to confirm the fact as to whether the regional development association was there.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We will.

Mr. MacDonald: I agree, and my essential point was: Was the body which was given the responsibility by this government to be the co-ordinator in regional development in that area in attendance? Instead of getting up and trying to chastise me, I think if you had this bit of information, it would be much more significant than all your fuming and fury.

Mr. Welch: Mr. Chairman, I would not be presumptuous enough to attempt to chastise the hon. member for York South. There were other comments made by the hon. member and I think this is just a clever play on words on his part, although the specific question, it is quite true, and as a matter of fact, is to be proved. There was a general cloud around his statements, to try in some respects to discredit this particular report, and I just wanted to speak to that general, although subtle, point. It is an excellent report.

Mr. Chairman: Might I suggest to the members that we should get through with 801 and then let us stick to item-by-item on 802. For example, item 1 in 802 covers a great variety of things and I think it would be much more in order if we could do that.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, am I recognized?

Mr. Chairman: No; the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): I would say again, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure you are as much in the dark as I am on this, that I think you said highways covers the waterfront—that is what you implied if you did not say it. I am talking about the studies that the hon. Minister talked about last year on rapid transit from Burlington to Ajax. Can I talk on this at this time, or do you want me to wait?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Of course, Mr. Chairman, this is entirely under a vote in the estimates of the hon. Minister of Transport. We did discuss this at some length and I took part in the debate myself, if the hon. leader of the Opposition recalls it. It is under the estimates of the hon. Minister of Transport. If we are going to stick strictly to order, there is no provision in these estimates for a discussion of that at all.

Mr. Thompson: If I could recall, last year the hon. Minister was saying that the purpose of highways was to transport from one place to the other, either persons or goods.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: What else?

Mr. Thompson: Naturally they are related and if I could recall also, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister, I understand he had announced two of these studies that were going to take place.

I really want, if I could, to talk about transport—of course it is the very function of highways. If I can go ahead on this, because I think it is under general policy, I am hoping to draw from the hon. Minister his whole broad programme of the purpose of highways. My own feeling is, sir, and I think we would all say this, that there is a lot of concrete being laid all over this province.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, this matter of the metropolitan transportation study was discussed at some length under The Department of Transport and that debate was permitted to range over a considerable area. The estimates for the payment, the authorization for the research, and the survey study itself is contained in the estimates of The Department of Transport and it is under that heading that the debate did take place. This is not the place to reopen, under The Department of Highways, the question of the Metro transportation study, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate the clarification by the hon. Minister of Labour and therefore I will not talk about those particular studies in themselves but I will talk about the purpose of highways.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Which estimates is the hon. leader of the Opposition speaking to?

Mr. Thompson: I am speaking on the general policy of building highways. Some of us ask why the highways are built, and the hon. Minister has an understanding it is to transport people or goods. I am looking forward to hearing more from him on this.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, this may very well be the proper time to draw some attention to the question of the debate on the estimates. I think it would probably be desirable—if I might deal with this, Mr. Chairman, for a moment—that we should stick to the particular estimates and contain the debate directly to those estimates rather than speaking under the first estimate of something that is really contained and referred to in another vote. I suggest that this is the opportunity to review this situation. Even today, by consent, we permitted this to go on with the hon. member for Downsview. I really think the hon. member for Downsview would get more out of this debate if it were under the proper item. I say that frankly. I think it is more fair to the Minister of the department concerned as well.

But the question of the opening remarks and debates of the estimates of each department leaves room for some observation on the practices which have crept in in this particular session. It is my understanding that the practice through the years, and the accepted practice, has been for a Minister to make or not make an opening statement; then the privilege is extended to the Opposition, to the leader of the Opposition, frankly, or to someone to whom he may delegate this responsibility, to speak in principle on the department concerned; and further, for a representative from the NDP to have the same privilege of speaking to the estimates in principle.

It seems to me we would all be on sounder ground if this practice were followed rather than to have the hon. leader of the Opposition—and I do not suggest any impropriety or motives to him—delegate his authority to a member who said yesterday that he spoke for the party in his remarks and then had the hon. leader of the Opposition coming back to retrieve his position.

Mr. Singer: That is not so at all.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I am speaking to the hon. leader of the Opposition. I think he might give this a little consideration so that we can approach these estimates in a businesslike fashion and with some order, so that all of us may understand what is being debated. I think we were getting, Mr. Chairman, to the point a moment ago, where the generalities of the discussion were far removed from any vote or estimate.

Mr. Thompson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would first say that I am sure the hon. Minister recognizes, as indeed do all of the hon. members from the opposite side, that there was absolutely no need for, or any question of me getting up to retrieve the position of my hon. colleague. There was nothing to retrieve as far as we are concerned. But I say also that I know that the hon. Minister had asked something and of course of course of Labour—I have talked to him about this—in some of the items coming up, would hope that we have an imaginative approach where we would be looking ahead to examine some long-term policies. I also know that he is the kind of person who does not want to believe in a form which is going to stultify any kind of debate. I think that applies, sir, through you, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister of Highways—that where there are questions to be raised—and certainly there are about highways—on what we are doing, and on where we are going, surely these questions could come from any member? I am sure that it would be welcomed by the government side.

I would say one of our problems, particularly with these estimates, is that you have really got three votes. And again, with respect, I would suggest that if there were more than three votes it would be easier for us to see the slot in which we should speak.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, there are three votes.

Mr. Thompson: Could I start with just a few remarks again concerning the purpose of highways? After all, we have been questioning the hon. Minister for a long period and it would be interesting if he would define his position on the purpose of highways.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Should there or should there not be a Department of Highways?

Mr. Singer: Well, you could start on that.

Mr. Thompson: It would not be a bad idea to discuss that. Having raised that fundamental question, the hon. Minister of Labour gives me the opportunity to go ahead and discuss it.

I would say this: Certainly he has been building highways, and he stands up each year and says, with pride, that there is more concrete laid all over the place. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Minister realizes, having built great highways, that suddenly there is a great flow of automobiles on these highways. He begins to wonder, "Well, how long do I have to go on building highways? There seems to be an incessant demand for them; I can never keep up. And we are spending billions of dollars on highways being built all over the province." I raise this because, to me, the purpose of highways, as the hon. Minister himself said so succinctly, is to transport goods or persons from one place to the other.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: What else?

Mr. Thompson: And I would suggest that perhaps he thinks that highways are the only means of transport. I do not think I am out of order in the debate—the subway was discussed in the estimates. I would like to look ahead on this. I am going to make some predictions; I am quite sure the hon. Minister should have some facts and some considerations also. He could reaffirm the stand of the government regarding the future transporting of people from one place to the other with not only the emphasis on the one aspect of highways. I think that we are going to see more subways being built, more of this form of short-range rapid public transport.

I think the experience of Metropolitan Toronto with subways has shown that these have to be developed much more, or we are going to get a greater congestion of cars stifling the centres of cities. I think, on the outer fringes—and this is what I raise with the hon. Minister—we are going to have to do much more with commuter rail lines. I suggest, sir, that Ontario probably has failed in this to a large extent. I know there have been studies done on it; we had a debate, a couple of years ago, on the use of commuter rail lines. I was in Europe a while back and saw the effectiveness of moving people by commuter rail lines, and I know that in the States there have been studies done on it.

I come back again to those two studies which the hon. Minister announced. I understood that they would be finalized, one in the fall and the other at the end of the year; perhaps the hon. Minister would enlarge on this after I sit down? He has had earlier studies. As I recall it, there were 15 commuter rail lines which could be used around this metropolitan area, with about 280 miles of track. I would like, really, to hear what the hon. Minister is considering doing with these kind of facilities.

I would like to suggest that we are going to have to look ahead to means of getting people and goods from one place to another other than by highways. I notice in the States—in fact, I had lunch today with someone who was telling me of the enormous amount of money spent by the American authorities to examine new approaches rather than the emphasis on cars. I was talking to this person, who had been to a seminar in the States, and I have made notes on some of the approaches he foresaw in the not-too-distant future. He had heard of trains that would be travelling 300 miles an hour on an air cushion; broader gauges to provide a faster roadbed; systems whereby local cars can be attached to express units; something like the piggyback system in connection with trucks; monorails; trains riding on rubber tires; automatic ticket-taking; scheduling by computer in relation to traffic volume at any given time; trains that will travel close to the speed of sound in tunnels; moving pedestrian belts; ways for short-distance urban travel; trains where you drive your car in at one end of the journey and off at the other. These are a few of the ideas that exist now, either on the drawing board or in working models or in experimental installations.

I do not know what kind of systems are eventually going to prove themselves, but I do know that we have to be looking for the answers right now. I would hope that the hon. Minister will tell us some of the research that is being done and some of the co-operation that is being made with the United States about such plans.

I would like to forecast there is going to be an extremely fast passenger express service between the urban centres at one end of the "Horseshoe" to the other, and from the north as well. I think there are going to be feeder commuter lines linking built-up areas to each other and to the express lines. There is going to be some form of air service between airports and downtown centres. There will be a limitation on private automobiles in city centres. There will be adequate parking facilities for commuters using the rapid transit systems. There will be in the urban centres themselves a network of rapid transit and bus lines providing access to all parts of the urban centre.

In connection with financing transportation, I think there is going to be a whole overhaul of our approach. I believe we are going to come to the point where we are not going to tax the railways for the right-of-way, we are going to subsidize them because they are going to add more value to the economy than they will cost. The province will not just subsidize municipal roadbuilding, it will subsidize municipal rapid transit and bus service as well. But in the long run the sophisticated approach to mixed transportation systems will cost the province and the municipality less than a single-minded obsession with public pavement. We will be into this both with capital funds and with funds to cover operating costs, because if we do not we are going to be spending more and more money on highways with less and less return on our investment.

We will also revise our thinking about jurisdiction. I am convinced that you are going to be looking at your approach on transport, which includes highways, from the regional unit point of view. In order that we can economically develop systems and the necessary services, we are going to have larger units when we are thinking of transport. I think even now, the metropolitan area, with some of the problems that we have, is too small for the type of thinking needed.

Too small, because for one thing you have the Yorkdale shopping centre and you have people from Barrie coming down to do shopping in this Yorkdale shopping centre; so you should be thinking of a larger regional area. It is too small because of the need of Toronto racing fans to be in Fort Erie on a sunny Saturday afternoon. Our chairman has changed; some chairmen are interested in seeing that we do go down to these areas.

But what I am really asking the hon. Minister is if he could give us some indication of forward thinking in this. I realize that these new technological advances come on us terribly quickly, and we can be caught with the implication that we have not looked to the future.

I have for a considerable number of years had to drive out to Malton airport, and it always struck me as one of the ironies of a great technological advance that you had people travelling into Toronto from distant points and then having to struggle on a two-lane highway, in a traffic jam, because there had not been planning in co-operation with advances in air travel.

This is why I come back to the point that just to talk of building highways is not good enough, we have to see it in relation to other means of transport. It is for that reason that I appreciate the indulgence of the hon. Minister of Labour, and look forward to hearing your philosophy and also of some of the possible approaches and what the future holds for us.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether you are going to hear any great flights of philosophical—or fancy prognostication is a good word—except of course I agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition that transportation modes and habits and trends are changing as fast or faster than society. He made reference to the fact that he has done a great deal of travelling abroad, and presumably through the United States of America, and so have I.

In the course of carrying out my responsibilities as chairman of this Metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study we have examined Boston, we have examined New York, Philadelphia, Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles; and I can only largely concur with the fact that all these matters of transportation modes are being very actively examined at the moment. In the United States the federal authority puts up large sums of money to subsidize these cities to do just the type of study that we are undertaking here entirely with provincial funds. The cost of the Metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study is being paid entirely by provincial funds. Now when you get outside of Canada and go to a city like Boston or New York or Philadelphia or any one of the major cities there, the entire amount of funds involved in these studies is advanced to these urban municipalities these large sprawling complexes, by the federal government.

Having said that, that does not mean that because of lack of federal funds we should not pursue the same thing here.

Mr. Thompson: Just on that point of financing: The two studies to which I was referring, there was one on which they were going to have public acceptance—I am quoting from what I have written from Hansard—you are having a survey to determine the public acceptance, the cost and the economic feasibility of establishing an experimental rail commuter service to operate between Burlington and Ajax.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Right!

Mr. Thompson: We are in concord in connection with the two studies to which I am referring. The other was conducting an overall scientific survey of transportation characteristics and requirements of the entire region extending from Hamilton to Bowmanville and stretching north to Barrie.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Let me point out it has been said many times that the area under study involves basically a radius of 50 miles from Toronto, or probably a little more. It reaches the environs of Hamilton on the west, Oshawa on the east and Barrie on the north; and within that radius of course is the area under study.

Now when you talk about reports, let me point out to you that the first report that was published was what we call a physical feasibility report, for which we engaged a firm of consultants who told us in the first instance that commuter rail project was physically feasible. In other words, the abandonment of many miles of track converging upon Toronto from all directions as a result of the marshalling yards built by both the railways left this trackage available. So the first study then was to determine the extent to which this mileage of rail could be made adaptable for commuter service purposes. The report indicated that in varying degrees of adaptability it could all be used, with a variety of, let us say sensible, impact on the community.

Second then, a prospectus was tabled and published, and I am sure that every member of the House got one, which outlined the overall approach to the study by the Metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study.

Now, the two studies to which the hon. member made reference and which I spoke about a number of weeks ago, are stages of the overall study. The study was broken down into stages, it was compartmentalized, for rather obvious reasons. When I am in a position to do so, and this will not take too much longer, to tell the House the expense, the manner in which this all-embracing thing is being surveyed and the data that we have accumulated, I have every reason to believe that the hon. member is going to be very much impressed with the nature of this work. But even as recently as this morning, when the executive committee met with the technical and advisory committee or the working group, it was decided that rather than wait now for an all-embracing, voluminous report, we would compartmentalize this thing and produce interim reports, all of which, when completed, would form the whole report.

I confidently hope, Mr. Chairman, that we will have something to report to the House associated with the various stages of this study, and certainly one stage of it, in the course of a very short time; I would hope before the House rises.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Minister is saying that this is a study in stages of commuter service between, say, Burlington and Ajax?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: My reply to the hon. leader, Mr. Chairman, would be that the commuter rail project is one stage of the overall transportation study. That one is nearing completion; I think that I mentioned that in the House earlier.

In the course of the hon. member's remarks, he did make reference to new and challenging and interesting modes of travel, and I am sure he will find that stage-by-stage we will go through the process of this study until it is completed and that all of these things to which he made reference, and sensibly made reference, will be dealt with—

Mr. Thompson: In the study—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: —when the final compilation is made. But rather than do it all as one, we are breaking it up. We are examining the travel habits and the customs of the people—for instance, as associated with various travel modes.

The hon. leader made reference to my observation on that and, of course, that is a very important part of the study. It characterizes all of the studies that are being made in all of the major communities of the United States.

These are the things that have to be determined before new travel modes can be implemented, or before we can say that we do not need highways any more and that we need something else. I think, frankly, that we will; I think that all manner of new transportation modes and means of transporting people will develop, and very quickly. But at the moment, Mr. Chairman, rather than give the hon. leader of the Opposition an opinion off the top of the head, I prefer to wait, because we are studying this thing in a very intensive and exhaustive manner and largely along the lines of some of the suggestions he advanced to the House this afternoon.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the hon. Minister that I appreciate that he is studying these various approaches to be taken. I assume that he is in touch with studies that have been done in U.S. cities and, as he said, we will get a more comprehensive and broad study tabled in this Legislature within, possibly—this month?

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

On vote 801:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), through you, what are the administrative costs of this department as a percentage of the total expenditures? Would he have such a figure?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Chairman, do I understand the hon. member correctly? Is he talking about the total budget of The Department of Highways versus the entire Budget for the province of Ontario?

Mr. Newman: No, the total budget for the administration portion of this department as compared with the total budget of the department.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: If you are looking at vote 801, which is the main office under the ordinary expenditure vote, and if you call the main office the administrative section of the department, it is a rather simple equation because it is shown there as $4,746,000 versus a total budget of almost $330 million.

Mr. Newman: There certainly would be some administrative charges in the other two votes, would there not?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will be indulgent enough to permit me, that this is something we can provide some information on, but I do not have this readily available. Of course there are some administrative charges in the other votes, there is no question about that. If the hon. member will indulge me, we will provide this information for him.

Mr. Newman: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am not anxious for the answer immediately. I have received such figures from other administrations and I would like to see how they compare with this department in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It will compare very favourably, I am quite sure.

Mr. Newman: I certainly hope so. We are looking forward to having it compare very favourably; we would like it to compare very favourably.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, no doubt about it.

Mr. Newman: The next question, Mr. Chairman, if I may, is: What amount has been set aside in the budget for signals, gates and flashers at level crossings which are not separated? If the hon. Minister can supply this later, that is quite all right.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think I will have to ask the hon. member to indulge me again. It is not in this vote in the first place, but we will work at it here and we will try to provide him with the answer before the House rises. If not, we will do it later on.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, it is quite difficult to ask a question that would be specifically in the one vote, unless the votes were broken down in a little more minute detail.

Mr. Chairman, if I may, has the department ever considered painting the sides of all highways with a special type of paint as a promotion for safer highway travel?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: You mean edge-of-pavement marking? Yes, these matters have been considered, and certainly in certain traffic zones I think more information can be made available on this. I do not think it has ever been anticipated or recognized that the painting of pavement edges in the overall sense was an expedient thing to do. We certainly do it in accident-prone locations, and we do it where there is a poor definition of the section of highway, and so on. It is done rather extensively but, no, not on the paved portion of all highways.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Minister, I really meant over portions of those highways that would be accident prone, because I would see no advantage in having it on a straight road.

Has the department ever considered, or experimented with, special treatment for the edge of the highway so that an individual could tell by sound when driving a motor car that he was a little too close to the edge of the road?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No.

Mr. Newman: No. There is a treatment that can be incorporated in the road so that a hum factor is created in the car and a driver can tell that he is right at the edge of the road and has to exert a little more caution.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, this is done in certain areas of divided highways where there is no median strip or, let us say, four lanes undivided, if you like. In certain sections this device is employed, but in the general sense, no.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, is there a definite reason why this is not done? Is it expense or is it that it does not serve a practical purpose?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I would be more inclined to think that the latter is the basis that can be accepted as the reason for why it is not done.

Mr. Newman: Does the department experiment with such procedures on highways as various treatments for the roads as added safety features?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I would say in a general sense that the department, through its research branch, if you wish, and through other appropriate sections of the department, continually experiments in all matters of this kind. We have a rather fully constituted research branch in the department, now headed by a knowledgeable and experienced director and a knowledgeable and experienced staff, and the matter of research into the situation that the hon. member described, and many other matters that lend themselves to sensible research, is a constant exercise in the department. That is answering in rather general terms, Mr. Chairman, but I think I can assure the hon. member that these fields of research are under constant scrutiny; there is no question about that.

Mr. Newman: My point, Mr. Chairman, is to make the highway as safe as possible for the individual so that by the application of one type of feature or another, the individual would himself be responsible for the accidents, and they would not occur as a result of the highways not being improved upon after some fashion.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes. Mr. Chairman, I think I have to say to the hon. member that surely it is as obvious to us as it is to him that all areas of accident prevention and the examination of accident-prone locations are matters that we must be equally concerned about. Every accident, fatal or otherwise, is reported to the department; we have a section that examines each of these; we examine the reports of the coroners; we examine the statistics of the information presented to us by the Ontario provincial police, and in each and every circumstance, the involved section of highway is thoroughly checked into and remedial measures are taken wherever they appear to be warranted. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, and assure the hon. member—and indeed the House—that this is a process that will continue. There can be no question about the concern of the department in this area of precautions for the safety of the driving public.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, has the centre line on the highways been extended since the highway speed has been raised from 50 to 60 miles an hour, especially going uphill or around a curve; because at 50 miles an hour it takes longer to do the passing than it would at 60.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, the answer is yes. We conform to the international standards of centre-line markings as a device to improve the safety factor of driving on our King's highways and other highways in the province.

I might amplify this by saying that as a result of the tour by myself and the commissioner of the Ontario provincial police last July from London to Windsor, supported by senior staff of the department and senior staff of the commissioner, a number of recommendations were made with respect to centre-line marking and other markings. In other words, over long gradual curves, the double, solid line was extended, and this again is a matter that is constantly under survey, and is dealt with in terms, as I mentioned, of the international pavement marking processes that we all adhere to.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, how does the department purchase its communication equipment? Is it by invitation tender or by public tender?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It is done on a tender basis. I am not sure if it is public or by invitation; it may be public. There are only three companies that are actually capable of providing this type of equipment. There is no need to name them, but it is done on a tender basis.

I might say, in expanding on that for the benefit of the hon. member and for the information of the House, that up until not too long ago we acquired these facilities by ownership; now we do it on a lease basis. We now find it is more expedient to own the facilities than to lease them. I may have reversed the order there at the outset, but now the facilities for telecommunication are owned largely by the department, and as our leases expire in those areas where leases are still applicable, we will move into the area of entire ownership by the department. It has been found to be more efficient, more economical.

Again, on this particular subject, Mr. Chairman, for the interest of the House, we will complete our telecommunication system, serving 18 districts from one end of the province to the other, very shortly. I think the last district to be provided with these facilities is the Fort William district and we may even give some recognition to this by going to Fort William for that purpose in June or July.

At that point, sir, the entire system will be provided with complete telecommunication facilities. As I have said, the majority of them are now owned by the department, and as our present leases expire we will own all the facilities ourselves.

Mr. Newman: Is the equipment serviced by the department itself or is it under a contract?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We enter into a service contract with the manufacturers who supply the equipment to us. It is serviced by the manufacturers of the equipment from whom the purchase is made. One that comes to mind is the Motorola Corporation. If we buy Motorola equipment then a service agreement is entered into with the company to provide the type of service that is required.

Mr. Newman: Does the hon. Minister think that that is a cheaper way of servicing the equipment than having his own employees do it?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, I would say to the hon. member that if we are doing it that way it should be obvious that we think it is most efficient and economical. I think the answer must be obvious. If it was any different, we would not be doing it this way.

Mr. Newman: I am very glad—

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): How does he know it is the cheaper way?

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, how do you know it is the cheaper way if you have not done it the other way?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Well, how do you know it is not?

Mr. Thompson: It is a perfectly reasonable question.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I would say, for the information of the hon. member and for the information of the House, that there was a complete and exhaustive study made of the entire telecommunication process. As a result of this, it was determined that this was not only the most efficient method of taking care of maintenance, but the most economical. I simply suggest to you that, basically, the function of The Department of Highways is to build and maintain roads and we think the people who build electronic equipment and telecommunication equipment are much better equipped to service it than we are.

Mr. Thompson: But you have spent too much money sometimes on highways, when you look back over your history.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister had mentioned that The Department of Highways is interested solely in building roads.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I did not say that.

Mr. Newman: Could he inform us who makes the signs for The Department of Highways?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That was not what I said.

Mr. Newman: Well, you inferred that. Is the equipment purchased by the department of the same make as the equipment used in Lands and Forests?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Not necessarily.

Mr. Newman: Would it not be cheaper then to be using a similar type of equipment in both departments?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Not necessarily.

Mr. Newman: The department purchases its vehicle needs from the manufacturer. Does the department service its own vehicles?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, the department does service its own vehicles to a very large extent.

Mr. Newman: Well, this is a little different from your electronic equipment. Just a while ago you told me that it was cheaper to have the electronic manufacturer service the equipment.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, has the department ever considered regionalizing its cars and trucks? For example, having Ford equipment exclusively in one region, Chrysler equipment in another and General Motors in a third? Then one set of parts could be kept in one area and one type of vehicle serviced there; the other type of vehicle, used exclusively in a second area, would be serviced in that area.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No!

An hon. member: Definitely not.

Mr. Newman: Well—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, the answer is no.

Mr. Newman: Does not the hon. Minister think it would be more economical to have equipment regionalized after a fashion, like that?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, again on the basis of very careful research over a long period of time, the answer is no.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an observation on that answer; that is, I think it would be much simpler for a mechanic to be working on one type of equipment than on four different types of equipment.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may ask of the hon. Minister: What is the department's policy on rental of equipment?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I must confess, Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the hon. member; I am sorry.

Mr. Thompson: I would say, Mr. Chairman, that if we had less heckling perhaps the hon. Minister could hear the question.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may ask of the hon. Minister: What is his policy on equipment rental?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Is the hon. member talking about the matter of roadbuilding equipment rental or—

Mr. Newman: I will mention one specific vehicle—half-ton pick-ups.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Half-ton pick-ups?

Mr. Newman: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I would say that generally, Mr. Chairman, the policy is one of ownership rather than rental in that particular field.

Mr. Newman: In that particular field?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes.

Mr. Newman: I am most pleased to hear that because I had understood that the department had rented half-ton pick-ups, paid approximately $175 a month for the rental of the equipment, used it for approximately six months, which would have been a cost of $1,050 in a year—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: If the hon. member would permit me to interrupt, I said this was the process generally. There may have been isolated exceptions which would have no bearing on the general policy. Generally, the policy is, as I have mentioned, Mr. Chairman, one of ownership.

Mr. Newman: I am more than pleased to hear that because, under the other policy, it would have cost from four to five times the price to purchase over a period of time.

An hon. member: What kind of air did you use in the tires?

Mr. Newman: Conservative air; it is all hot! It is Conservative hot air they use in the tires.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the department would have quite a substantial sign-making department. Are these signs made in a central location or are they made in the various district offices?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I think in the majority of instances they are made in the various district offices, spread over the 18 districts of the department. They are also fabricated in certain forms and designs, I think, at the centre at Downsview; but, by and large, this work is spread around the province throughout the 18 district offices which are well equipped, I might say, to undertake the work.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the contractors are required to be prequalified. Who decides as to whether a contractor is prequalified? Does the department have a committee?

An hon. member: First of all, they find out whether they are Conservative or not.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The matter of prequalification is decided by a committee of The Department of Highways on a formula basis.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to raise a question, and I raise it under 802.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, may I ask, then: If the hon. member is going to talk on 802, can we assume that vote 801 has been carried?

Vote 801 agreed to.

On vote 802:

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I think if we are to be correct, 801 was carried some time ago.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I might say you would never know.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): That is because of the way you present your estimates.

Mr. Gisborn: When the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) got up and gave the Opposition a lecture on sticking to the estimates, that was when we moved to 802 from 801. Nevertheless, I see in 802 there are something like 30 items; and, as requested by the hon. Minister of Labour, I will try to stick with some of those items.

I want to deal with the one that is fourth from the bottom—toll bridge operations. I will be very brief. Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister: He will recall that, last September, The Department of Highways, in conjunction with The Department of Transport, endorsed the bylaw for the city of Hamilton to ban trucks on the so-called "beach strip" in Hamilton. Subsequent to, or in conjunction with that order, the department, I would assume under the hon. Minister of Highways, reduced the tolls on the Burlington skyway toll bridge for the tractors, trailers, buses and large trucks. At that point, before the reduction, the cash fare was .45 cents per trip and they were reduced, and the commuter tickets at that point were books of 20 at 30 cents apiece, which was $6, and they were reduced 50 per cent to the fare of books of 40 at .15 cents apiece for a total of $6. Would the hon. Minister tell us what brought about the reduction in the tolls for the buses and trailers?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, Mr. Chairman. This is a matter of some interest and one that is not too difficult to explain to the House. The hon. member for Wentworth East recalls, of course, that there was some controversy in the Hamilton area over the use of the beach strip by trucks particularly. The area residents and the children in the area were being endangered by this excessive traffic. At that point, the bylaw of the city of Hamilton to close the beach strip was approved by the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) and subsequently in the Cabinet, and it was felt that a reduction in the rates of tolls because of the increased traffic that would use the bridge—and this has been the result—might well be considered. As a matter of fact, it was offered as a sensible inducement to those operators of fleets of trucks to consider the peaceful, if you like, abandonment of the use of the beach strip and utilize the facilities of the Burlington skyway.

It is interesting, I think, to observe that since these sensible decisions were reached, the increased volume of traffic over the bridge facilities at the lower rates of toll have not only kept pace, but I think exceeded, in terms of volume and revenue, the revenues that formerly accrued to the operation. If we have provided for the sensible use of the beach strip, and accommodated the city of Hamilton, and the residents who live in that area on the one hand, and made it more acceptable—and even, if you like, more economical—to use the bridge facility by the large fleets of trucks on the other hand, and we have combined a package that has accomplished that result, then I think that, frankly, everybody is happy.

As far as I am aware, it has ended the controversy that had raged for a period of months and if the hon. member is interested in the supporting figures that I made reference to in terms of increased use of the bridge facility and the protection of the beach strip facility, then I have these figures for him. But, by and large, I think that we combined with the city of Hamilton, the trucking industry and all concerned, to put together a sensible package that generally met with the approval and acceptance of all interested people. I think maybe that is the answer to the hon. member's question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, never have I heard such a weak excuse for a department of this government kowtowing to the pressure of the trucking industry in this province. When the controversy—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I am going to rise on a point of order here. There was no such thought of kowtowing to the trucking industry or any other segment of our economy. This was a matter that was thoroughly discussed with the trucking industry, if you like, and with the city of Hamilton; and, by and large, as I mentioned, and I will repeat it and I will emphasize it, we put together a sensible package that suited everybody. I am prepared to say that is one of the great functions of the government of the day. We please a lot of people in this province and that is why we sit over here. If you do not like it—

Mr. Gisborn: I think, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister could speak for the next four hours and he would never change the effect of what happened with regard to the reduction of the tolls for the trucking industry on the Burlington skyway. When the controversy was carried on about the banning of trucks from the beach strip, the whole argument that the trucking industry put up was that its stake trucks would not be able to negotiate the grade—it would hurt their machinery.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We did not buy this at the time; we did not accept this at all.

Mr. Gisborn: And the hon. Minister of Highways did not even have the agreement of the city council or the Hamilton labour council or any organization in the Hamilton area to reduce the tolls for the trucking industry.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): What has the labour council to do with it?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Gisborn: The Hamilton labour council has a lot to do with what goes on in Hamilton. It is a responsible organization.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Gisborn: All I have to say is that the need for banning the trucks on the beach strip was developed through the efforts of the council and the irate citizens on the beach strip when a child was killed. They put up a barricade and stopped the traffic for some time. This generated the eventual agreement by The Department of Highways and The Department of Transport to okay the bylaw passed by the city of Hamilton.

There was nothing wrong as far as I was concerned with reducing the tolls for the trucking industry, but at the same time you should have reduced by 50 per cent the tolls for the average commuter in a passenger car who goes to work in the city of Hamilton. The $2 in their pocket every two or three weeks was just as good for them as it was for the trucking industry and I do not think the hon. Minister can give any logical excuse, other than that the pressure of the trucking industry brought about a reduction in tolls on that skyway bridge.

I think the department and the government should look over their policy of tolls on bridges in this province and take the tolls off. The opinion of our party has been well expressed in the past. Hamilton city council has been in favour of removal of the tolls and there has been no support for them in that area.

Mr. McKeough: What about the labour council?

Mr. Gisborn: I say it is a shame that the department buckled to the trucking industry with regard to tolls on that bridge and reduced them when it banned the trucks on the beach strip.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, how often are general contractors paid after they have—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, they are paid on a monthly basis against certified progress certificates.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Minister, your own members were laughing, and now you tell them they were paid on a monthly basis.

Does the department check to see if the general contractor has fulfilled his obligations to subcontractors?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, the answer to that is first: Of course. A progress certificate properly certified implies that subcontractors have been given their proper remuneration. There is no question about the fact that we protect the interest of the subcontractor.

Mr. Newman: Supposing a subcontractor has not been paid and he registers a complaint. How does he go about filing this complaint?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The prime contractor is not paid out in full until the department is satisfied that all the subcontractors have been properly paid.

Mr. Newman: The general contractor, the prime contractor, gets a monthly instalment from the department.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, he only gets a percentage of this. There is a hold-back on these contracts.

Mr. Newman: Yes, but on a monthly basis. You still pay him every month?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, he is paid every month. But there is a hold-back, and out of this hold-back we ensure that the subcontractors are paid before the hold-back moneys are released. These are held for a sufficient period of time to ensure that all obligations, all creditors of the prime contractor, have been taken care of.

Mr. Newman: That is quite all right; but if a job is going to last for approximately a year a smaller subcontractor may not be able to last for the full year unless he gets some type of funds paid to him from the general contractor. What can the subcontractor resort to, with the department, to ensure that the general contractor is paying him or is going to pay him?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: First of all, I think it is only sensible to say that there is an area of responsibility involved in his contractual relations with the prime contractor. Our dealings, at first hand, are with the prime contractor and the prime contractor only; but if he feels, at any stage of the duration of the contract, that he is not being properly compensated for the work he has done, he can notify the department. The department will investigate it with the prime contractor, and usually the matter is adjusted. But we deal only in initial circumstances with the prime contractor, and properly so. I mean the contractual relations between a subcontractor and a prime contractor are something between these two contractors, not the department.

Mr. Newman: Yes. I am very glad to get that report from the hon. Minister. Are there any fees involved if a subcontractor wishes to have his claim heard by the department? Because I understand this department hears claims of subcontractors.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Claims heard or entertained first by the claims branch, or the claims committee of the department, must be arranged through the prime contractor. As I just finished telling the hon. member, our negotiations are, in essence, with the prime contractor. We will hear claims of subcontractors but, in most circumstances, they are arranged through the prime contractor who gets the contract.

I think it is fair to say—I may stand some correction on this—through the procedures of the claims section of the department, which is headed by a claims engineer, there is no charge for this service. If he proceeds to the claims committee there is a charge. But if a claim is entered by a subcontractor it will be paid out to the prime contractor, and back through the prime contractor to the subcontractor. We actually have no contractual relationships of any kind with the subcontractor in The Department of Highways.

Mr. Newman: Well, Mr. Chairman, I was only interested in the subcontractor, seeing that the subcontractor received remuneration from the prime contractor. If he feels he is being discriminated against then I understand he has resource to this claims committee. What fees are generally charged to a subcontractor if he were to raise a claim with the claims committee? Are they substantial, or are they very nominal?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The fees are nominal; but to go back a little bit, let me say that a subcontractor with an outstanding claim, where the prime contractor has not met his legitimate obligations, probably would be in some circumstances, paid by the department and taken out of the hold-back moneys due to the prime contractor. We think we have built in all the protection that it is possible to build for subcontractors in this manner; and the charges for proceeding with a claim in the available conventional manner, the fees for this, are nominal. I would have to put it that way, Mr. Chairman; probably up to a maximum of $500, if you wish.

Mr. Newman: They are not $100 a day, are they?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Oh, no.

Mr. Newman: They are not?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Oh, no.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Chairman, earlier in the year I asked a question of the hon. Minister regarding anti-rust additives in the salt used on our highways, and I received a very well documented reply. I just wonder what response the department had to the inquiries sent out to the various councils in district No. 1. In my particular riding it seemed almost unanimous that they would like to have this anti-rust additive added to their salt.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I will have to get this information. I can say, in general terms, that a number of municipalities which were approached indicated that they would be happy to participate in a programme which would involve the use of rust inhibitor. Now, to locate these district by district, or county by county, at the moment I must say, Mr. Chairman, is a little difficult; but this information can be made available to the hon. member if he will indulge us to that extent.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question in regard to what I said this afternoon about those 13 companies which were price fixing or contract rigging in the province. How many contracts—or maybe the hon. Minister does not have this information available—were awarded by The Department of Highways during that 90-day suspension of these 12, or whatever number of companies there were?

Mr. McKeough: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. The hon. member, my colleague from Kent East, raised this under the last vote. Are we going to bring this up under every vote? How many times must we discuss the same subject?

Mr. Thompson: On a point of order. We have appreciated very much that the hon. Minister is prepared to answer questions and recognizes that, from the point of view of the role of the Opposition and the province, there should be a complete, fair hearing. And it is significant to me that the hon. Minister recognizes this while a young member does not see the role of the Opposition.

Mr. Chairman: If the Minister cares to answer.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: May I just simply say to the hon. member that I thought I had that information with me. I do not have it. It will be readily available later; as I told the hon. member for Essex South, if the hon.

member will indulge us again we will provide him with the details of this. I hoped I could have provided it to him on the spot but I just do not seem to have it with me; but it is readily available and we will make it available to the hon. member in due course.

Mr. Spence: I want to thank the hon. Minister. Another question: I would like to ask the hon. Minister how many properties there are along the route of the Macdonald-Cartier freeway on which he has not reached final settlement. Would the hon. Minister have the number of properties available?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Has the hon. member been making reference to the entire route, the entire 510 miles?

Mr. Spence: Southwestern Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Southwestern Ontario.

Again, I cannot tell you but I would say to the hon. member there are few, if any, left outstanding, which have not been settled. The numbers and the particulars can be provided, but there are very few left, if any, of which I am aware.

Mr. Spence: I appreciate that, Mr. Minister. Another question I would like to ask of the hon. Minister: What was the revenue derived by your department, or the government, from service centres along the route of Highway 401, or Macdonald-Cartier?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I will have the precise information for you here in a moment. I would say that, for the 12 months ending March 31, 1965, I believe, it is just under $1 million. As a matter of fact, I have the exact details here; let us see what they are.

For the information of the hon. member and the House, there are 15 centres on Highway 401. In terms of revenue, we received, in basic ground rental, $54,500; estimated gross percentage rentals, $750,000. For four centres on Highway 400, the estimated basic ground rental is $28,100; and the gross percentage rental, $135,000. When these totals are added up, the total estimated annual revenue for all existing service centres, for the year just ended at March 31, is $967,600.

Mr. Spence: Good!

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): I have a question I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: These hyenas to my left have hurt their flippers from thumping the desks, and now they are turning to heckling. They are experts; you should pay them a little bit more than they are getting for doing absolutely nothing.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bukator: I am sure their flippers have been hurt from pounding the desks so long, Mr. Chairman. But I would like to ask this question: Those buildings that you have built along the highways; do you know what they cost? Are you paying taxes to the municipality in which they are constructed? And, if you are, are you paying on the same basis by which other people in the same business have to pay taxes on their buildings?

An hon. member: That is a good question.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Actually, Mr. Chairman, the facilities to which the hon. member refers are not owned by The Department of Highways. They are owned by the oil companies who operate them. In line with the observations I made a moment ago, we do provide water; I think we provide for the access to and egress from the highway; and for that we charge a ground rental. From that point on, these buildings are erected by and become the property of the successful bidder when the tenders are called for each location.

The other revenue accrues because the location, on a tender basis, is awarded to that company which bids the highest percentage of the gross in terms of rental, or revenue as you call it, to The Department of Highways. But the facility, other than the items I have mentioned, is owned entirely by the oil company; and I would only presume that they are assessed by the municipality in which they are situated. I do not know that; I cannot tell the hon. member; and this is something else we can pursue but we would not know because we do not own them, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bukator: Then, to follow up, you do own the land on which those buildings are erected and from that land you collect $1 million of revenue. Now, do you pay to the municipality on the land, like any other taxpayer would have to pay; and if not, why not?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: By and large, and subject to correction, which I shall promise to provide for the hon. member, these centres, I think it may transpire, are built on property owned by The Department of Highways. If they are owned by The Department of Highways, of course, then they are on Crown property, and again there may be no tax factor. Would the hon. member permit me to clarify this and let him know?

Mr. Bukator: Yes, I would like to know and I am prepared to wait.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Thank you!

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister give us the estimated cost to the public Treasury of the collusive bidding practices of the 13 companies reported on by the restrictive trade practices commission during the period 1959, 1960 and 1961?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat difficult to answer this. To determine, first of all, whether any cost is involved or not is difficult, if not impossible. First, let me say, while it is recognized and was admitted, as I said this afternoon, by the companies referred to in the report of the restrictive trade practices commission, that they did in fact do what has been said they did, and which resulted in the tabling of the report, I doubt very much if, in all final honesty, it cost the department any more money. I do not think it did. Certainly it would be difficult to establish that it did. Again I say they were involved in collusive practices, but these collusive practices in themselves do not always mean that the cost to The Department of Highways is any more; and I would have very great difficulty; I suggest to the House, in establishing that this was the case.

An hon. member: Or even less!

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That is a good question; as to whether it would be less: It does not always transpire that these practices involve higher costs; and, in some instances, it is possible to say that they do involve less costs.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Why are they illegal practices?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Why are they collusive then?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Because they are collusive. They simply, by these practices, obtain control of all the bidding and all the work in certain areas of the province to the exclusion of others. This is the basic ill of the thing.

Mr. Bryden: But their purpose in doing that is to obtain monopoly profits for themselves, in time at any rate.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, this is true. I could read to you, and will if you wish, excerpts from the reports of the people who undertake these investigations. I think, somewhere, we have reports made to the standing committee of the House of Commons by the restrictive trade practices commission, who operated under The Combines Investigation Act. There is a very broad area of doubt as to what extent these practices cost more money, notwithstanding that they are collusive and probably involve a confrontation with what we like to think are the free enterprise principles of bidding. But to establish that there is any more cost involved, I simply would ask the House to accept my assurance that it is very difficult to establish this.

Mr J. H. White (London South): Well, the hon. member for Woodbine acknowledges that that is an economic factor.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I wonder if I might have that. I know, as a matter of fact—let us put it this way: While the parallel may not be identical, in this instance, in the instance under discussion here in the House, they were collusive bids, where they were arranged by a group of contractors in an area of the province to sort of protect themselves.

Mr. A. J. Reaume (Essex North): That is honest, is it?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Nevertheless, these practices, and I think it is admitted here—this is a statement by the standing committee on public accounts made by—well, it is a report by the Auditor General, if you like—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Read the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, I will not read the whole thing. But in this particular instance he goes on to say, before the standing committee:

In some industries occupied by very few firms, price behaviour has become so conventionalized that agreement which may be undue within the meaning of the Act can be achieved with a minimum of consultation among competitors.

Mr. Reaume: Honest crooks!

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: He goes on to say:

I have publicly urged buyers for governments, federal, provincial and municipal utilities, and other public agencies, to report to the combines branch tendering practices, including identical tenders, that they consider may result from collusion. Such reports are continually received and all are examined. I suggest that it is important that public buyers should not lose sight of the fact that collusive tenders are more likely to result in non-identical bids than in identical bids. And while all should be reported, areas of collusion should not be overlooked through a pre-occupation with identical tenders.

But when you get into this whole area I simply suggest to the hon. member, in fairness, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to establish that any actual cost accrues to the public purse.

We deplore these collusive practices; we have taken the action that we felt was appropriate in the circumstances; but there is a very broad area of doubt as to whether it costs anybody any more money. I do not know how to answer it any better than that, Mr. Chairman, I simply say that to the hon. member.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the hon. Minister contradicted the statement of the restrictive trade practices commission, which states that:

On the other hand, unquestionably, both The Department of Highways and the municipalities were led to award surfacing contracts at prices higher than they would have in circumstances of normal competition among the spray companies.

Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister supply the House with the number of contracts which were awarded to these 13 companies during that three-year period, and also during the period subsequent to 1961 up until the time that this report was published, because it is my understanding that The Department of Highways was unaware of this investigation taking place and that, therefore, these 13 companies were engaged in this practice for at least a period of three years and probably a period of six years, and perhaps longer? It would seem to me that the department must have made some estimate of the actual cost to the public Treasury of this kind of collusive bidding practice in the light of this report.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Of course, Mr. Chairman, to reply to the hon. member without really belabouring this thing, the suggestion that the department was unaware that this sort of thing took place is not correct. The department is very much aware of it, but I suggest that the department's facilities for dealing with this matter, and the powers given to The Department of Highways to deal with it, are not to be compared with the federal authority under The Combines Investigation Act. We have no such statute on the books of the province. When these facts were brought to the light of the department because of the tabling of the report, immediate action was taken.

We can suspect; we can act; and we do act where we have firm ground to do so. Our procedures are examined constantly to eliminate this type of collusive practice, there is no question about this, but we do not have the facilities of the federal government, as I pointed out, under The Combines Investigation Act, to proceed as it does. Let me read to you from the report of the restrictive trade practices commission, the one tabled last August, which resulted in these pre-qualification penalties:

In theory at least, a capable newcomer should be able to enter the field with a minimum of purchased equipment and respond to DHO [Department of Highways, Ontario] and municipal tenders called. If he could underbid the established firms he could get work.

In practice, however, a new concern met substantial obstacles to establishment in the industry. Unless a contractor owned a large percentage of the equipment needed and had sufficient working capital, his chances of eventual success were small. Many who tried to enter the field with rented equipment only, have failed in competition with the established firms, which were generally substantially financed and equipped.

One of the major causes of entry difficulty facing a new contractor was that he would have to be prepared to bid very low, at cost or less, to secure contracts. The established firms were prepared to fight him concertedly and effectively and the method used has been described as "policing the bidding."

This is, in effect, what they did in an effort to exclude a newcomer, and working together collusively—as was proved—a very low bid might be entered.

Mr. Bryden: But that would be an isolated case.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Not as isolated as the hon. member might think. One can have an awareness of this thing but how can it be proved? How is it substantiated? I make no apologies—

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister not know if there were a new bidder in a particular contract tender?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, the Minister would know this.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister said that of course the department was aware of this over a period—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We suspected it, I would say.

Mr. Thompson: I think the hon. Minister said previously that he was aware of it.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Aware of the possibility, at least.

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry—

An hon. member: The hon. Minister said he was aware of it.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I qualify it now.

Mr. Thompson: I suggest to the hon. Minister that although he does not have the power himself but the federal government does, surely if the department of the hon. Minister was aware of this practice of collusion, he would notify the federal government—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Indeed—

Mr. Thompson: —in order that action would be taken.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Indeed, and we do. I say to the hon. leader of the Opposition, Mr. Chairman, that we maintain a constant contact with the representatives of the restrictive trade practices commission. They are in our office—

Mr. Thompson: In this particular case, had the hon. Minister notified the federal department in order that it could initiate an investigation?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, probably not specifically, but because of the fact that these people are constantly in our office and we afford them every conceivable co-operation in terms of examination of our records and procedures, I doubt very much if we dealt with any specific situations. They invariably go away with the information they require at the time and they come, and they are there frequently and sometimes for long periods of time.

To the extent that we provide them with every avenue of co-operation and that they go home with all the information they appear to want, what, of specific character, would the hon. leader of the Opposition suggest that we do? I simply do not know. We go as far as we think it is sensible to go. There is no area of information or co-operation that is not extended to them; they are there frequently; they have been there recently and they will be there again, and I think, as a matter of fact, a contact with the restrictive trade practices commission would result in complete endorsement of what I have said here today. I am quite confident that they would say that they get the most complete co-operation from the department.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, following up on this point, my colleague the hon. member for Riverdale quoted from the actual report to the effect that this had resulted in higher bids to The Department of Highways. If The Department of Highways has no idea as to how much the public may have lost, through those higher bids, has it ever considered making a specific request for that information from the restrictive trade practices commission, which undoubtedly has the full details on the operations of these companies?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, Mr. Chairman, that has never been done, because we have had numerous discussions with the representatives of the restrictive trade practices commission and while the commission established that the practices were collusive, if you like—and I will use no other word—it is still not convinced that this actually costs the taxpayers any more money.

Mr. MacDonald: But—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Nor are we.

Mr. MacDonald: They have quoted to you—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, they have not said that.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, let us have the quote.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, the report specifically tells us that—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Where is that?

Mr. Renwick: On page 27.

On the other hand, unquestionably, both The Department of Highways and the municipalities were led to award surfacing contracts at prices higher than they would have awarded in circumstances of normal competition among the spray companies.

I think that one of the important matters for us to learn here tonight is what steps the department is taking in the light of the additional cost to the public Treasury of this collusive bidding practice, and what steps are going to be taken in the future, or have been taken, to eliminate to the extent possible this type of collusive practice. Certainly, one step which can obviously be taken is that if a new name appears on a tender in a given area, the department should scrupulously make certain that someone is not sitting in the room with two bids—one to cut out the newcomer and one to bid if the newcomer does not bid on the transaction. Surely this is one step which the department can take.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: This is being pursued all the time.

Mr. Renwick: Another matter which obviously comes to mind is to study the pattern of the contracts which were awarded to those 13 companies over a period of, say, the last ten or 15 years, to find out just how long this particular practice has been going on, how this business was carved up among the 13 companies, and to try to make some estimation in relation to other contracts where there may have been reasonable competition—where it could be assumed to make some calculation of the cost to the public Treasury of this loss. If there is no loss, then I do not think we need to be terribly concerned, but we are certain here that there was a substantial loss and we simply want to know what the department is doing to avoid this kind of collusive operation in the future. We recognize the difficulty of it, of course.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has a perfect right to ask this question. I would say to him that our records were exhaustively examined over a ten-year period before the incident and then for the short period after, and we simply found that in the three-year period during which this practice was alleged to be taking place, the cost of our resurfacing contracts was the lowest for the ten-year period. How do you substantiate that? I do not know. The lowest cost in the entire ten-year period was during the period when these collusive practices were alleged to have been practised.

Mr. Bryden: Does the hon. Minister mean they have brought the prices up now? Have they raised the prices?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We will shortly know because we are getting into the season of the year when we will be calling more contracts. But these are the facts of the case and we have undertaken, Mr. Chairman, and rightly so as the hon. member points out, a very thorough-going investigation in the light of this. I think it is highly significant that in the period reviewed by this report our resurfacing prices were at their lowest. How you rationalize this I am not prepared to say at the moment.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister is very disarming.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I am not trying to be disarming, I am trying to give the hon. members the facts, and if the hon. member thinks that is disarming, then so much the better.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister is very disarming because there is a contradiction in his contention.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: There is no contradiction at all.

Mr. MacDonald: His analysis concludes that nothing was lost from the public purse, and yet there would be no particular purpose in the collusion if it was not for monopoly profits. The report of the restrictive trade practices commission suggests that this is what happened with the municipalities and The Department of Highways.

I must say that the hon. Minister has not completely chased from my mind the doubt that there has not been as serious an investigation as he suggests. For example, if he asks the department in Ottawa, this department will have looked into all of the details of the prices, and it seems to me it could give him some of this information.

The other point that I wanted to raise—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The department has done.

Mr. MacDonald:—before the hon. Minister's blood pressure gets too high, now—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: My blood pressure is all right, you worry about your own blood pressure.

Mr. MacDonald: Mine is good, thank you.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister said they suspected there had been some collusion but that they had no proof. The interesting thing is—and I do not happen to have the newspaper clippings here, but if the hon. Minister forces me I can go and get them—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I know this.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister takes my word for that?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, I will take the hon. member's word for that.

Mr. MacDonald: I am glad I have built up some confidence in my files.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Indeed you have.

Mr. MacDonald: The point was this. Spokesmen from The Department of Highways professed to be surprised at the revelation of the collusive bidding by the paving companies. Mr. Chairman, if it had been suspected for some time, as the hon. Minister says, I have some difficulty in figuring out how spokesmen of the department would be surprised when the report came out with the conclusion that there had been collusive bidding.

There are these contradictions along the way which lead me to have doubt with regard to the completeness of the case which the hon. Minister presents.

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): Mr. Chairman, I did not want to let this opportunity go by without thanking, on behalf of the constituents of the great county of Welland, the wonderful work which the hon. Minister of Highways and his department are doing. They are working on the completion of Highway 406, which will connect the town of Port Colborne along with the city of St. Catharines, which the hon. member across the way represents, and are also working on a development road 686 from 3A Highway to Vineland. I want the hon. Minister to know that we greatly appreciate the work that is being done by The Department of Highways.

We also appreciate the proposed tunnels under the Welland canal. We all know that these tunnels have been promised for years and years, but it took this Minister of Highways to take the bull by the horns and see that this work is conducted. Surveys are being carried out in the town of Thorold, and in the city of Welland and the town of Port Colborne. When these tunnels are constructed, I would say to the hon. members of the House here, they will greatly relieve the traffic congestion that has been noted there for years.

I want to mention also, Mr. Chairman, and hon. gentlemen, that this work is not only carried out in the Welland riding but in the Niagara Falls riding as well. The hon. member for Niagara Falls knows they are putting the double lanes on No. 3 Highway, from Fort Erie westerly toward my riding. The contract has been let, and I am sure the hon. member for Niagara Falls appreciates what the hon. Minister and The Department of Highways are doing also.

Mr. Bukator: May I interject at this time, Mr. Chairman? Thank you very much.

Mr. Morningstar: I felt, Mr. Chairman, that I should bring these items to the attention of this House in view of the criticism that has been directed to the hon. Minister that some of these ridings are not getting too much work done for them. It has been years since work has been undertaken in Welland riding such as we see there today. It is an old riding and we are very happy again to say that the hon. Minister and The Department of Highways are taking an interest in the highway problems in Welland riding.

There is just one request I would like to make to the hon. Minister at this time, and that is about our Webber Road. I do hope that his department will give consideration to the construction of this road as a development road, which will connect the new development road to Highway 406 at Welland.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to make one more observation with respect to this matter and I will attempt to clear it up. I simply say to the hon. member for York South that while the department always suspected the possibility—nothing specific, but always the possibility—of this type of collusion, and while this suspicion, sensibly based and founded I think, resulted in a very exhaustive type of audit, the general interim check that we were able to make all across the board stops rather cold because we do not have the ability to examine certain private contractors' files.

This is the very great difference between the facilities available to The Department of Highways and to the restrictive trade practices commission under The Combines Investigation Act. The commission can do this. Still I am bound to say—and written admissions by the restrictive trade practices people can be found—that it is difficult, if not impossible, to establish in this broad sort of mixed-up area that the public purse is really hurt.

The collusive nature of these practices we deplore. We think that anybody has a right to bid on the work of the department, but there is an area that is so difficult to establish that I simply can say no more, Mr. Chairman, except to ask you to accept that from me, because I can assure you that this has been exhaustively gone into, and I think the evidence is clear for all to see in the penalty that we did impose within the framework of what we can do. What we can do we did do, but the rest of it, I must say to the House, is up to the federal authorities who have the statutory basis of doing what we cannot do, as far as they can go; let us put it that way.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I am relieved to hear the hon. Minister say that he deplors the collusive nature of some of these practices revealed during the summer, because during the early part of his remarks I got the impression that he felt that there may be something good come out of such collusion, and in fact it might even accrue to the benefit of the province. I am sure that our hon. friends, when they examine the record, will find that the hon. Minister did say that.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That is a misapprehension.

Mr. Nixon: I was also interested in hearing the hon. Minister's remarks about the profit that accrues to the province from the operation of the service centres. I would like to ask him once again if he would give some justification for the fact that in the length of controlled access highway between Toronto and Hamilton there are only two service centres available directly from the Queen Elizabeth way. It appears to me that these are very profitable ventures indeed, it appears to me that the government's action in making this a completely controlled access highway has benefited these companies tremendously. I would like the hon. Minister to justify the policy of the government in not requiring some payment for the addition to the business of the Supertest station, I believe, and the Esso station, just on the western outskirts of the city.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: You make reference, of course, to the Esso station on the south side of the Queen Elizabeth way just west of Brown's Line and the Supertest on the north. Well, of course, we acquired the Esso station some years ago and we are in the process of acquiring ownership of the Supertest station. These facilities will shortly have to go to accommodate the new interchange and all associated with it at the junction of the Queen Elizabeth way and Highway 27.

Mr. Nixon: Last year, when we were discussing this very item, there was no thought of this new complex that is going to be developed at the intersection of the Queen Elizabeth and Highway 27.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Oh, the thought was there!

Mr. Nixon: You did not mention it in answer to this question. It appears to me that these two companies have profited greatly from the fact that all of their opposition, from one end of that road to the other, have been put out of business by the government simply fencing them off from access to the public on the Queen Elizabeth way. It is a strange thing indeed, that the government's policy having to do with service centres and the profits accruing from them to the province, has not been applied to these two particular companies, Esso and Super-test.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, on 802, repaving of present roads, under the hon. Minister's department's report, capital construction programme: Winona Road westerly from the east limits, grading, drainage, granular base and paving. I would ask the hon. Minister, does this include some extension of the road allowance in this particular area?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: You have made reference to both the estimates and the programme here. May I ask again if the item on the programme to which you referred is the Queen Elizabeth way at—

Mr. Gisborn: No, Highway No. 8.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Number 8, is it?

Mr. Gisborn: From Winona Road westerly to the Hamilton east limit. As the hon. Minister knows there is some development taking place and I thought it was a widening programme, a widening of the road and an extension of the road allowances; but as I see in the programme, it calls only for grading, drainage, granular base and paving. Is there going to be a widening of No. 8 in that particular area, which will then in turn justify an extension of widening of the road allowance?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: There are certainly some areas on No. 8 where we need additional right of way. It is eventually going to be four lanes in certain sections. It is to be four lanes, yes.

Mr. Gisborn: Then my next question to the hon. Minister would be: Have there been any tenders let for the work at this point?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, I do not think that contract has been called yet. It will be called and awarded some time during the construction season that we are now in. I do not know what the date of letting is. I could find that out for the hon. member when we propose to call tenders and let the contract.

Mr. Gisborn: Fine!

Then this leads me to my next question. I understand there have been expropriation procedures in that particular area in regard to this programme?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: It is possible!

Mr. Gisborn: I would like to refer to one particular expropriation, that is the Norton expropriation. I was called to discuss this with Mr. Norton, and of course he has gone through the usual procedure of negotiations and subsequently application for arbitration in regard to the compensation. The thing that made him so irate about the procedure was that even though he had gone through the procedure, applied for compensation, the department had expropriated from him much more land and property than he thought was reasonable, inasmuch as they went beyond the road allowance, back into another building that he had on his property. Properties both east and westerly from his property had not yet even been approached, and also, while his application for arbitration was in effect, the sheriff, with an order to seize, has approached him and demanded the keys and the property that was involved.

I wonder if the hon. Minister would explain these complications and this nuisance to this person on No. 8 highway?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the hon. member that if he wishes me to place on the record a history of the negotiations with Mr. Norton from the time we first attempted to purchase his property, I will do so. They are extensive and exhaustive.

I think I may fairly say to the hon. member that he was provided with an opportunity to come and talk to the deputy Minister of Highways last December and discuss this matter, and he never appeared to do it. He did not show up. I think if he had done that, had taken the opportunity that was offered to come and discuss it in detail with the deputy Minister of Highways, he would have concluded, as we have long since, that Mr. Norton, who has gone through, I think, four solicitors now, has had every reasonable and fair opportunity to sell his property to The Department of Highways to the point where the only recourse left is to arbitrate, to go before the municipal board, as he did.

Now I say frankly, unless you want me to place on the record this whole unfortunate case here, I would like to rest my case on that.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I do not want the hon. Minister to place on record in the House the whole review—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I would rather not.

Mr. Gisborn: —of negotiations with Mr. Norton. I will say that I did have the opportunity to meet with the deputy Minister and some other people. I called them and told them I could not make it. I let it lay at that point.

I thought that there might have been enough interest in the complications that I might have been advised in a brief letter as to what transpired. But I asked a simple question: Why does the department want more property than was necessary for road allowance, why did they take a warehouse that was not anywhere near the road allowance and for what reason would the sheriff be down there demanding seizure before negotiations were completed through arbitration procedures? That is all the hon. Minister has to answer.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, the hon. member will get an answer, because in the first instance in terms of the early negotiations I think it can be substantiated that we were prepared to buy only a portion of the property, but at that time he said he wanted to sell all the property or none. This was the basis upon which we approached the entire transaction.

This thing has been going on for quite some time. It reached the point where we needed the property, we offered to buy the whole thing, we offered to buy it at a fair price. We go to the municipal board and an award is made. Nobody likes these expropriations particularly. They turn out to be not too satisfactory. I think the suggestion of the deputy Minister is a very interesting one, Mr. Chairman.

We will supply the hon. member with a completely documented file on this and if he does not agree that we bent over backwards to satisfy Mr. Norton, then I shall expect to hear from him further.

Mr. Gisborn: Well, thank you, Mr. Minister! If you infer that Mr. Norton insisted that you take the whole works in the first place and this is part of the argument, I will be satisfied to wait for your reply.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Fine, this is correct, we will do it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, just as a matter of curiosity, may I ask the hon. Minister if this is the appropriate vote on which one should raise questions with regard to various sections of his department which grant permits?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Presumably they might come under salaries in main office—just to illustrate the point that we have in coping with estimates. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to raise with the hon. Minister something that I find a little disturbing in the operations of this department. I am not going to suggest that the fault lies wholly on the side of the department. I can agree on some occasions that there are individuals who develop something of a persecution complex with regard to the department and the situation builds up. But I have had a couple of cases, that I wanted to draw to the hon. Minister's attention, of people who were insistent enough with me; and when I examined their problem I just could not come to any other conclusion but that there was a fair amount of justice on their side of the case. If I went back four or five years to the beginning, perhaps their rather critical, nuisance approach to the department was fully understandable.

For example, there is one case in which the appropriate officer in the department—I have forgotten his name now—got into quite an altercation with a man up Yonge Street, Highway No. 11, with regard to a business sign. It went to court and there was actually a judgment in which the court upheld the Department of Highways. I have looked into this situation and the fact of the matter is that the man was replacing a sign because his old sign was not very attractive; it was in the same place it had been for quite some years, but because he was replacing the sign and putting up a new one, the department insisted that he must have a permit. He did not get the permit and was taken to court; and he was convicted because, undoubtedly, it was not according to the regulations. But the point, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to draw to the hon. Minister's attention is this: I have been up that highway and, time after time after time, there are signs in violation of the regulations.

Now it is pretty difficult to persuade a man that he is not being victimized, or singled out, by the department, when there are many instances of violation of the regulations on the distance you must be back from the centre of the highway, and when he is singled out and he is taken into court. What is the hon. Minister's comment about this singling out process, when there are other cases of violation of the law that can be drawn to his attention?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, Mr. Chairman, it is not really singling out. We are doing our best to police our signing regulations. They are quite restrictive, I think we are willing to admit that, but I think they are good. I think, by and large, the signing regulations of the department bring credit to the department generally. Just how to reply to the hon. member is very difficult. I say probably, in this instance, the very fact that he had to apply for a new permit indicated the violation that was taking place, and at that point you have to do something about it.

As rapidly as we can we are endeavouring to correct these situations. I can tell you that we are imposing these regulations as effectively as we can. It is difficult. I will not quarrel with the hon. member's observation but I doubt if there are that many left on any section of road in direct violation of our regulations. There may be some. And there probably always will be.

This is not a very good answer, Mr. Chairman, and I am prepared to say so, but maybe I could put it this way: You can commit a lot of crimes and, until you get caught, Mr. Chairman, you are not in too much trouble; but we try to catch as many as we can and deal with them appropriately in the overall interests of our signing programme.

Mr. MacDonald: I appreciate the hon. Minister's frankness all right, because it is not a case of being caught. The hon. Minister, or anybody else with a rule, can go up Yonge Street and tomorrow you can find everybody who is violating the law. I suggest the hon. Minister has not a difficult question to answer, he has an impossible question to answer if he thinks he can, in the face of an even application of the law, take this man to court and have him fined and leave others to continue to violate the law. And the hon. Minister concedes this. I think he has to do something about it. You either do not prosecute one or you prosecute all who are obviously violating the law.

Now the second case—and the deputy Minister will recall this with considerable anguish, because I think he had a great deal of correspondence, and once again I was rather intrigued by this—happens to be a man by the name of J. E. Bushey in Parry Sound.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Oh, I have a great file on that one.

Mr. MacDonald: I know you have a great file and, as a matter of fact, I have a duplicate of most of your file—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Sure you have.

Mr. MacDonald: —and I perhaps have some more because I have some things he said about you and your deputy that he did not say to your face.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: They were not very complimentary, were they?

Mr. MacDonald: No, they were not complimentary.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, this undoubtedly built up over the years. The department became persuaded that this man was a nuisance and this man became persuaded once again that he was being singled out, that he was not getting fair administration of application for permits, for example. So one occasion when I was up there—since I had so many letters, I wanted to meet my correspondent—I dropped in to see him. And let me just draw two things to the hon. Minister's attention. Mr. Bushey drew to my attention, for example, that he had complained, as part of this running battle he had had with the department, about a culvert that had been put in on the old Highway 69, just beyond where you now have your cutoff for the bypass. He had complained that this culvert had been put in so that there was flooding. The department said, "No" and they were pretty adamant; they were pretty brusque—at least so he reports.

Indeed he gave me a copy of a letter which he had had from T. A. Ross from Huntsville on behalf of H. C. Dernier, the district engineer—this is going back some four years now—in which Mr. Ross stated that, in the complaints with regard to this flooding in the culvert in front of the bowling alley, they had looked into the situation. In fact, Mr. Ross said, "I looked over the situation and asked Mr. Jack R. McGowan, our patrol supervisor in that area to check on the drainage during a heavy rain. Mr. McGowan did this last week and the drainage appears to be adequate."

The fact of the matter is that two years later it became obvious, even to the department, that it was not adequate and so they changed it. In other words, there is at least some basis for the man feeling that he was not getting, in the first instance, an objective assessment of the situation.

Now let me come to the main cause of Mr. Bushey's difficulties. He made application for a building permit for a gasoline station just south of the old Highway 69, and the bypass 69. There is a bit of a curve on the road along the south there, but in his application originally, to the hon. Minister's predecessor, the situation had been investigated and he actually had a letter from the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass). Let me quote a portion of this letter to the hon. Minister. The letter is dated October 3, 1961. You see how long this has been going on.

Dear Mr. Bushey: re building permit application lot 25, concession 1, township of McDougall, Highway 69.

I received your note of September 27. I have discussed this matter in detail with those persons responsible for permits and I have considered the arrangement which was suggested to you by Mr. Crowhurst. I understand that it was agreed between you and Mr. Crowhurst that you would have an entrance on the township road through which traffic would get to the service station location. This entrance is to be at least 50 feet back from the King's highway and there would, of course, be no direct access to the King's highway from the property. I approve of this arrangement and I have advised Mr. Crowhurst that the permit may be issued on this basis.

Now, this the Minister of Highways writing and if the hon. Minister can get a picture of it, here is your old Highway 61 and your bypass and it is about 50 or 60 feet south.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Sixty-nine.

Mr. MacDonald: Sixty-nine feet south?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Highway 69.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, Highway 69. The county road onto which he was going to have access was at right angles to the road so he would have access to the county road and the county road would come onto Highway 69. On the basis of his original application, or at least of the earlier application, he gets a frank assurance from the hon. Minister that he will be given his building permit. Now, I am curious to know what happened since that led to, in effect, a revoking of a previous Minister's assurance that he would be granted the permit. Until you can give a fairly convincing answer on that, Mr. Bushey, despite the nuisance value he may have achieved in the minds of the department, has considerable justice on his side; and for that reason I have brought it up here.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I simply say that my file does not go back quite as far as the hon. member's. There must be some more of it somewhere. As a matter of fact, I am sure there is. I would simply ask him to let me pursue the matter he has raised.

Mr. MacDonald: I can send you a copy of the letter.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I do not doubt the hon. member that that is an authentic letter, but I would like to get it and pursue it. I think there is more to it than meets the eye. I am quite confident there is. Again, if you would be inclined to let us explain this to you in detail when I can examine it in further depth, I would be happy to do that; but I am not in a position to do it tonight.

Mr. MacDonald: Back to the revoking of that original granting of the licence.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: All right, what is the date of that letter?

Mr. MacDonald: That letter is October 3, 1961.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: All right. We will get that.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, last year on these estimates I had the door open for me to speak on this question when we got to item S of vote 802, the city of Niagara Falls—compensation for loss of taxes—and that happened way back in 1941 and they received a grant of $12,000 in lieu of taxes. I would like to get on the record, Mr. Chairman, the assessment on that bridge at the moment, the present-day assessment. That Niagara Falls bridge, the Rainbow Bridge, is assessed at $1,427,850. By the present-day assessment of some 50 mills, or I think it is a little more than 50 mills—but, in round figures, the city of Niagara Falls should be collecting from The Department of Highways, or this government, some $75,000 a year.

I think that that figure should be updated. I believe that they are taking the city again, although not quite as bad as Hydro does.

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): Nobody can be that bad.

Mr. Bukator: No, not quite as bad as Hydro does, but they are taking the city of Niagara Falls for some $75,000 a year in taxes, according to their assessment. And, adding insult to injury, some two years ago, the Whirlpool bridge—I should tell you the Peace bridge is a federally owned bridge, the Rainbow bridge comes under the Niagara Falls bridge commission, the Whirlpool bridge also comes under the Niagara Falls bridge commission, and so does the Lewiston bridge. A few years ago this was a privately owned bridge—that is the Whirlpool bridge I speak of now, Mr. Minister—and because it was privately owned, they were paying to the city of Niagara Falls some $35,000 a year in taxes. Then the bridge commission took over the bridge and it became a part of the system that belongs to the province, and the government on the American side. For a year or two, that portion of money was paid to the city of Niagara Falls by the Niagara parks commission, because there was no place in the record, or in the statutes, whereby they could pay grants of that type.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: By the bridge commission.

Mr. Bukator: The parks commission, I think you will find, paid the taxes on it for a year or two—it might have been the bridge commission but, regardless, one of those two bodies. I think you will find in the records that it was the parks commission. In the last year or two, I do not know what took place, but they decided that this grant should not continue to the city of Niagara Falls and it was cut off; an additional $35,000, which was going to these people when it was a privately owned bridge, has been taken from them. They are not paying that money now.

By the same token, I was looking through the record, because I recalled a private bill going through the House. I presented the bill, and the private bills committee was good enough to see the reasoning of it and passed it. This is now the Peace bridge, federally owned, again operated by two commissions, or by a commission—and I think you will get the name of that; to be exactly right, this is an agreement between the corporation of the town of Fort Erie and the Buffalo and Fort Erie public bridge authority. This came into effect on April 26, 1963; since that time, the Peace bridge has paid the town of Fort Erie. In 1963 they received $61,000 in grants in lieu of taxes; and, in 1964, they received $62,000. Continuing at an increase of $1,000 a year, by the year of 1969 they will be receiving $67,000 a year grants in lieu of taxes, on the bridge that belongs to the federal government.

I believe that the pendulum can swing a little too far, one way or the other. I think they have gone to the extreme as far as the Niagara Falls bridge commission is concerned. The hon. Minister was good enough last year, Mr. Chairman, to send me a note. I asked how much you collected in rent on the plaza of stores in the Rainbow bridge. By the same token, the Peace bridge has no stores to collect any money, except the revenue taken at the toll. I do not remember the figure exactly. I would not even hazard a guess. But I recall it was quite a substantial amount of money. The hon. Minister was good enough to say there was quite a maintenance problem with this bridge, therefore even though they are collecting a fair amount of money, they are paying you $12,000; and, in his opinion, as I recall the letter, he felt this was a fair amount.

I can hardly reconcile fairness with that scheme. It seems that, annually, since I have been here—this may make a good political speech for some member to make when he comes into our riding, if there is ever another election, and I am sure there will be—since the member for Niagara Falls has been with us, we have cut off the grants instead of adding a substantial amount of money to them. The Department of Municipal Affairs, for some reason or another, was paying a grant, when we had Mr. Warrender as the Minister at that time, of some $9,000 or $10,000, and they cut that off.

He is His Honour, Judge Warrender at the present day, and I hope he is a lot more fair in his judgment as a judge than he was as a member of this particular government, because I found that we did not agree on that particular issue.

So that grant was cut off, and we come to the point where the Whirlpool bridge, being a private bridge, was paying $35,000 to the city of Niagara Falls; and, at the moment, it pays nothing because it is owned by the Niagara Falls bridge commission. On the bridge, by agreement since 1941, you are paying $12,000; and I think that is between two bodies—one on the American side and one on the Canadian side. Laws are made to be amended; I see them amended here annually, and I think agreements can be, too.

The Peace bridge people have decided they have a problem there and they feel they should give that town a little assistance by way of grants in lieu of taxes, and they are going to increase it annually. As I say, this year they will be getting some $64,000. Comparing the two, there is something there that I cannot go along with. I must bring this argument up annually because in my opinion, somehow or another, your people are not using proper reasoning. Why should they cut off the grant on the north end bridge? I realize that you are not—or are you—a member of the Niagara Falls bridge commission by virtue of your office as a Minister?

I think I have made my point. I feel that the city of Niagara Falls has been deprived of this substantial grant, which was $35,000, for that one bridge—because the bridge commission took it over, and they cut it off.

One could go a step further and mention the fact that a bit of money goes to the city from The Department of the Attorney General but we will deal with that when that department comes before the House.

I wanted this on the record. I believe that you have had, or someone has had, a delegation to see them about that grant. I do not know with whom they met. It seems that from time to time the city council feels—and justly so because it can come directly to the department head without bothering the member, and I suppose maybe that is good business—that your department heads might be much more reasonable rather than having a member of the Opposition sitting there. And you might find, if you do give a point, that you are giving it to a member of the Opposition. This is not good politics, no matter how you look at it.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Right.

Mr. Bukator: The hon. Minister says, "right." Mr. Chairman, I do not know to whom I should appeal. I do not know whether it comes under the hon. Minister's department at all. If it is not the bridge commission which has cut that grant—it was the bridge commission that you sit on—then at least The Department of Highways can use the same method. Where you cut one you can increase the other. I think they are certainly entitled to much more than $12,000.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I cannot honestly inform the hon. member of the status of the bridge to the north. Is it the Lewiston bridge he had made reference to?

Mr. Bukator: The very next one, which is known as the Whirlpool bridge.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The Whirlpool bridge. Of course, this matter of $12,000 annually is a statutory matter, as we have explained in the House on a number of occasions. It is provided in The Rainbow Bridge Act, 1941, to which the hon. member made reference, and provides for an annual payment of $12,000 from the year 1941 to the year 1980. I am not completely sure of my ground here, but as a member of the Niagara Falls bridge commission I do know this: The Rainbow bridge particularly, and presumably any other bridges which come under the ownership of the commission, is subject to a series of bonds, and subject to the matter of reporting annually to the bondholders. It occurs to me, and I think I recall hearing this at a commission meeting, that in the indenture, or whatever the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) might call it—it is an indenture, a trust deed or something like that—I think there are certain provisos because of the international character of these facilities. They are owned by bondholders largely resident in the United States.

It may very well be that, when the funds were raised for the building, the erection and the completion of these bridges and the bonds were sold, the trust deed provided possibly that no more than this specific amount could be paid in taxes until the bonds were retired. I am not completely sure of my ground here but something seems to remind me, from a bridge commission meeting, that this may well be the case. I do not know.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): I see all the law officers of the Crown sitting over here; you might get a free opinion.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Of course, that is the idea; I say to the hon. member that we will pursue this and find out the exact facts for him. I cannot, in all honesty, tell him today but I will do this: I will make an explanation. Certainly, as far as the properties around the Rainbow bridge are concerned, we are involved now with the matter of probably attempting to dispose of these. We built all these store facilities around the Rainbow bridge, as the hon. member knows—the terminal and these other places we lease and rent now. We are in the process; I say—because we do not think it is the function of The Department of Highways to operate facilities of this kind—of trying to dispose of these. Whether the parks commission will take them on and operate them as might be appropriate, I do not know.

I can only say to the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, that I will pursue this and try to be precise about the information when I write to him or talk to him.

Vote 802 agreed to.

On vote 803:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, some years ago, before the present hon. Minister had the responsibility of this department, the government, working with the federal jurisdiction, undertook to build some roads on the Indian reservations of Ontario.

These areas are very badly in need of every economic assistance that can be offered them by every level of government, and very little has been done, from the time these roads were originally built, to increase the network of hard-surface roads for the Indian reservations. I understand, at the time, it was because of a number of honorary chiefs on the benches opposite and at Ottawa, that the department was able to work out some sort of a plan for the development of the roads on the Indian reservations. But, as I say, since that time very little, if anything, has been done. We are all, in this House as in every other responsible place, very much concerned about the economics of the Indian reservations, and this is one place where the government might very well take the lead—in expanding a system of hard-surface roads for the various reservations.

Specifically, in the Six Nations reservation south of Brantford, there are 7,000 citizens who pay gas tax, sales tax, and all the other taxes which pertain to the provincial responsibility, and the roads are very much in need—not of more of these hard-surface roads but particularly of a bridge, or at least a ferry, across the Grand River which splits this historic reserve into two parts. The hon. Minister may know that, during the winter months, the people in the area drive on the ice and cross the Grand River; and somebody is good enough to put a few loads of gravel down to the water's edge so that this can be accomplished with some convenience, if not too much safety. It seems to me that the time has come when the department should take the initiative and the leadership in this, in working with its federal counterpart, in providing a ferry or a bridge in this particular case, and to increase this network of hard-surface roads.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister if there are any plans afoot for this; and just what sort of machinery is it necessary to go through in the rather complex negotiations with the federal jurisdiction in order to carry this forward on a planned basis, rather than just building a single road and then no more?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: There are a number of areas open to Indian reserves. First, they are treated in terms of subsidies similar to any municipality. I think this can be fairly established. Road expenditures, I would say, in the Six Nations reserve, would be subsidized at the rate of 50 per cent for road construction and 80 per cent for bridges, just the same as in any rural township in the county of Brant. Above and beyond that, if certain warrants are met—and we do have sensible warrants—it is possible for a development or designation to be entered into with the reserve just the same as it would be with a township. There is a basis of appraisal and warrant which would have to be met on that score. If they are met, then they might become eligible for our direct assistance programme manifested in development roads.

Mr. Nixon: Might I interrupt just for a moment before the hon. Minister continues? The federal jurisdiction would enter then only in the preparation of these warrants and in meeting the remaining 20 per cent? Is that so?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, that is not altogether correct. We would regard the reserve the same as a township in terms of its revenue-generating ability. In other words, a township has a certain assessment base—

Mr. Nixon: Of course, this is where the reserves differ; they do not have this—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I was going to pursue this a little further and tell the hon. member that there are other avenues; there definitely are. For instance, while the basic rate of subsidy is 50 per cent for roads and bridges, if the federal authority decided to provide some assistance—and I can assure the hon. member they are not just always ready and willing to do this because we have tried them out—toward the cost of a specific section or mileage of road, then the Minister has the authority to offset that and subsidize the entire cost.

An example of that might simply be this: For a road that would cost $100,000, the normal subsidy would be $50,000. Now, let us say that the federal government, in its wisdom or generosity, decided to contribute $25,000. The Minister has the discretionary authority to not concern himself about that federal contribution and still make a 50 per cent contribution of the entire cost. So the hon. member can see what happens then: $50,000 from the provincial government; $25,000 from the federal government; leaving only $25,000 for the municipality to find.

These things are all possible, and we are quite ready and willing to sit down and examine them at any time. We have tried this philosophy out in a number of other areas in the province in an effort to help the Indian reserves, and we have not always found the federal government to be quite as responsive to our great generosity as we would have liked; but we have these flexible areas of providing assistance and I say to the hon. member that we are ready and willing to consider it.

Mr. Nixon: Just continuing this—I referred specifically to the bridge that has been suggested across the Grand River to join the two sections of the Six Nations reservation. We are particularly interested in that, and in the hon. Minister's views of the possibility of putting this bridge in the plans in the very near future, or at least something that would substitute as a river crossing.

In this connection, the hon. Minister and his advisors are aware that there is a long section of the Grand River there that is not adequately served with crossings. When Highway 403 is developed in the next year or two there will be a new bridge between Paris and Brampton. The bridge at Paris is in serious need of repair and vehicular traffic is reduced to 15 miles per hour so the bridge will not be broken down entirely.

I understand that the various municipalities along the Grand River all have plans for new bridge crossings; and, being a representative of the area, it would be my position, of course, to say that there is considerable merit in all of these proposals. But it seems to me that, before too much animosity is generated in the various claims among the townships and cities and towns concerned, some overall plan, perhaps, should be brought forward by the department or by the hon. Minister so that he could say what subsidies would be available for certain bridges—rather than giving the impression that municipality after municipality might go forward with the bridging plan.

I would like the hon. Minister to comment on this general area because, as I say, it is becoming a question of some concern in the Brant-Haldimand area, north of here.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, of course we would be happy to consider this. The agreement was for a specific road to which the hon. member made reference, I think—was it what is known as the Tuscarora Road? Is this correct?

Mr. Nixon: Yes. This was an agreement for that specific road only and that, of course, has been fulfilled, I believe.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Our examination into the needs or the requirements for the bridge to which the hon. member refers involved an investigation of the patronage of the ferry; and we did find, at that time, that the use of the ferry is so infrequent that the service was hardly warranted.

Mr. Nixon: Does the hon. Minister know how long the ferry has been out of operation?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Frankly, I do not.

Mr. Nixon: It is a good many years.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: All right; I am going back to when the thing was investigated.

I simply want to say to the hon. member that negotiations involving the crossing of a navigable stream, of course, do involve levels of the federal government, particularly The Department of Transport. I would suggest that, before a bridge can be put over a navigable stream, permission must be obtained from the federal Department of Transport; and certainly any plans and designs that might be developed for this purpose require their approval.

When all these conditions are met, and if that approval is obtained, then there are areas of financial assistance available from the federal department. I think the best thing I can suggest to the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, is that he make an appointment and come in and sit down with myself and the deputy Minister, and some of our senior people, and we would be happy to pursue this in detail and see what can be done about it.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this indeed, and I would like to remind the hon. Minister that, before the federal authorities can grant approval, some plan has to be put to them. I submit that the responsibility for this would lie with the hon. Minister and his advisers and I would be glad to discuss it with him again.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the hon. Minister concerning Highway No. 18, and I might preface my remarks by thanking him for the work he has announced for the completion of the highway this year. Possibly he cannot give me this information tonight but I would like to know the cost per ton of the granular base on the previous contract, 62191. Possibly this could be furnished me at a later date; this is under H15. Would that be satisfactory?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, it would indeed.

Mr. Paterson: Thank you.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have three different points I would like to raise with the hon. Minister on this estimate. Since the hon. member for Kent West has been so interested in the estimates tonight, I want to raise one point back in his own bailiwick. I do not want to go into the long controversy with regard to the lead-in from Highway 401 to Chatham—into all of it—but I am curious about one aspect of it which still disturbs some people in the community. That is, instead of building a central route, for which, apparently, Chatham had made some preparation, the department decided on an east and a west route at a cost of $200,000 and $169,000—this is the local cost after some 75 per cent has been met by the province. The objections which were being raised by people in the community, and particularly the 401 committee, were with regard to the hon. Minister's alleged refusal to sit down and discuss the situation. As a result he was charged with being dictatorial and I could hardly believe that it was this Minister they were talking about; but the fact of the matter is that they were assured by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and by the hon. Minister that he would be willing to sit down—and I have been assured even recently that he never sat down for the kind of discussion that they sought.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: This is not correct.

Mr. MacDonald: Would the hon. Minister explain exactly what he did do then that would still leave the impression that he had not sat down and discussed the matter with them?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the Minister or the hon. Prime Minister did or not do that left anybody with this impression, because I can assure you that the Minister and the senior officials of The Department of Highways sat down with these people on any number of occasions.

The simple facts of this situation are these: The road that is presently being built is being built as a development road; the department will pay 100 per cent of the cost of construction. It is being built by the county of Kent; it is not being built by the city of Chatham at all; and it is being built to provide an eastern access to the city of Chatham that will connect with an interchange facility that is there. There were objections to the routes chosen. The residents in the area of the township adjacent to the city objected to them; they were heard, and the city of Chatham council were heard, on a number of occasions. Joint meetings were held with representatives of the city and the county on a number of occasions. The hon. Prime Minister received the delegation, and I would say that they were granted a whole and complete hearing. Subsequently, in terms of all this, a decision was required to be made; and, in view of the county being entirely responsible for the road—it is in the township of Harwich, I believe—the decision was made to proceed over an alignment which was selected in conformity with the designation that pre-engineering has been completed on and I would say that construction will be under way, probably now, or very shortly, and the road, to all intents and purposes, will be completed by the end of this construction season. It may not be paved but, basically, it will be completed.

I simply want to assure the hon. member that every opportunity to present views was presented. We reached a complete stalemate on this thing, and when a stalemate is reached I think it is sensible to make a decision. As I pointed out to the hon. member, because this was going to be a county facility, and the county was the only agency or jurisdiction that could be the recipient of development road assistance, we could not have given it to the city on a development road designation and paid for it 100 per cent. The decision was made on this basis and it was made a long time ago; and, frankly, I am almost obliged to say to the hon. member that he is thrashing straw that is getting a little old—a little old.

Mr. McKeough: Mr. Chairman, because of the great interest, obviously, that the hon. member for York South has in the riding of Kent West, I would not want him to have any of the facts incorrect or not complete. So I think there is just one point which I might add to what the hon. Minister has said.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York South started off by saying that the city of Chatham had been put—I may not be using exactly his words—to some inconvenience because two routes had been chosen; and you named two dollar figures which were some help to me in determining where you got your information, incidentally. But the hon. member implied that this had not been a decision of the city of Chatham.

I think that it should be on the record, and the hon. Minister knows this well, that six years ago The Department of Highways came to Chatham and said, "In our opinion you might have two accesses into Chatham or you might have one, which would be a central one on county road 10." The city of Chatham, in their wisdom at that time, and it would be six or seven years ago, said, "We would like two accesses and we would like two interchanges," and that was their decision. That was in a year when I was not on the city council in Chatham—and I sat on the city council for four years after that, and at no time during that time did the city ever reverse that decision. Whether they should or should not have, I do not know, but they never reversed that decision.

The department went ahead in good faith on the decision of the 1956 council, I think, Mr. Minister—no, it would be later than that, six or seven years ago—on that basis. They built two interchanges. They accepted, on the basis of a very thorough traffic report prepared by DeLauw Cather, proposals to build two access roads into the city. Planning went ahead on this basis and then the city council of 1964, in its wisdom, decided that a decision had been made wrongly, some six years previously, and attempted to reverse it. In the meantime, as I say, the department had committed themselves and had built two interchanges and had committed themselves to two access roads and frankly, in my opinion, should not at that time, six years later, have suddenly decided that they should not then construct a third interchange for which they did not own enough property. This was the point at issue, to construct that interchange and therefore obligate themselves to a third access.

I may say, and I do not want to stand here merely, I assure the House, as a government supporter when I say this, because I was involved as a member of the council during some of the deliberations along these lines in this particular area and I wrestled with this for the first year that I was a member. I say to this House in complete sincerity, that if ever a council, either a county council or a city council, was given every consideration by a Minister of the Crown, the city of Chatham and the county of Kent were during 1964. They were given it by the Minister of the Crown, by his officials and finally by the hon. Prime Minister who said finally, in so many words, after reviewing the situation: Gentlemen, this is it.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the hon. members of the House, that had I been either the Minister in question or the Prime Minister, there would have been several times when I would have said, there is a place for that access road to go and it does not lead into Chatham. They never said that and we are going to have two access roads into Chatham. I am personally very grateful for the co-operation we have had from the hon. Minister and the hon. Prime Minister in these two access roads.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister contends that I am thrashing old straw, but perhaps sometimes the function of the Opposition is, at least, to elicit from the hon. Minister the reasons why decisions were made.

My specific question was: Why did he take an action which is interpreted still, in the minds of many people, public spirited citizens who have played their role in the Chatham area, as being dictatorial? His answer, quite frankly and quite bluntly, was: "There was a disagreement; we could not get anywhere; somebody had to make a decision, I made it." Now they call that dictatorial; the hon. Minister says a decision had to be made. I am not going to pursue it further, but I have another question in relation to it.

Are there any significant number of unsettled land acquisitions in these lead-ins to Chatham?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Do you mean in these eastern and western accesses to Chatham? I would have to get that information for you; not of which I am aware. I would not think there are too many.

Mr. MacDonald: It has been represented to me—and since my hon. friend from Kent West is so busy guessing, I will excite his interest once again—as late as this morning by long-distance telephone, that the amount being offered is seriously below the going rate. It is the old story of why are they being driven to all the expense of expropriation?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Actually, Mr. Chairman, I would not know; because, as I have pointed out this is a county road. It is a development road on which we are paying 100 per cent of the cost of capital construction, but the land acquisition is the responsibility of the county. Now I would not know, frankly, if the county is having some problem acquiring land there, or the people feel they are not being properly remunerated. It is something I simply would not know about, but none of what you say has come to my attention.

Whether it is another authority that is acquiring the land or not, there are occasions when these complaints cross my desk. I have to honestly say, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. member, that no complaint has reached my desk as yet. But we have nothing to do with the land acquisition, it is a county responsibility.

Mr. MacDonald: Let me move on to the second case that I wanted to raise because it is related. The hon. Minister, I assume from what he says, contends that his department is not in the first instance responsible for expropriation procedures that are initiated by a county or a township.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think that is right.

Mr. MacDonald: I can quite see this, although I think the general problem of expropriation is one we are wrestling with and I still contend that we should have taken a few more steps in terms of standardizing procedures in our amendments to The Expropriation Procedures Act so there would not be the open door that still appears to be there to victimize the individual.

I was interested, for example, on November 17, to read a newspaper story in the Globe and Mail, when the hon. Minister was speaking to the Ontario chapter of the American right-of-way association at the Park Plaza hotel. He said that:

The days when a property owner stood with a shotgun on his land and defied surveyors and construction crews has gone forever in light of more equitable treatment. There is still a lot of room for better public relations—and so on and so forth.

Just by way of showing the hon. Minister that we are not completely out of the woods on this, I have a case—and if the hon. Minister is particularly interested I will show it to him, including the name, although the person does not want to have his name used—on the outskirts of Blenheim, where the first indication that there was going to be expropriation, or that there was going to be a public need for a portion of his land, was when he suddenly discovered that stakes had been driven across the field and the houses and the barn.

No approach had been made—nothing. He woke up one morning, or he came home one night, and there were the stakes. This was the first indication. The first official notice received was a slip of paper pointing out what would be required, with constant reminders that they were going to take the land anyway, with the implication that if he did not take the offer quickly he would end up by getting less.

The offer made was $1,500 an acre. The engineer indicated strongly that though this was a corner area on the highway it was worth no more than the middle section of neighbouring farms back from the highway, which strikes me as a rather novel approach.

I had thought that sites along highways were often of more value, particularly the kind of sites that were being sought here.

There is land in neighbouring areas which had been sold for $4,000 per acre, by way of comparison. Then finally, not being satisfied with this, the engineer, came around “to scare my wife into signing a release so that he could show that we were almost accepting. This was almost despicable,” the man suggests, “after receiving a letter that it was in the hands of a lawyer.”

Now, I am constantly hearing this kind of story. I will concede to the hon. Minister that perhaps after long years of pain and anguish and experience, that The Department of Highways is handling this situation as well as any other department. I do not want to say that too kindly, because there are always new problems coming up. But I think the hon. Minister has had a great deal of experience, and the properties branch of the Ontario federation of agriculture has assisted in working difficulties out.

It brings me back to the point that I am a little puzzled as to why I have not been able to register with the government, or with the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), in securing some more amendments to The Expropriation Procedures Act—other than the experiment of injecting a board of conciliation that has been set up—amendments along the lines of the proposals that were made in the Ontario federation of agriculture recommendation last November.

I think you are going to find in the future that you will be wise in protecting not only the individual who becomes victimized, but placing expropriating agencies more on their guard not to abuse the power that they have been given in the fashion that they do until it begins to hit the public press.

As the Globe and Mail pointed out editorially, this usually means that you either have to have a lot of money or alternatively you have to have that rather rare individual who is willing to dig his heels in and organize his friends who are being victimized in the same way and conduct a campaign which is almost tantamount to war. I do not think this should have to be done, and I reiterate my plea to the hon. Minister and to this government that they review it, though I presume at this stage in the session it is not likely to happen this year. I warn you, I will be back next year, likely with more evidence that there is need for it. That is the tragedy of it.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister may have been the recipient of—as I know the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr.

Spooner) has—a document from a man from Timmins with regard to the route of the Sudbury-Timmins highway. As a matter of fact, he raises many points that really registered with me, so I put the question to the hon. Minister. For example, with regard to his basic contention that a projection of Highway 69, particularly if it had been taken a little east, could have avoided that incredible junction of Highway 69 and 17 and the railway tracks, right in the heart of Sudbury. It is difficult to conceive of a worse kind of junction than that.

Mr. Sopha: Why do you not leave that to me? That is my domain.

Mr. MacDonald: Ontario is my domain, my good sir.

Mr. Sopha: That is my railroad track.

Mr. MacDonald: Is it? Well, Ontario is my domain. We seem to have difficulties with touchiness here, as well as in some other quarters on occasion.

If Highway 69 had gone directly north, instead of over to Onaping, and so on, what justification does the department give for a highway that takes such diversions rather than a direct route?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Several million dollars, to start with.

Mr. MacDonald: In what?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: In cost.

Mr. MacDonald: You mean you save $7 million by—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Several million dollars.

Mr. MacDonald: How so?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Because we first of all found better terrain. We used Highway 544 as far as Levack, which has been recently improved, and took it from there north. I have explained this to the House before. I might say to the hon. member that three probable routes were selected. The hon. member for Sudbury and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Demers) are quite familiar with this. Three probable routes were selected. Then the rather exhaustive work of survey took place. First of all, photogrammetrical surveys were made from the air; ground surveys were made, liaison was established with The Department of Mines and The Department of Lands and Forests to see which route would best serve the development of, shall we say, the forest industry, the tourist industry, the mining industry and, of course, the all-important, I think, cost to the Treasury of the province was considered.

Mr. Sopha: There is no complaint about the route you chose.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, I think not. Naturally, in terms of the three routes that were considered, the two that were not chosen are not going to be happy about it; this is quite an acceptable thing. They are going to wish it had gone through their communities, and naturally so. So they are going to try, I suppose, to support the case for the route that went up there. I can only say to the House that this route was not chosen just off the top of the head. It was picked out and we are going to accomplish this at a saving, I think, in terms of the most costly, in the order of $3-$4 million. We are getting directly to Timmins; we are going to provide access to Gogama by the most effective economical means. We are concentrating our work from Timmins southerly to provide Gogama with an early access to an urban community and all the facilities that it offers. These are all considerations that went into the decision.

Mr. MacDonald: What is the proposed schedule for this highway?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The proposed schedule? I think, perhaps, if I disclose to the House the schedule for the year in which the estimates of the department are being considered, this is about as far as I need fairly go. And I will do this for the House section by section.

The first project may have been called and awarded, I am not sure. These are the projects: 7.9 miles south of Highway 101 southerly for a distance of 8.3 miles. This has been called and awarded; it was called in the winter of 1964. The tentative completion date is 1966. The estimated value of this section is $721,000. The next section, already awarded, 16 miles south of Highway 101—that picks up where the other one leaves off. It is for a distance of 16.2 miles. That contract is awarded, completion there—that is clearing—that should be completed this spring at a cost of $84,000. Now we go down to the south end and two miles north of Benny, that is just north of where the Cartier-Levack road that we finished leaves off. Two miles north of Benny we propose to undertake 6.4 miles of grading, drainage and granular base. We will award a contract, we hope, this fall, and finish it next year. The cost of that section is $675,000.

Now we move along to the 6.4 miles that I have just referred to; that is 8.4 miles north of Benny. We start then on another clearing contract of eight miles. You will see, as I progress here, that we are clearing and following up with grading, drainage, granular base. We move to a clearing contract which we will award in 1965, probably this fall, and complete by next spring. This involves a cost of $40,000.

Again from Highway 101 southerly, we are back with grading, drainage, granular base, for a section involving 7.9 miles. We will award a contract there in the summer of the current construction year, 1965, and will finish in the fall of 1966. This will cost an estimated $640,000.

To move again to the last probable contract in the upcoming or current construction year, from 24 miles south of Highway 101, you will see we have cleared and built another section. This one will go for nine miles, and this contract will connect with existing roads which will provide the link to Gogama. This contract for nine miles is to be awarded, if it has not already been done, in the spring of 1965. It will be completed in the spring of 1966 at a cost of $730,000.

I have mentioned that that last one I referred to will connect up with an existing road that will make the connection to Gogama. While that connection is being used in accompaniment with the programme that I have just indicated to the House, we will build a new road on a new alignment to Gogama. Meanwhile, the connection will have been made, enabling the citizens of Gogama to avail themselves of all the facilities that go with the great urban community of Timmins.

The entire road is programmed and it is in this book, but I think I will talk to the House only about what I am asking money for for this year. I think that is only fair, but I can assure the House that there will be just as much to talk about next year when we deal with the estimates, and that will continue until the road is finished.

Mr. MacDonald: I thank the hon. Minister for his comments and his detailing of them. May I ask him a question? Thinking a bit further north, is there any—

Mr. Sopha: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, the Timmins road—

Mr. MacDonald: Just one more brief question and then the hon. member can have the floor.

Is there any road being projected, or even considered, from Timmins north in the general area of Kapuskasing rather than the loop around by Cochrane?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: In general terms, yes. I cannot be more specific than that, but generally this is correct. It was considered by the mining and access roads committee and there have been certain alignments suggested. The matter is being studied by the department at the moment.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word about the Sudbury-Timmins road, which is a matter of special interest to me. I am delighted to see that my good friend, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, is here in the House, but I should like to approach the matter from a little different perspective. The hon. member for Nickel Belt and I know the area intimately, and the nature of the road that now exists and the building that is going on.

As I said by way of an interlocutory comment to the hon. Minister, there was no great quarrel made with the decision of the route. I use the word route rather than route—the route that was chosen via Benny, northerly to Gogama and then it is to connect with 101. If memory serves me correctly, I believe that the Onaping lake route had the advantage of some 40 miles of gravel base and, compared to the precambrian terrain, that would have had to have been thrust through if the route chosen had gone directly north from Capreol.

The road has a long history and its genesis goes back as far as the year of my birth, 1924, when my community was represented by the hon. Charles McRea—and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs will remember that agitation has been made by a great many people and a great many bodies over the years to get this road built.

It seemed to me that when I spoke on this the first year I was in the House—1960—that as long as the Laird of Lindsay was in charge of things that road was never going to be built. So it was with considerable gratification, when the new leadership of the Conservative Party took over two years ago, that I heard a firm announcement made that it would finally crystallize into a reality. Because here we had Sudbury, the greatest metropolis, the centre of the largest, most dynamic industry in northern Ontario, balanced entirely on an east-west axis—North Bay to Sault Ste. Marie and points west. Most of Sudbury's contacts were with southern Ontario. We had a fine highway—it took a long time in building, too—that led southerly from Sudbury through the district of Parry Sound and thence to the metropolitan areas of southern Ontario. But Sudbury never achieved its proper role in the economic life of northern Ontario because it had no contacts with the vast hinterland to the north of it; and that, really, was the stimulus for the important bodies and associations and people in Sudbury to promote the building of this road.

I can report to the hon. Minister that when this book came out—his capital construction programme—and it was announced that $2.9 million would be requested of the House this year for the Sudbury-Timmins road, the organs of the press, both the printed medium and the electronic medium in Sudbury, gave it suitable coverage; in fact, I might say an exaggerated coverage. $2.9 million seems like a lot of money. Unfortunately, I must say that I personally, as the member for Sudbury, treated the announcement with a good deal more reservation than the communications media, because it did seem to me that, from a budget of $329 million, $2.9 million for construction of this road was not a great deal. It was, if I may drop a hackneyed phrase, “a mere drop in the bucket.”

I calculated, from the information provided in this book and if my figures are correct—it appears to me that “work on grading, drainage and granular base” means that it will be, at its completion, a completed road over which vehicular traffic may drive although it is not paved—that 31.1 miles of road are to be built in carry-over work, and new contracts are to be awarded.

The hon. Minister has indicated—if I infer correctly from what he said—in the contract already awarded, a time interval of two years from the awarding of the contract to its completion; so, therefore, the 31.1 miles to be built under the capital construction programme takes us to the end of 1967. It was always hoped for by the citizens of Sudbury, and I am asked this on a good many occasions, “When will the road be completed?”

It seems to me, and the hon. Minister may correct me, that we are going to have, in our centennial year, 31.1 miles completed to the grading stage, not paved. There are 107 miles from Benny to Highway 101—and I might interpolate that I have always been a little resentful of Highway 101, and I have let the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs know it on many occasions that he managed to get Highway 101 built from Timmins to Foleyet and thence to Chapleau long before work started on this far more important artery. He can quarrel with me if he wishes but I say, categorically, that the road from Sudbury to Timmins is a far more important artery of communication—between a community like ours of 120,000 people and that of Timmins, which is something in the neighbourhood of 20,000 or 30,000—than Highway 101, which goes through country where there are more moose than people.

One of the things that always retarded the development of this road, it struck me, was that, during the tenure of the predecessor of the present hon. member for Nickel Belt, this government would not do a great deal for him; he could never manage to get anything out of this government. He got so tired of asking and urging the government that finally he gave up and retired to the Senate of Canada where he now sits in a happy Utopian state. But the new member for Nickel Belt is a chip off another block; he is quite different to his predecessor; this one works and does something for his constituents; and he is very friendly to the government, which his predecessor was not.

So it boils down to this: My query to the hon. Minister, which I invite him to answer, was a little more precise than his answers to the hon. member for York South; so I can go back and tell the people of Sudbury, or our friends in the gallery can report it to them through their media, when the road is going to be completed. When we reach 1967 there will be only 31.1 miles built; what is the projected year—is it 1970, is it 1975—can the hon. Minister be specific and give us an idea of when the day will come that we will all be standing up there—the young hon. member for Nickel Belt, who will have lost his youthful appearance perhaps a little bit, and the hon. Minister, who will arrive in his pearl-grey topper, and we will cut the ribbon and open that road?

Let me add this: When you speak of 107 miles, from Benny to Highway 101, we must not overlook the fact that the road from Levack to Benny—and I was trying to figure out in my own mind how far that is, but I think it is something in the order of 25 miles—is hardly fit for vehicular traffic. A more tortuous, circuitous route, you could not imagine; and before you could properly call a highway a Sudbury-Timmins highway, then you have got to rebuild. I am saying this to the hon. Minister through you, Mr. Chairman—I want to observe the form—I say to the hon. Minister, through you, that that part of the route from Levack to Benny will have to be rebuilt. So, Mr. Chairman, I implore the hon. Minister to make it good news: We are having our annual meeting of the Sudbury Liberal association this Saturday. It would be wonderful news for me to be able to take back and report. They have me on the agenda. I am going to make a report from Queen's Park. If I can stand and say, "I am pleased to report to you that the hon. Minister of Highways said in the House last Tuesday night, at 20 minutes to 11, that the road will be finished in 1967"—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That would be mis-managed news.

Mr. MacDonald: You killed your answer right there.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I wish I could give the hon. member the answer he is soliciting here tonight. I wish I could give you that answer, I really do. It would delight me if I could tell you and give you the answer you would like to take back to the meeting of the Liberal association; but I simply say, Mr. Chairman, I cannot do that. First of all, I would like to draw attention to your reference to the total budget of the department—some $330 million. And if you deplore $2.9 million as a pittance, then I am afraid I cannot go along with you.

Mr. Sopha: I did not use the word—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, you did not think it was—

Mr. Sopha: I said drop in the bucket.

Mr. MacDonald: A fair substitute.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, semantics, shall we say!

Now the singular part of it is, I would say to the hon. member, that our capital construction budget is something just slightly in excess of $150 million, out of which this road will be built. So you are not getting too much less than two per cent of our entire capital construction budget on this road, and I think that is a fair share. I think that is the sort of thing you might go back and tell the people of Sudbury.

Through you, Mr. Chairman, to tell the hon. member when I am going to complete this road is impossible. I cannot tell you that until I know how much funds the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) is going to place at the disposal of the department next year and in the ensuing years. I can only say to you—yes!

I am reminded here now that from Levack to Cartier is all built and I understand that it is a beautiful road that forms a section of the overall route, if you like it that way. Is that correct?

Now much as I would like to put the hon. member in a position to please the Liberals of Sudbury, I regret I cannot do it because I do not know just the extent to which funds are going to be made available to me next year and in ensuing years. But I can tell you we are going to get from Timmins to Sudbury as quickly as it is sensible, financially possible and expedient to do it.

Mr. Sopha: I will not be beaten down by that type of answer and I will just complete the record by saying this: It is not only the Liberals in Sudbury that are interested, though they are the most numerous group.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, they are all you referred to. You did not mention anybody else.

Mr. Sopha: When you have reported to the Liberals in Sudbury, you have reported to most of the people. I am not one of those people from northern Ontario that comes down here and puts on the old suit and complains about the great beneficence to the inhabitants and residents of southern Ontario. Many a quarrel I get into with people north of the French River, who point out the magnificence of the Gardiner expressway, costing $13 million a mile.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: More than that in some places.

Mr. Sopha: More than that; yes! Well, you gave me the figures and I think it approaches between $13 and $14 million a mile.

But the people I represent and the people represented by my hon. friend from Nickel Belt are conscious of arteries like that down on the lakeshore here. It is because of that fact and a feeling among them that they are left out, that I stand in the House and ask this question.

It rather surprises me—and the hon. Minister does not need to answer this—it rather surprises me that there is not sufficient planning in The Department of Highways for the years ahead that the hon. Minister of the Crown responsible for 330 million of dollars cannot get up in the House and give a projected date.

I ask a rhetorical question. What are you doing, are you living from one day to the next; from one year to the next? It would strike me that good, sound, economical planning would enable you to look ten years ahead and be able to tell the House, because you can assume that the Treasury board is going to continue to vote you a comparable share of the provincial Budget. It is perfect nonsense to stand in the House as a responsible Minister of the Crown and to say, I do not know how much money I am going to get.

We know that in 1975—I think it is 1975—we are going to have 4,000,000 cars in this province.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, we do!

Mr. Sopha: We are going to have twice the number of cars. So, Mr. Chairman, I say to the hon. Minister he is not entitled to stand in the House and say, well maybe in future years the Treasury board will not be as beneficent as they have been in the past.

Now, I am sorry, I did not intend to get into an argument with the hon. Minister about that and I do not want to give the impression that there is any rancour or bitterness in my voice when I raise this. I raise it out of responsibility to the people I represent, because they are keenly interested in the answer which I have endeavoured to seek right in the House.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: One more word on this and I am through with it, if the hon. member is.

I simply remind him of this, and out of his own mouth came the suggestion that for years and years you sought this road. Now at least the road is being built. We are building it as fast as we can reasonably equate the distribution of funds across this province. Now that, at least, should be admitted.

I am frank to say also that of course you represent the city of Sudbury; but I am frank to say that I think a lot of people in the Sudbury-Timmins area are happy that the road is being built. I really believe this, because I hear it on many sides.

I do not propose to disclose to the House today any more than the programme for which I am asking the House to vote me funds. I do not think it is right, I do not think it is proper. So, Mr. Chairman, if we can end the Sudbury-Timmins route on that note, I am very happy. I appreciate many of the hon. member's comments.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, I have a question to ask of the hon. Minister with regard to Highway No. 3, between Windsor and Leamington. I make reference to a letter of Mr. Kinnear of April 3, 1964, where he stated that this section was going to be studied during the summer of 1964, a detailed study would be made. This was again drawn to my attention by a press article in the "Ten Years Ago" column where the previous member was bringing this to the attention of the House, that possibly a new bypass route, or possibly a new Highway No. 3, could be built in Essex county.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: How many years ago?

Mr. Paterson: Ten years. I just wonder, are there any studies being made in this regard at the present time?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I would simply say to the hon. member that the entire area of Essex is one of the 19 areas that are now under study. We have discussed these area transportation studies in the House on a number of occasions and in somewhat complete detail, so I simply say to him that this is one of those areas. There may very well be some more pertinent information in this respect that we can discuss with the hon. member. I do not have it available with me here now. We will be happy to sit down any time and do this.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that is about the best comment I can make on Highway No. 3, at the moment. It is embraced in the highways in the area of Essex that constitutes one of our area transportation studies.

Vote 803 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Highways.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves that the committee of supply rise and report certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will proceed with the estimates of the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE SURROGATE COURTS ACT

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Surrogate Courts Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, there are two amending sections: One provides that surrogate court judges who presently operate within the confines of a county or district may be directed by the chief judge of the county and district court, as occasion requires, to serve in counties other than that to which their appointment presently obtains; the other amendment provides for the appointment of the staff of a surrogate court registrar to bring the procedure in line with present practice.

THE SECURITIES ACT

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Securities Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, there are also two amendments proposed by this Act. One will provide that the commission may now consist of a chairman and not more than four additional members, whereas the Act presently reads "a chairman and not more than two additional members." This will enable the commission to be brought up to the strength of not more than five personnel which, in the light of some of the recommendations and the work the commission will be called upon to do, is the necessary strengthening of the personnel of the commission.

The other amendment provides that the chairman shall devote his full time to the work of the commission, the way the Act was originally designed. It was changed when the late Mr. Lennox died, but last year the chairman was directed to carry out his duties and to devote his full time to them, so this brings the procedure into line with the present situation.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): The hon. Attorney General is certainly shaking things up this afternoon.

THE POLICE ACT

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves first reading of bill intituled An Act to amend The Police Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, there are some 15 sections in the proposed amending Act, mainly concerned with recommendations which were set forth in the police commission report recently tabled; some are from the report tabled last year, having to do largely with administration and matters of amalgamation of police forces, and providing also for the responsibility of municipalities in certain matters where torts are committed by the members of police forces—generally, administrative amendments.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, at the present time civil servants on the probationary staff contribute to the public service retirement fund. This fund was created as a compulsory savings to provide that when a civil servant was appointed to the regular staff his contributions would be transferred to the public service superannuation fund and he would not have to be concerned about arrears of contributions for the period, while ineligible to contribute to the superannuation fund. This bill will provide that any civil servant, whether probationary or regular staff, shall contribute to the superannuation fund and thereby remove any element or suggestion of discrimination.

The retirement fund, having outlived its useful purpose, will be transferred into the public service superannuation fund. It will benefit the probationary staff in that contributions will be deductible from salary for income tax purposes and will provide also that eligibility for benefits will be the same as for the regular staff.

Teachers on appointment to the probationary staff now may exercise an option to contribute to the teachers' fund, if eligible, or to the retirement fund. This bill will permit the option to continue in the teachers' fund or to contribute to the superannuation fund. The option is also extended to inspectors and supervisory staff in The Department of Education.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE ACT, 1961-1962

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Service Act, 1961-1962.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, the purposes of these amendments are first for certain clarification purposes; and second, for providing for the establishment of plans for group life insurance, medical-surgical insurance or long-term protection insurance; also prescribing the duties and procedures of the joint council, the Ontario provincial police negotiating committee and the civil service arbitration board and excluding matters on the agenda of the joint council.

THE RACING COMMISSION ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Racing Commission Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, at the present time the members currently hold office during pleasure of the Lieutenant Governor-in-council. The general trend in legislation setting up commissions is to set a fixed term for all commissioners and members of such commissions. The maximum term now shall be not more than three years; and for any person who has been appointed to the commission this provides for their reappointment.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer if this new provision will apply also to any member of the Legislature who may now have been or may in future be appointed to the commission?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in tabling the report of the medical evidence committee dealing with the production of medical evidence in court in civil cases.

With respect to that report, I would say that on February 7, 1963 the then Attorney General, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass) appointed a committee consisting of the Hon. J. C. McRuer and Mr. William B. Common, QC, who were then respectively chief justice of the high court for Ontario and deputy Attorney General of Ontario, with the object that such a committee should inquire into and determine the most efficient means of having the medical condition of the plaintiff put before the court in personal injury cases, the best method of having medical evidence brought before the court, ensuring a minimum of interference with all of the persons concerned, consistent with the best evidence procurable.

I am sure that the hon. members, and particularly those who are members of the legal profession, are familiar with the difficulties which are encountered in proving medical conditions in civil cases. And I am sure they are also familiar with the difficulties which may be incurred, not only for the doctors but also for the parties to the cases and the courts. It seemed most desirable; therefore, that we arrange with the law society of Upper Canada and the Ontario medical association to review the methods that are utilized in the United Kingdom, the United States, and other countries, for the orderly and effective presentation of medical evidence in civil cases before our courts.

Mr. McRuer and Mr. Common, by virtue of their great experience in these matters, were eminently qualified to consider the problem with representatives of both professions. The report which I have just tabled represents a very exhaustive analysis of both the problems and the solutions, as they have been found in other countries, together with some very constructive suggestions and recommendations insofar as the laws of Ontario are concerned.

The committee recommends that more medical reports and records should be made available to the doctors and the solicitors for all of the parties in order that they may all be fully advised before the trial, so that any possibility of settlement may be thoroughly canvassed in the interests, not only of the administration of justice, but also of the individuals who may be concerned. These exchanges of information must, of course, be devised so as to adequately protect the interests of the parties to the litigation, and the doctors and the hospitals who are also vitally interested in the matter.

Similarly, the committee recommends that medical reports should be exchanged by the solicitors for the parties prior to the trial, and that a medical report should be agreed upon for the use of the court if at all possible. In order that no party to an action may be taken by surprise, it is suggested that where a doctor is going to be called as a witness at the trial, his report should be given to the other side in advance of the trial; and that in those cases where the doctor's report has been provided to all the parties and where the parties have agreed, the report should be accepted in evidence before the court without the necessity of calling the doctor as a witness.

The committee devoted considerable time to the problem of the psychiatric examination of a plaintiff in an action and it came to the conclusion that, because of the nature of psychiatry it is inadvisable at this time to compel a plaintiff to undergo such an examination even though this might be in the interests of the defendant. At the present time physical examinations of plaintiffs may be directed by the court but the psychiatric examination is of such a different nature that it is not, in the opinion of these gentlemen, in the best interests of the administration of justice that it be made the subject of such an order.

Recommendations are made for the amendment of The Evidence Act of Ontario so that records that are made in the ordinary course of business may be admitted as evidence before our courts. It would appear that The Federal Business Records Act of the United States has provided a pattern which may well be an acceptable basis for any revision of our laws in this respect. In the same area it is recommended that hospital records should be made available to the medical advisers, and the solicitors for parties who are engaged in litigation where such records are relevant, unless the court might otherwise direct.

The committee has also recommended that a permanent committee, made up of representatives from the law society of Upper Canada and the Ontario medical association, should be established in order that it might resolve those problems arising from the necessity for evidence to be placed before the court in medical malpractice cases.

It will be recognized that there are many areas of difficulty in introducing recommendations such as these because of the necessity for finding that proper balance between the rights of the individual parties and the proper administration of justice. Similarly, the doctors, who have been most co-operative in the production of the report, must be consulted through their association so that nothing will be done that might infringe upon the relationship between the doctor and his patient. While these matters are important to the administration of justice, they are not such that they require the immediate attention of the Legislature; we will therefore ensure that the report gets a wide circulation throughout the medical profession and the legal profession so that comment may be received and any legislative action may be prepared for the future consideration of this House.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. Attorney General would permit a question on this? I have glanced very quickly through the report and I have listened with great attention to the hon. Attorney General's remarks. On the surface it seems like a most commendable report, but I just cannot understand why he says there is no urgency. I would have hoped that, having introduced it, he would have felt there was urgency and perhaps we could have looked forward to some legislation.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, I say there was no urgency, in my view, requiring the presentation of legislation at this session, which is well along at the moment. On the nature of the report—which, my hon. friend will admit, is very comprehensive and covers a wide field on something that poses quite a few somewhat new problems in many areas—our view is this: Since the medical profession is, of course, very clearly and definitely involved and very greatly interested—

Mr. Singer: They will be delighted with this.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I hope they will be. And yet there is some evidence that they do not like an invasion of the—

Mr. Singer: Well, the malpractice!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, not only that, but of the relationship which exists between a doctor and his patient in the revealing of matters which are presently clothed in the greatest secrecy—the same as a lawyer and his client. These things are privileged.

Mr. Singer: Will not most of them be delighted to have an excuse not to go into court?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I trust so. But there is also the area of the hospital records of the patient which, to this point, have been very closely guarded. Only in very special circumstances, and to a limited degree, may such records be taken by order, or as of right, and used in court. We have to deal with a very prominent, very eminent, very capable profession, in the medical profession; and I think it is only fair, the report only having just been received, that they be given an opportunity to study it and discuss it in their associations. If they are pleased, as I think they will be, it will not take us long to get legislation forward; but I did feel that we should not attempt to bring legislation in on the heels of this report without giving them an opportunity for full discussion.

Mr. Singer: The fact that it has been introduced indicates that there is urgency about it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I did not say that there was no urgency; I said there was not such urgency that I felt I could bring in legislation immediately.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House the following reports:

1. The report of the board of governors for the University of Toronto for the year ending June 30, 1964.

2. The report of the president of the University of Toronto for the year ending June, 1964.

3. The Ontario college of art annual report for the year ending May 31, 1964.

4. The annual report of the Lakehead college of arts, science and technology, for the year ending June 30, 1964; and

5. The annual report of the teachers' superannuation commission for the year ending October 31, 1964.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a very brief announcement to make for those people who are vitally concerned with the administration aspect of education. I think hon. members will realize that one of the great problems that is facing the school principals and administrators at the present time is in the field of timetabling, particularly in the composite high school programme in this province. Many of the principals, together with several members of staff, devote anywhere from two weeks to two months during the summer to preparing timetables for the ensuing year. Some 18 months ago I asked Dr. Jackson and his staff at the department of educational research at the Ontario college of education to try to find some way to utilize the potential of a computer in the problem of producing the complex and diverse timetables required by the modern secondary schools operating in Ontario.

This work was financed by grants from The Department of Education and carried on in conjunction with Dr. Gottlieb of the institute of computer science at the University of Toronto and KCS Limited.

Dr. Jackson informed me as recently as yesterday that they have now achieved a breakthrough in this area. The results will benefit the secondary-school principals and the timetable committees in Ontario and, we think, perhaps in many parts of the world.

One significant aspect of the work is that the techniques that have been developed are not tied to any particular brand of computer. The process will be made available to any group interested in timetabling, so that a local school board may use any firm it chooses to help solve its timetabling problems.

The computer method for the production of school timetables is designed to prepare a timetable to meet the normal requirements encountered in the majority of secondary schools in this province. These requirements specify the classes each teacher must meet, the number of meetings per week and, frequently, the room that must be used. They often involve additional conditions requiring two or more teacher-class meetings to take place at the same time, or specify that certain teacher-class meetings must be for two or three consecutive periods.

Using computers, the researchers believe that they can now automatically process the requirements of a school and print the timetables for classes, teachers and rooms in the form to which the schools are accustomed. Present plans call for experimental runs with actual school data to start in June of this year and to continue for perhaps three to four months, or even longer. During the later runs it is expected that some training of school representatives will be undertaken. If the results of these experimental trials are satisfactory, the production of some actual timetables for the academic year 1966-1967 will be undertaken early in 1966.

To the best of our knowledge, Mr. Speaker, the system we are using is an improvement upon any available anywhere, and certainly well in advance of programmes used south of the border and in the rest of Canada. I think Dr. Jackson and his colleagues are to be commended for their excellent work in this field.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General why it was necessary to have at least three provincial police and several Metropolitan Toronto police on hand when 20 or 30 attendants from the Oak Ridge hospital at Penetanguishene were demonstrating peacefully in front of the Parliament Buildings this morning.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, ordinarily there are four or five Ontario provincial police at a time at the Parliament Buildings. This morning, as it so happens, there were three on duty. One of the officers was notified by the parking attendant when the persons demonstrating came to the front of the building. The officer went to the front of the building to observe the size and nature of the demonstration. While he was there an officer who had been on escort duty—I believe escorting a messenger with some cash and valuables—returned from duty and simply joined his fellow officers to inquire as to the occasion. He was there for a moment or so and then went about his other duties, I understand that the officer in charge of the detachment in the building came out to inquire what was afoot and for a moment there were three Ontario provincial police officers there;

they were together in that situation for perhaps two or three minutes and then went about their separate ways. Ordinarily there are four officers—

Mr. Bryden: Why were the metropolitan police there too—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Although I did not make specific inquiries of the Metropolitan Toronto police officials myself, I am told that these officers attended at the scene and when it was learned that there was no interference with the flow of traffic, they departed. There was no special assignment to this situation at all.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to table the answers to questions number 51 and number 102.

The hon. Prime Minister tabled answers to questions as follows:

51. Mr. MacDonald—Inquiry of the Ministry—With regard to Table X, pages 64-67, in the 85th annual report of the superintendent of insurance, dealing with auto insurance in Ontario for the year 1963: 1. What was the total amount of gross premiums, less premiums returned through cancellation, written on auto insurance during the year? 2. (a) What was the total amount of reinsurance ceded; (b) how much of the reinsurance ceded was placed with insurance companies outside Ontario (c) how much of the reinsurance ceded with the companies outside Ontario was placed with parent, subsidiary or affiliated companies? 3. What were the net losses incurred in respect of the ceded reinsurance not reported in Table X? 4. (a) What amount of the gross premiums written was paid out in commissions, advertising, legal and litigation, administration expenses, taxes, and so on; (b) what amount was retained by the insurance companies for reserves, profits, and so on?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

1. $152,787,264.

Note. This is the total shown in Table X for all companies. Net premiums written for individual companies consist of: (1) Premiums written directly with insured. (2) Add: Reinsurance premiums received from other companies in Canada. (3) Deduct: Reinsurance premiums ceded to other companies in Canada. Premiums ceded by one company in Table X are added by another company as reinsurance premiums, so the total of (2) and (3) are equal. Companies not operating in Canada are not included in this table and reinsurance ceded to such companies is not deducted from premiums written. Consequently, the total for all companies in Table X show the premiums and losses before any reinsurance and the loss ratio is the ratio of all losses in Ontario to all premiums in Ontario. Reinsurance between companies will affect the loss ratio of individual companies, but not the loss ratio of the business as a whole in Ontario.

2. (a) Figures not available.
 (b) Figures not available.
 (c) Figures not available.

Note: (a) British and foreign insurance companies only report in their annual statements their business in Canada. Consequently they do not report or deduct from premiums written or losses incurred, premiums ceded to companies outside Canada or losses recovered from such companies. (b) and (c) Because of (a) the answers to (b) and (c) are not available. In any case, it would not be possible to segregate insurance companies outside Ontario because most companies operate in Ontario and other provinces.

3. Figures not available.

Note: For the same reason as in 2 (a) above.

4. Figures not available.

Note: Nearly all insurance companies do fire and general casualty insurance business as well as automobile insurance and also operate in other provinces as well as in Ontario. General administration and other expenses cannot be specifically allocated to individual lines of insurance and to individual provinces, but individual surveys are made on as accurate a basis as is possible. These surveys have established that, on an average, 37 per cent of the premium dollar is required for expenses which would include a profit margin of not more than 2.5 per cent.

102. Mr. Singer—Inquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise: (a) how many vacancies at present exist in the province of Ontario for those offices: (i) the appointment to which he is required to approve, (ii) the appointment to which he personally makes, (iii) the appointment to which is made by the Lieutenant Governor in council on the Attorney General's recommendation; (b) the names of each such office and the number of vacancies now existing in regard to each; (c) In each particular instance, how long has each vacancy existed?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a)	(i)	(ii)	(iii)
(b)	No. of Vacancies	(c) Vacancy Existed
Office
Supreme Court of Ontario	1	1 month,	5 days

Mr. Singer: Does the hon. Prime Minister have to make a special request—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, in view of the amount of work that was done by the civil service of this province in order to answer the questions put by the hon. member for Downsview, I do not think his last remark lies very well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Prime Minister is not prepared to carry on the work of this House, it is time he moved away and let somebody else do it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, it has been just over one year since I first assumed the responsibility and privilege of the portfolio the estimates of which I will shortly place before this House. I believe that the comments which I made in the course of the estimates for this department last year indicated my awareness of the complexities of the operation of the department, and may I say that they have been most challenging over the past year. In carrying out the responsibilities of government to which all the members of this House are dedicated, we have all had an opportunity of assessing the principles of democracy and some of us have had an opportunity to bring them into operation in a practical and, I suggest, effective way. Over the past year I have given searching consideration to the principles relating to the administration of justice in this province and the function of The Department of the Attorney General in carrying out its responsibilities to the courts, the public, and this House.

I believe that it would be of material assistance to the hon. members of the Legislature in considering my estimates if I prefaced that presentation with a review of the department and the responsibilities which it has discharged over the past 12 months period.

The hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) on February 9 of this year, presented to this House his views on the department and the administration of justice generally within this province. Mr. Chairman, I received his comments and constructive criticism with great interest, however, I am sure that he will understand if I must disagree with some of his views. At the risk of being somewhat controversial, Mr. Chairman, I feel that I must place before the hon. members some of my own views which are reflected in the operation of my department.

Under The British North America Act, with which we are all so familiar, the province is invested with the administration of justice including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts of both criminal and civil jurisdiction. It is hardly necessary for me to point out to this assembly the distinct separation that must always exist under our system of government. It is inherent in our constitutional system that the legislative and judicial responsibilities of our society be completely separate in order that the independence of our judiciary may be preserved. This separation of responsibility is perhaps one of the most important single features of our judicial system. I consider this concept to be most important and I feel that two distinct principles must follow from this basic premise if it is to be continued as one of the foundations of justice in this province.

The first principle I would suggest is that the administration of justice in Ontario must not be associated with any political considerations but that it must at all times be maintained above and beyond any implications of political association. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that no hon. member of this Legislature would wish to have our judicial system dealt with on a political basis and I would suggest further, Mr. Chairman, that this segment of our responsibility, above all others, should be maintained completely independent of any suggestion of politics.

The second principle, which I would suggest must flow from the separation of the legislative and judicial function, is that any review of the judicial discretion must be carried out by the appropriate judicial remedy, i.e. an appeal to a higher court or such other processes and remedies as may exist in the nature of an appeal and as recognized by our laws. It is not unusual for members of the public to suggest that I should intervene in some judicial proceeding that is presently before the courts or that I should intervene to act as a court of appeal from decisions of our judiciary. I hope that in such cases I have been able to assist these individuals in understanding that this is not the function of the Attorney General, nor is it the function of any agency of the government but rather a function of our higher courts.

In approaching my estimates, Mr. Chairman, I would therefore point out that I do not at any time consider that they should be assessed upon purely political considerations nor do I feel that my department should interfere with the judicial decisions of those judicial officials for whom I may, as Attorney General, in some measure, be responsible.

During the course of my introductory remarks last year, I indicated that the reorganization of the department would be demonstrated in the revised form of the estimates. In approaching the same subject matter this year I submit that the department has and will continue to recognize that the changing needs of our society require a co-ordinated approach by The Department of the Attorney General in its revised form. It was to meet this changing society that we last year embarked upon a reorganization of our department which would result in a division of responsibility that will help us to provide those services which I feel are essential to the administration of justice and the protection of the public.

Prior to this reorganization there were over 20 branches of the department, all of which were directly responsible to the deputy Attorney General. Many of these branches represented comparatively modern functions that had developed to meet the changing needs to which I have already referred. Branches such as probation services, the forensic laboratory, the supervising coroner and the emergency measures organization, had all been created as the government promoted the development and expansion of new concepts in these areas of our collective responsibility. However, as these responsibilities developed, so did the necessity for the revision of the manner by which they might best be administered.

In 1963, the then Attorney General, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass), undertook a study and review which was designed to bring forward a plan for the consolidation of the various branches into divisions which would truly represent the main areas of the departmental responsibility. By the end of 1963, the new organization was introduced and over the last year it has been established in a practical working form with seven major divisions reporting through senior civil servants to the deputy Minister. These seven major divisions are as follows: 1. criminal law division; 2. administration of justice division; 3. legislative counsel division; 4. civil law division; 5. public safety division; 6. Ontario securities commission; 7. administration and finance division.

Within these seven major divisions we have brought together those branches of The Attorney General's Department which have similar responsibilities so that their operations may be co-ordinated in the common purpose of better serving the courts, the government, and the public. Common administrative services such as personnel and accounting branches have been provided in order that uniform policies and controls may be provided in all areas together with such economies as may be provided where duplicate services have been eliminated. While there are obvious benefits which we will realize in the administrative field, the most significant purpose of the new structure is that we may more adequately provide for the continuing improvement of the services which represent our responsibility.

In addition to the seven major divisions which are responsible through the deputy Minister we have the superintendent of insurance and the Ontario police commission, each of which are responsible directly to the Attorney General. The Ontario provincial police force, under the commissioner, continues to be responsible to the Ontario police commission.

In view of some of the comment which had been made in this House with respect to the department and the various matters associated with it, I feel that a more detailed description of the divisions within the department will indicate a marked similarity to some suggestions that have previously been made and at the same time assist all of the hon. members to recognize the significance of the financial aspects of the estimates which will shortly follow my general comments.

The criminal law division now brings together, under the director of public prosecutions, all of the Crown attorneys of the province and the director of criminal appeals whose counsel act for the Crown in all criminal appeals both in our own court of appeal and in the Supreme Court of Canada. All of the hon. members are familiar with the work of the Crown attorney who is the law officer responsible for the maintenance of the peace and the enforcement of the laws in the counties and districts throughout the province. At the present time, we have 48 full-time Crown attorneys, with 29 full-time assistant Crown attorneys, while these officers are assisted from time to time by other members of the legal profession who may be appointed for particular purposes at particular times. In our estimates we will be seeking the approval of this Legislature for additional moneys to provide at least six new assistant Crown attorneys, two of whom will be located in our main office to provide experience and flexibility in meeting special demands at various points throughout our province as the need arises.

I believe it is significant, Mr. Chairman, that during the calendar year 1964, the counsel in this division of the department represented the Crown in over 500 criminal appeals before our own courts and the Supreme Court of Ontario. Certainly, this represents a very heavy responsibility that, in my opinion, has been ably discharged.

The civil law division, which is responsible for all of the civil litigation and advisory opinions, is now under the direction of the senior Crown counsel. Unlike the other divisions of the department it is difficult and perhaps unadvisable to make any special division of the services which are provided by the lawyers who carry out these responsibilities. This particular division operates very much as does a private law office, except that its clients consist solely of government departments, boards, and commissions. In other words, Mr. Chairman, we endeavour to provide through this division all of the legal advice and counsel that might ordinarily be available to a client from his own solicitor.

There are, of course, several departments which have specialized legal branches devoted to the operation of the individual department, but those matters relating to the government as distinct from the department, and those departments which do not have specialized legal services, all have access to the solicitors of The Department of the Attorney General for such legal advice as may be necessary. In that item of the estimates relating to this division it will be seen that we are requesting additional funds to provide for two new law officers to be added to the staff in this area so that we may meet the demands that are being placed upon this developing law practice.

In view of the interest that has been shown in the salary ranges for our law officers, may I briefly make reference to the present arrangements for the legal officer classifications? The junior solicitor entering the public service with my department may be started at a salary of from $5,500 up to $6,300, depending on his particular qualifications. This salary range is certainly competitive with any of the major law firms in this province and it is, in my opinion, more favourable than may be said to generally exist within the profession.

One of the most recent solicitors starting with the department has been called to the Bar with honours and has done post-graduate work in areas of the law which we consider to be most significant in the work he will be doing with the government. In his case, he will be recompensed at the top of the range to which I have just referred. Under the arrangements with the civil service commission, which has been most co-operative in providing these classifications, we may recognize the highly qualified solicitor as well as those solicitors who bring a wealth of experience that may be of assistance to the government.

The solicitors who enter the public service in the junior classification may progress through that classification from one to two years, after which they may be appointed to the legal officer 2 classification where their progression may be as fast or as slow as is consistent with their own ability and their acceptance of responsibility. The salary range subsequent to the junior period is from $7,500 to $15,000 per annum, depending on the responsibilities of the individual lawyers and the nature of the work which they are undertaking.

Mr. Chairman, these salaries are, in my opinion, attractive. We have had no difficulty in recent months in arranging for compensation that has been satisfactory to the lawyers who have entered upon careers with the department, but I would hasten to add that we must always strive to ensure that persons in this area of public service are compensated, so as to maintain the highest calibre of legal adviser for the service of this government.

The division of the legislative counsel is well-known to all of us and I need not elaborate upon the nature or the quality of the advice and assistance which is so readily available to this House. While these law officers are the servants of the assembly, they are associated with my department because of the intrinsically legal nature of their duties. The organization of this office has not been altered other than to ensure that the senior legislative counsel and his staff have all the facilities necessary for the fulfilment of their duties.

The functions relative to the administration of the courts are now placed under the authority of an assistant deputy Attorney General, who has supervision over the centralization of those services which provide the judiciary with all the supporting services. Included in this complex is the responsibility for The Land Titles Act, and the registry system of recording titles to property. All of these aspects of the administration of justice are co-ordinated so that they may function as a whole in fulfilling their responsibility. It will be seen, from the increase in this year's estimates for this division, that substantial salary revisions were introduced over the last year which will represent, perhaps, the largest portion of the increase in the estimates.

The upward revision of certain classifications are particularly relevant in certain areas. In addition to the provision for several roving magistrates who will assist throughout the province, we should note that salary revisions have been introduced for several major groups of judicial officers.

The magistrates of this province represent to the people of the province the administration of justice, for it is in these courts that we find the great bulk of all criminal prosecutions. Since so many people see these courts as the total view of justice, I deem it most important that the courts be conducted in a manner consistent with the traditions of justice that are basic to all of our rights. There has been much comment upon individual cases, and upon this particular area of the administration of justice, but I must say, sir, that some of this comment has failed to recognize many of the facts relating to both the individual cases and the general situation.

The trial of an accused person is dependent on the facts, and the guilt or innocence of such a person must be determined from these facts and their relationships to our laws. When comment is therefore made upon judicial proceedings it is exceedingly important that all of the facts be made known if a complete misrepresentation of justice is to be avoided. To comment upon and review a trial on the basis of inaccurate or non-existent facts is doing a great disrespect to our courts and must, by its nature, bring the administration of justice into disrepute. I realize that no responsible person would wittingly do anything prejudicial to the administration of justice but I must stress, sir, that great care is necessary to prevent the unwarranted destruction of the public confidence in a system of justice of which we are all entitled to be proud.

In some cases, it is right, proper, and even desirable, that the public be made aware of facts that might represent a miscarriage of our system, but I urge the constant review of such presentations to prevent those abuses to which I have made reference. I assure this House that any complaints, in respect of matters over which I have jurisdiction, have been and will be investigated; and that, where necessary, transcripts of evidence will be perused in order that any appropriate recommendations may be made to those persons charged with particular responsibilities.

I make mention of the new judicial office, which was introduced by this Legislature at its last session, and I would advise the hon. members that Chief Magistrate A. O. Klein, QC, is actively engaged in this new area of responsibility. Over the past year, conferences of the magistrates have been held at which many principles have been reviewed in the light of their common experience. Included in at least one of these conferences was a review of the principles of sentencing, and a review of the approach which may be taken in particular types of cases. It is our intention that such conferences will not only continue but will be increased on a regional basis to ensure the greatest possible interchange of mutual experience among our magistrates.

In dealing with the matter of sentencing, I would point out that the centre of criminology at the University of Toronto, which was established just over one year ago with the assistance of grants from this government, is now undertaking a sentencing project designed to provide our magisterial bench with a review of sentencing principles as demonstrated in practical cases through our courts. This project will take well over one year to complete and will require not only the co-operation of the magistrates and the law enforcement agencies, but also the dedicated work of several research associates who will be engaged by the centre in this continuing endeavour.

We will be looking forward to the results of the project and the assistance which the ultimate information will provide to the bench. Reference might also be made, of course, to the national conference on sentencing which was held last fall at the centre of criminology, and which was devoted to this very real and practical problem of our judiciary.

In reviewing this part of this particular division, I originally intended to refer to the increasing of the salary of these judicial officers, which has, I believe, recognized the responsibility which they carry out. The four additional magistrates who will be provided under these estimates will, together with the salary revisions, explain the great increase in salaries within this area.

As in the past, it is intended that the new magistrates will sit with their more experienced brothers on the bench in order that they may obtain a deeper insight into the problems before assuming their own responsibilities in their own areas. These men will also, of course, benefit from the continuing conferences which I have already described. The maximum salary of $15,000, which is now provided for the magistrates, is again an improvement over the previous salary, and while I would not suggest that it is the ultimate answer to our problems, I would certainly submit that it is a proper and suitable salary which will attract capable and dedicated men to this area of public service.

The municipalities have continued to provide the magistrates' courtroom facilities, as they are required in law to do, and I say, sir, that they do so with great consideration for the demands which we must place upon them. In providing these facilities the municipal councils have to consider the burden which will be placed upon the ratepayer within their municipalities. I am sure we would all agree that the province must also be cognizant of the demands which may be placed upon the same ratepayers by our requests for courtroom accommodation. In reaching the solution to this problem, we must realize the balance which has to be maintained between the ability of the taxpayer to meet his obligation and the necessity for providing adequate courtroom space. In this capital city, the situation of the city hall in Toronto has been discussed most thoroughly and the provision of further magistrates' courtrooms is under review by a joint committee of Metropolitan Toronto and provincial representatives. The report of this committee has not yet been received, but it will, no doubt, ultimately reflect the problems and, we hope, the solutions to the problems. I know that at that time we will be able to provide those facilities which are so necessary for the proper determination of the many cases now coming before these courts.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): What time is that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Soon.

I expect that many of the hon. members have noted the appointment of three judges to the county court bench in this province, and I am sure that they are familiar with the provisions of The Judicature Amendment Act which has been passed at this session of the House and which makes provision for an additional two judges on the high court of justice of our Supreme Court. Our requests for these extra judicial services have all been met by the government of Canada although, of course, there are some slight attendant delays arising from the legislative programme of Parliament.

Once again we are asking this House to recognize the importance of probation services by granting to us an increased provision for additional staff and increased salaries. This service, so essential to our courts and our society, was instituted just over ten years ago. It has now expanded so that we have 187 well-trained probation officers serving the province in 14 different areas which cover all counties and districts. The increase which we now seek will allow us to add eight new probation officers to our staff to meet the needs of our courts and, at the same time, reduce the caseload presently placed upon these officers. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson) has a professional understanding of this situation and would, no doubt, wish to see the caseloads still further reduced. But I am sure that he, as well as others, will realize that trained personnel in this field are difficult to locate, even if unlimited funds were available. I note, Mr. Chairman, that the staff development programme that has been introduced in this branch has assisted greatly in the training of our officers in the development of our whole probation programme.

The two-year in-service training scheme which we have introduced is designed to give to the new probation officer the best opportunity to develop his talents. While undergoing an orientation period in the field, he carries on prescribed studies under a prepared syllabus. With assistance from his supervisor, he comes to understand the problems of his profession while preparing himself with the theoretical background desirable in this work. After approximately one year in the field, he is eligible for a four-week intensive training course, held in Toronto, which deals with many phases of this work. Following this course, the officer returns to the field where his practical and theoretical training is brought together under the tutelage of his field supervisor. Within six months to a year after the course, he will have completed his development programme and he would at that time probably be considered as well prepared for his service with less supervision. I suggest that this in-training programme is most thorough in its application and well-developed in its conception; I feel that we are deriving great benefit from the work which is being performed through this branch of the administration of justice.

I have already announced to this House the appointment of Mr. Foster Rodger, QC as senior master of the Supreme Court, and the appointments of Mr. D. D. McCrae and Mr. W. E. McBride as masters of this court. These gentlemen are eminently qualified in their profession and will fill the vacancies which were created by retirements in the master's office in recent months.

The balance of the increase in the estimates for this division is represented mainly by salary revisions and adjustments in other branches, the details of which may be noted in the copies of the estimates before you.

The public safety division now co-ordinates those responsibilities of the department that represent various protection and investigation services, such as fire protection, emergency measures, coroners, laboratories and licensing agencies. Many of these duties were unknown to the early law office of the Crown, but they are now an expanding area of our responsibility, all designed to assist and direct in their respective specialized functions.

Under the direction of the Ontario fire marshal, the fire protection branch carries out an extensive programme of fire protection training and fire investigation throughout the province. After seven years of operation, the Ontario fire college at Gravenhurst last year provided courses to over 500 students, representing 116 municipal fire departments and five of our sister provinces. Courses were also given which were attended by students from departments of the federal government and from other countries, including India, Ghana and the United States. The field training programme carried out by travelling instructors from this branch provided instruction to over 5,000 firemen in their own localities, and at the convenience of the municipalities. This expanding programme of training assists the municipal fire departments of the province in establishing well-trained and efficient fire protection services. I mention this programme because it illustrates a policy which has been adopted by the department in all areas of its responsibility, to develop and encourage new techniques and provide educational facilities for persons engaged with us in the area of public protection and law enforcement.

The fire marshal and his staff have continued to provide technical advice through the engineering section of the branch and fire education programmes to many agencies throughout the province. Over 700 fire investigations were carried out during the year, which resulted in 166 prosecutions and 139 convictions. The positive ratio of convictions demonstrates the thorough nature of our investigations, which demand much of the investigators' time because of the serious nature of the occurrences.

While it is not necessary at this time to provide for any increase in the staff of the fire college, we are seeking additional funds to provide for an additional engineer and two additional fire safety inspectors who will be required to carry out the programme of fire inspection of plans and buildings now under way for schools, hospitals, and liquor licensed premises, and other buildings to which the public have access.

The Attorney General's laboratory continues to expand and develop to meet the needs of law enforcement throughout the province. The significance of this facility is illustrated by the fact that, on the average, since 1951 its work load has increased by 25 per cent over the previous year. In 1964 the biology section of the laboratory, which is primarily concerned with evidence in homicide cases, was faced with a 33 per cent increase in its cases, while the toxicology section had a 40 per cent increase in cases dealing with poisons. The documents section and the fire-arms section had even greater increases in their case loads. All of these increases are due to the increased use of the scientific approach to crime detection and the increasing efficiency of law enforcement agencies throughout the province. While we are proud of the facilities which have led in the development of forensic science and scientific detection of crime, we take greater satisfaction in the improved law enforcement that is reflected by the expanding work in the laboratory.

However, this expansion of the use made of these facilities would not be so important if it was not accompanied by a related expansion of new techniques and original research. It is here that we find many of the qualities that make ours one of the foremost criminal detection laboratories in the world. Scientists here are developing a neutron activation analysis technique for the analysis of hair and other materials that may be as significant as fingerprint analysis in identification problems. Research work has been done to develop methods of classification of soils; these have already been utilized in several cases. Our toxicology laboratory is so well recognized for its advanced work that an undergraduate course is taught here in co-operation with the department of pharmacology of the University of Toronto.

A recent addition to the work of the laboratory has been an extensive drug assay programme undertaken for The Department of Health. Here, the scientists develop specifications for drugs to be used in government hospitals throughout Ontario. Tenders for these drugs may now be called since we are in a position to assay all drugs supplied to ensure compliance with specifications. Quality may thus be maintained with the economics of competition obtained by the tenders system. This programme will no doubt be of greater value as government services develop in future years.

We are asking for additional assistance to allow us to hire 13 scientists and technicians to cope with the increased work of the laboratory. We have led in the development of scientific crime detection and we have made our facilities available to all the police forces of the province. In doing this we have created a demand which is heavy, but which is also fundamental to the protection of the public.

We intend to meet this demand with the additional funds we seek in this vote.

The registration and examination branch of this division reflects a further increase in our estimates with the introduction of the used car dealers section, which has now been established to administer The Used Car Dealers Act which was enacted by this Legislature last year. While the section was established last fall, this is the first year when provision must be made in the estimates for the new section.

I am sure the hon. members are already familiar with the work of this branch in the area of supervision over real estate brokers and salesmen, mortgage brokers, collection agencies and, more recently, bailiffs. When this Legislature saw fit to introduce the licensing of used car dealers and salesmen it seemed logical to extend this branch to administer the new area of responsibility.

The registrar of used car dealers, who is the head of the section, assumed his duties last fall and has since been recruiting suitable staff to carry out the expressed intention of the legislation.

Eighteen persons have thus far been employed to deal with the work of this section, which is now engrossed in the licensing of dealers and salesmen. It is estimated that there are approximately 5,000 used car dealers employing approximately 10,000 salesmen throughout the province, and the complete registration and licensing of this group is taking some time. As was anticipated, there were procedural difficulties to be overcome and I would not be so impractical as to pretend there will not be further problems to be resolved as this programme continues. However, I must say that our task has been made much easier by the wholehearted and unselfish co-operation we have received from the Ontario and Toronto automobile dealers associations. Their advice and the constructive suggestions we have received from them have been objective, practical and helpful.

This new section will ultimately require 21 persons to fulfil its duties next year and this is provided for in the vote for this division. Nine of these new public servants will be inspectors whose duty will be to see that dealers and salesmen comply with the new laws and who will investigate, and we hope in many cases resolve, justified complaints. While the investigation we carried out which led to the enactment of The Used Car Dealers Act did not reveal any cases where crimes had been committed, it did indicate areas of abuse which will be overcome by the legislation and the amendments thereto. I assure the House that these men will be dedicated to carrying out the intention of the House as set forth in the legislation.

The 405 coroners of the province last year investigated approximately 15,000 cases of accidental or violent deaths. As a result of these investigations, over 1,000 inquests were held, bringing forth over 800 recommendations made by the coroners' juries. Through the office of the supervising coroner, over 300 of these recommendations were implemented. This has been made possible through the central filing system maintained in Toronto by this office. This system was first introduced three years ago and it has since been of invaluable assistance to the police, the coroners and the hospitals. No substantial increase in funds is necessary for this office to continue its co-ordination of and assistance to the coroners of Ontario.

My reference to the emergency measures branch may evoke some comment from the hon. members at a later time, but I wish to affirm that through this branch the government may and does give leadership and direction to municipalities in their programmes to cope with natural emergencies. This conception of EMO is shown by the assistance given in the purchase of fire pumpers, where both the federal and provincial governments subsidize municipalities in the purchase of additional pumpers. The increase in this item of the estimates is primarily for this particular purchasing programme, which is a source of municipal assistance. The development of plans for emergency government headquarters at provincial and municipal levels is one responsibility of the branch which leads to related municipal projects where the bulk of this item is expended. These projects include radio equipment, fire equipment, emergency government headquarters and planning projects to provide government in time of national or natural emergency.

As part of the estimates for the department, I introduce for the first time a specific request for the Ontario law reform commission, which has been established under the provision of the legislation enacted by this Legislature at its last session. The commission is now operating most actively under the direction of the chairman, the Hon. J. C. McRuer. The members of the commission are the Hon. R. A. Bell, QC, of Ottawa, W. C. Poole, QC, of London, W. G. Gray, QC, and Dean H. A. Leal, QC, both of Toronto.

This commission is one of the important phases of our reorganization. It is to provide us with an independent and objective forum which may not only review and report upon matters of law reform referred to it by the Attorney General but, just as important, it may act on its own volition to study and report upon matters of law reform of whatever nature it deems important to the public. Although the commission has not yet been in operation for a full year it has undertaken many studies, some of which were instituted by the Attorney General and some by the commission.

Mr. Chairman, we have already received the report on the rule against perpetuities and legislation has been introduced as a direct result of that report, which will alter the law and introduce a modern principle more consistent with our society. The whole field of the law of domestic relations is being studied under a detailed project which will be guided by a research associate from the Osgoode Hall law school. This study in depth will not be completed this year, but will be of great significance in this area of our jurisprudence when it is completed. At my request, the commission has reviewed several proposed bills and has undertaken several more detailed studies. The Personal Property Security Act has been given a most careful and considered scrutiny, while the wages amendment Act has also been reviewed before presentation to this House. The Mechanics' Lien Act and the other remedies similar to it are presently under review by the commission on my request. There are other matters also presently before it, but I believe you will already have a grasp of the significant contribution which we may make to law reform in this province through the Ontario law reform commission.

I commend this vote to your attention as a demonstrable phase of our living law. I hope this vote will expand and flourish as this new area of the department develops.

The hon. members are already familiar with the report of the committee on securities legislation and the recommendations which it contained. We are now engaged in a review of these recommendations in order that some of these significant matters may be engrossed into legislation for the consideration of this House at its next session. The committee did confirm a necessity which the department and the commission had recognized, that further staff is required to meet the increasing responsibilities which are being placed upon this office. Not only have the existing duties led to an increased work load, but the introduction of new duties as recommended in the report will further tax the existing personnel.

I therefore bring forward a request for an increase in the amount of vote 209, which is attributable to the revised staff requirements of the Ontario securities commission and the branch which it operates. This increase will provide for a full-time chairman who will be able to devote all his attention to the policy aspects of this vital work. The department recognized last year that it would be desirable to relieve the chairman of the day-to-day administration of the office and many of the functions which fall upon the commission under The Securities Act. The reorganization of the department and the amendment of the legislation at the last session led to the creation of the office of the director of the securities branch so that this official has now assumed many of the duties previously placed upon the commission. The validity of this revision of responsibilities is confirmed by the report and should greatly assist in the implementation of the recommendations.

It is also proposed that the commission have a securities analyst, who will advise upon the economic aspects of securities administration, and that five additional auditors and financial analysts be employed to further assist in the examining and investigation of the matters relating to the work of the commission. A further solicitor will be added to the legal staff, while some clerical and secretarial assistants will also be required for these new positions.

The superintendent of insurance, who is responsible for the administration of The Insurance Act, The Loan and Trust Corporations Act and certain other Acts, continues to be directly responsible to the Attorney General under the revised organization of the department. In the examination of 199 Ontario and extraprovincial insurance companies, the licensing of over 19,000 insurance agents and adjusters and the examination of 39 loan and trust companies, the superintendent and his staff are acting to promote the protection of both the industry and the public. The increase in the estimates for this office reflects the necessity for additional accounting staff to act as examiners in carrying out the duties imposed by the various statutes.

The reorganization of the Ontario provincial police force, which was undertaken just over two years ago, is well on its way towards completion. This has accomplished more effective policing and the best use of existing personnel and I assure this House that the morale of the force has never been at a higher level. While there have been many significant changes in the administration of the force, there are perhaps a few to which I will make specific mention at this time.

The intelligence branch has been established and is working in close co-operation with municipal forces, the RCMP and the FBI. This and other special branches, such as the criminal investigation branch, carry on quietly and efficiently in connection with the investigation of major crime. Other branches of the force, such as the records and identification section and the car theft section, to mention two, are closely engaged in assisting municipal and other forces in areas where the rapid, but complete, dissemination of information is basic to efficient law enforcement. All of this is greatly facilitated by the development of the communications system which, with the Telex system, will put our police communications in the vanguard of this area of our responsibility.

Specialized training of the members of the force continues in many of our sections; this is co-ordinated with the courses of instruction provided at the Ontario police college to which I have already referred.

The increase in the estimates for the Ontario provincial police force reflects its increasing size and the improved salaries of the men and officers who make this organization one of which this House may be justly proud.

Before closing these comments on the organization of the department, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to a practice which we have adopted and which, in my opinion, is most germane to the administration of not only the department but the government.

With the unselfish and devoted service of many public-spirited citizens, we have been able to bring into our programmes the views and experience of many areas of our society by forming committees to consider and report upon matters which are ultimately presented to this House for consideration. I refer, of course, to committees such as those that have dealt with securities legislation, legal aid, and ambulance services. All of these committees have been constituted in part upon the services of altruistic men and women from outside the government service, representing many professions and industries as well as the law schools of our province. I feel that our programmes have benefited greatly from these independent opinions and that the public in turn will be well-served by these public-minded volunteers who served gratuitously for the general weal. To these people we all owe a debt which I am sure we all recognize. To those who have thus joined, at least temporarily, our faceless public service, I extend my most sincere appreciation.

In the same area, Mr. Chairman, may I stress the assistance which we have received from, and the full use that we have made of, the schools of law. This influence and assistance is most notable in the Ontario law reform commission, where I am now advised that arrangements are being made for the special research assignments to be carried out by the associates on these many fine faculties. Meetings have already been held with the deans of these schools to establish this arrangement.

This trend, Mr. Chairman, demonstrates that The Department of the Attorney General is taking every advantage of the best sources available to continue the development and improvement of our ability to properly serve and ensure the administration of justice in Ontario.

In closing these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I think it proper to note and acknowledge that many of the changes we have effected and things which I would call accomplishments have come about, in part, as a result of suggestions offered and constructive criticisms made by hon. members of this House, and not least by hon. members of the Opposition parties. This, Mr. Chairman, is as it should be. I have indicated that I do not regard the administration of justice and the enforcement of law as being political matters and I have accepted criticisms and suggestions in that attitude, which I shall strive to maintain as we discuss and examine the estimates of this department.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General is a most difficult man to become angry with. He is very polite, he is very pleasant, and he is very co-operative; above all, he says nice things about us over here, which happens very seldom—the sort of words we hear all too infrequently from so many of the hon. Ministers on the other side.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): We are very fond of him.

Mr. Singer: I am very fond of him, too. I think he is a very nice man and he has been most helpful to me in various inquiries; but I expect, Mr. Chairman, before I am through, that I am going to say some things with which perhaps the hon. Attorney General might not agree. Perhaps I might reflect on some of the methods which I believe are wrongly approached in the running of his department.

I am unhappy and I am very disappointed, having listened carefully to this speech, at its complete and utter lack of new ideas. It is a reasonable summary of what has been done. It indicates, to some extent, some new departures, some timid new departures which have been embarked upon; but it fails, sir, to chart any new course for the administration of law in this province.

I would have hoped, by this time, with this Attorney General, that we could have looked forward to a new direction for the administration of law in Ontario. I would have hoped that he could have dealt perhaps more specifically with some of the constructive criticisms I put forward, and which my hon. leader (Mr. Thompson) put forward earlier in this session, and would have suggested to us some of the reasons why either the ideas we advanced were good ones which he would be prepared to adopt in the course of time or why they were not ideas he found acceptable. But unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, as I say, this is not referred to, and is hardly touched upon, except in the broadest of general terms, in his review of the activities of his department.

I am just going to make a few comments on specific references the hon. Attorney General made in describing the criminal law division. He points out that counsel within the department represented the Crown in over 500 criminal appeals. I think he would have been interested, as well, in finding out how many outside counsel had been brought in, in this regard.

Then he comes to the civil law division and says, "We endeavour to provide through this division all of the legal advice and counsel that might ordinarily be available to a client from his own solicitor." As I tried to make clear in earlier remarks in the House, and as my hon. colleague from Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) has tried to make clear, we believe this is the sort of objective that the hon. Attorney General's department should have, that the civil law division should have. Unfortunately, we do not think that the hon. Attorney General has been all the law to all of the departments in the province of Ontario, and it is with some regret that I must point out that several important questions still remain unanswered on the order paper.

In dealing with this specific point, where the hon. Attorney General says, "We endeavour to provide through this division all of the legal advice and counsel that might ordinarily be available to a client from his own solicitor," I must point out, Mr. Chairman, that question number seven—which was posed in order to find out just how many outside lawyers had been retained, how much had been paid, which departments retained these outside lawyers, and which firms were retained for these purposes—this question remains unanswered.

I grant you, Mr. Chairman, that this is a long question to answer, and it requires the civil servants to do a lot of work to put the answer together, but I say, sir, that this question, together with the others which stand in the names of my colleagues and myself, were not put on the order paper lightly. We considered very carefully the sort of questions we should ask. These questions are put there in a genuine desire to seek information and to suggest alternative methods to government. So when we come to these estimates our hands are tied behind our back in our effort to properly criticize general statements that the hon. Attorney General makes.

As I say, he says we endeavour to provide through this division all of the legal advice that counsel might ordinarily make available to a client from his own solicitor. I say that this is a fine general principle and this is as it should be. But I suspect, in fact I say, this is not the way it is. I say this is not the way it is, and the extent that it is not the way it is can only be revealed in detail when the answer to that question number seven is placed on the order paper.

We had a similar question on the order paper in other years, Mr. Chairman, and that question, when answered, did reveal in very round figures, and we have not got the figures at the moment, that the government of Ontario spent well over half a million dollars in retaining outside lawyers to do its legal work—well over half a million dollars. How high the figure is this year, I have not any idea, because the answer is not before us.

It might be double that by now, but we have no way of telling. That is the sort of information that I would have expected would have been available so that we could intelligently present criticism at this time. I may point out, Mr. Chairman, that this question has been on the order paper the better part of three months and it still is not answered.

We did get a partial answer to it in The Department of Highways and that is the only one. The only reason we got that, Mr. Chairman, was that my hon. colleague from Sudbury and I sit on the public accounts committee and the highways department came before the public accounts committee and we were able to ask specifically of the highways department the information required in question number seven. What did The Department of Highways tell us? The Department of Highways told us they have a legal staff of six lawyers of their own.

The Department of Highways is a pretty big department. It spends a third of the provincial Budget. It has a legal department of six lawyers of its own. But in addition to all that, they saw fit to farm out some $50,000 of legal work and the report of those transactions runs through some nine pages. It is interesting to note that of the slightly less than $50,000 of legal work they farmed out, some $40,000 was split between three firms and the balance was left for the other lawyers in the province.

I think it would be of substantial interest and importance to the people of the province of Ontario to know what the total figures are for all of the government departments and all of the government boards and all of the government commissions; and why it is necessary at all. If the civil law division is doing the job the hon. Attorney General says it is supposed to do, that it is endeavouring to do, to provide through this division all of the legal advice and counsel that might be ordinarily available to a client from his own solicitor, why is it necessary to embark on this kind of an expenditure?

Then, sir, I think it might be most interesting to ascertain just which legal firms are getting this sort of business; because it has come to my attention that one firm has recently been receiving a substantial portion of this type of government business which it did not receive in the past. It has been suggested to me that perhaps it is not quite co-incidental that this firm has been receiving this business when it now has as one of its partners a former member of this government. Now I cannot give you any detail on this until the answer to the question is tabled, but I had hoped that answer would be here before us so that I could give chapter and verse on it.

In addition to that, sir, I would refer the hon. Attorney General to question number 37, which I would think would be a fairly simple question. I simply ask there who are the lawyers who are working for the government, what are their names, how old are they, what salaries are they getting and how much are they being paid?

The hon. Attorney General in broad phrases says we have got lots of young lawyers coming in. They are bright and they are happy with our salaries. Well, tell us who they are, how many you have, what salaries are being paid. The question has been there for close to three months, or more than three months. Surely that is a simple question and it does not involve upsetting the civil service the way the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) was perhaps suggesting earlier this afternoon. These are things that I think are of importance to the functioning of the Legislature. These are matters of which I think the public should be made aware, but we have not got the answer to that one.

There are a couple of other questions that are of importance in regard to police procedures, which is the second vote under these estimates. How many police officers are there? That is question 56. And the promotions, question 57. A substantial number of the police questions have been answered, but the story is not complete and in order to allow us to make a full and proper and responsible criticism, we are entitled to and we should have this information; but unfortunately it is not here this afternoon.

Now, insofar as the police are concerned, and let me digress just for a moment, Mr. Chairman if I may. I should compliment the hon. Attorney General for a reasonable piece of footwork this afternoon when he introduced at the proper time amendment to The Police Act, 1965. For a horrible moment I thought it might have some resemblance to its ill-fated predecessor. But on reading it, it is not nearly that bad.

Unfortunately, sir, I am going to suggest that the person who drafted the explanatory notes did not read some of the sections of the statute too carefully. If those gentlemen who write about what is in statutes that are not produced refer only to the explanatory note, it is highly possible that they might be misled if they do not refer very carefully to what the statute in fact says.

For instance, and this is of no great significance, section 2 of the explanatory note says the amendment requires a board of police commissioners in all local municipalities; the word in the statute is may. It is not a requirement. The word in the statute as I read it here, is may.

More serious is in subsection 6, which appears to be a provision for municipal liability for damages caused by a police officer in the course of his employment. Now just take that phrase out and it sounds as though the government has embarked upon a new policy. Perhaps they had in mind the unfortunate citizen in Sudbury who was severely beaten by a police officer.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I have a point of order I should draw to my hon. friend's attention. He referred to the explanatory note with respect to section 2 of the amended Police Act. If my hon. friend will look at the section, he will find it reads:

Notwithstanding any special Act, every local municipality that provides and maintains a police force and that has a population of more than 15,000 according to the last revised assessment roll, shall have a board.

Mr. Singer: And: "may by bylaw constitute a board."

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No; there are other types of municipalities which then may by bylaw do things, but the word "shall" appears here.

Mr. Singer: Shall applies to a part, but the word may is down at the end.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think perhaps the hon. member will agree that when you are passing legislation and using the word shall, which is mandatory, demanding that things be done, that is the important thing. Permissive legislation has not nearly the significance of shall. The explanatory note is quite right in drawing the attention of this House to the fact that there is a mandatory section there requiring the establishment of a police force, at least in my view.

Mr. Singer: Well, with great respect, the word may is in the last line of his—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I agree with that.

Mr. Singer: So it is mandatory in a sense, but it is permissive in another sense.

In any event, as I said, that section is of no great moment. But I am somewhat surprised, Mr. Chairman, with this broad general statement in connection with section 6, the last line. It sounds as though the department, or the government, has embarked on a new course, and there is going to be a system of compensating people who suffer damage for actions caused by police officers in the course of their employment, together with procedures for recovery. As I say, I hoped when I read that explanatory note that the government might have had in mind the unfortunate gentleman from Sarnia who was severely beaten by a police officer. I do not think anyone suggested that he acted in the course of his duty. In due course, this gentleman, who completely lost all of his mental faculties, apparently, as I read the new accounts, sued the police officer responsible, got a very substantial judgment from him and the police officer put on his hat and left the country. The family of the injured man have a piece of paper that says they are entitled to some money which they are unlikely ever to get.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am familiar with the case.

Mr. Singer: I am sure that the hon. Attorney General would be. I would have hoped when I read that explanatory note that this was the sort of direction in which the government was moving. But let us read what the statute says here. These are sections 22 and 23 and 24. The chief constable can be sued—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might make this observation? I have introduced a police bill today, The Police Amendment Act. I presume it will be fully debated in this House on the principle of the bill on second reading. It will be referred to committee, it will be back before the committee of the House. I would like to suggest to the hon. member that since I am in my estimates and there will be the fullest opportunity to debate new legislation, that perhaps we should not get into that area today.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General has not grasped my point yet.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I cannot restrain him, Mr. Chairman; whether or not you can I do not know.

Mr. Singer: My point is simply this. I complimented the hon. Attorney General on a clever bit of footwork in introducing, on the day his estimates were to come in, a bill to amend The Police Act; I am suggesting to him now that the explanatory notes do not correspond with what is in the Act. The explanatory notes indicate, as his opening remarks did not, that the government is embarking on a brand-new approach for compensating victims of police officers. I will not go into any great detail on it; we will go into it on second and third reading. But in sections 22 and 23 and finally subsection (4) of 23, they say the law is exactly the same as it was in the beginning. You get down to the council of a municipality which may, in such cases as it sees fit, pay any damage or cost that might be awarded. So that notwithstanding the fine-sounding explanatory notes, which I suspect were somewhat designed to indicate that the government was embarking on some brand-new programme of reform, when you look at this Act the government is not really suggesting reform in the amendments to The Police Act, nor is there anything in the hon. Attorney General's remarks that suggests any real reform, or the sort of reform that we had been looking for.

Now then, Mr. Chairman, I thought it would be worthwhile spending a few moments to refresh my mind, and perhaps some others who may be interested, in some of the ideas that we put forward earlier in the debates—remarks that were made by the hon. leader of the Opposition and the remarks that were made by some of my hon. colleagues and by myself insofar as major reforms were suggested in the administration of law.

The hon. Attorney General will recall that we suggested a major reorganization of the hon. Attorney General's department; that was spelled out in some considerable detail. Suggestions were made about the introduction of an administrative code and a method of dealing with the question of appeals from administrative bodies. I know the hon. Attorney General will tell me that Mr. Justice McRuer is conducting a commission and an inquiry into this sort of thing and we are going to have to sit and wait until Mr. Justice McRuer comes in with recommendations. But we seem to have a plethora of commissions, committees and investigating bodies which are always viewing with interest, inquiring into, discussing and wondering about any reforms that are suggested. It seems to me that such matters as the provision of an administrative code and method of dealing with appeals—a resolution to this effect is on the order paper—could well have been dealt with by this House in advance of the calling of these particular estimates, so that when we came to the hon. Attorney General's estimates we would have had, as the final discussion in this session of the Legislature, a summary and a clean-up of the whole discussion that we had had on all the fields of administration of law.

I am forced to conclude, Mr. Chairman, that these estimates are put in before we have seen any major legal legislation introduced and before we have seen any discussion on any of the important resolutions and private members' bills which stand on the order paper. The general discussion will be almost without a direction, because the hon. Attorney General provides no direction in his remarks and the House has not been allowed to fully discuss all of these other matters that have been previously raised—the creation of an office of ombudsman or parliamentary commissioner, for instance. A bill standing in my name has been on the order paper for some months now and there has been no interest on the part of government to call that bill for debate. The legal aid report, a very good report, has, in fact, been tabled, but we have not heard that any implementation of this report or portions of it are going to be undertaken by government in this session of the Legislature. We have not even heard the government's views. Does the hon. Attorney General think, for instance, that the government is concerned with the whole question of legal aid? Do they agree with what Mr. Common and his colleagues have suggested? I think this is most important, because in this field of legal aid, we obviously have a system that cries out for reform; again, the government has in hand the report that spells out methods whereby that system of reform can be brought about.

I was interested in one remark that the hon. Attorney General made when he introduced The Police Act amendment Act that it reflects, to a large extent, suggestions made by the police commission in its report tabled in the House. The hon. Attorney General tabled a report in the House yesterday. He was very co-operative—he made copies available to us within a few hours after tabling it, and told us that this report had not been held or delayed by him. But I suppose it is nothing more than a co-incidence, Mr. Chairman, that we have before us today a statute on a report that was tabled yesterday. I commend the officials who were responsible for drafting the statute, because in this particular field they worked with the utmost despatch; in so many other fields the hon. Attorney General says: "Let us not rush; you would not want us to make a mistake by drafting legislation too quickly." But here, within hours, apparently, if I interpret the hon. Attorney General's remarks correctly, we have a statute. We have it here, all ready to go.

As for compensation for victims of crime—that has been discussed and there is a resolution to this effect on the order paper. I say that there is an apparent attempt to deal with this in the amendments to The Police Act, but I think it falls far short of that.

Suggested alternatives to dealing with family law and family problems and a thorough discussion of matters such as separation agreements and the treatment of offenders—we have a reference that that has been referred to the law reform commission and in due course we will get a report

I suppose that we could digress for a moment. The single achievement of the law reform commission has been the introduction of the report on the law against perpetuities and—

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): That is why I left law school.

Mr. Singer: My friend, the hon. Minister for Education says that this is why he left the law school.

My friend, the hon. member for Sudbury has often remarked that they talk little else in Sudbury than about the effects of the law against perpetuities; it is the sort of thing that people just stop you on the street and constantly ask questions about. As my friend, the hon. Attorney General knows, there is one gentleman in this province who is the foremost authority on it—he is the gentleman who, in fact, wrote the report and wrote the statutes and whose remarks deal with all the changes in the law against perpetuities. He is the foremost legal scholar I had the privilege and pleasure of being one of his pupils at one time. I am quite prepared to accept that if he feels that these changes against perpetuities should be enacted, then let us have them. But what did the hon. Attorney General need the law reform commission to do that for? Dean Wright was available to him without all this nonsense of saying the law reform commission sat down and puzzled about the law against perpetuities; he could have had Dean Wright doing it on his own. He did it on his own, anyway; surely this is no great mark of achievement? It is the sort of thing that I think we should be getting from the law reform commission, and getting it in short order—reports dealing with family law, divorce and separations and this sort of thing are things that intimately concern the affairs of the people of Ontario. Mr. Chairman—I must ask the question while I am referring very briefly to the law reform commission—just how much time does Mr. Justice McRuer have to do both of his very important jobs? He is doing an outstanding job, in my opinion, in his approach to the civil rights commission that he is chairing; he is spending hours and hours listening to briefs and asking questions of people who submit briefs. I had the privilege, on Friday afternoon last, in sitting before him and for some two hours we discussed the submission that I was making. I am sure he gives equal care and attention to all the other briefs. But while he is doing this, sir, what time does he devote to directing the law reform commission? The commission, if properly conceived, could be, and should be, doing a most important job for the people of the province. But I suspect, sir, that since they seem to think that their major achievement is bringing in amendments to the law against perpetuities, they have become bogged down somewhat in some of the high ideals that are sounded for them.

Study of the bail system is something we have said is long overdue, and I notice that Mr. Common, in his report dealing with legal aid, while he apologizes for straying into this field because it is beyond his terms of reference, has several very important and pertinent remarks. There have been a lot of people who have been talking about the inadequacies of our bail system; surely we should have heard today that the hon. Attorney General has some idea about changing the system, which is antiquated and unfair, and which does real injustice. There is hardly a day now that one can pick up the newspapers that someone is not setting out, in chapter and verse, the real hardships that our present system of bail visits upon citizens who have come into conflict or into difficulty with the law. But we have not heard a word of this from the hon. Attorney General this afternoon and this, sir, is why I say I am most disappointed, and I think the people of the province are going to be most disappointed, in the remarks of the hon. Attorney General in connection with the performance of his department and in connection with the future goals of his department.

Mr. Chairman, I thought I would deal for a while this afternoon with one of the particular aspects of the administration of justice which concerns the hon. Attorney General and which, perhaps, demands the most urgent attention. That, generally, sir, is the functioning of the magistrates' courts, both so far as the physical facilities are concerned, and in so far as the conduct of the people who run those courts is concerned.

I noticed in the newspaper a day or two ago that the senior county court judge of the county of York, Judge Robert Forsythe, was addressing the magistrates' association. I presume that the hon. Attorney General was there, but his closing remarks caught my eye and I think that they are worth quoting and making part of the record. He said:

Unless you are kindly, patient, and full of dignity—

he is addressing the magistrates:

—and courteous to the people who come before you, they will get a bad view of the administration of justice.

The tenor of the honourable judge's remarks was that perhaps the magistrates—all persons charged with some sort of responsibility for the administration of justice—have to do a little more than is presently being done to make sure that people respect the system whereby we administer justice. The hon. Attorney General touched on this in his remarks this afternoon—as a matter of fact, he spent quite some time in talking about whether or not the system of the administration of justice should be criticized and how it might be criticized. I say in all seriousness that we who come here and assume the responsibility of being members of the House, have a duty upon us to point out any shortcomings that we see in any branch of our governmental affairs that we feel is inadequate. We have the responsibility, while doing this, of making sure that we are not reckless or careless in our statements. But where we see facts which indicate to us either inadequate administration procedures, or inadequate conduct by any public official, we have a duty and a responsibility to bring these facts forcefully and fairly before this Legislature, before the government and before the people of Ontario.

I am going to suggest that our courts, particularly the magistrates' courts which the hon. Attorney General talked about in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, are inadequate. They are overcrowded, and dirty, and the atmosphere creates in the minds of the people who have to come into them a sense of injustice. No idea of the majesty of the law or the fairness of the law is imparted at all, and I suggest that the casual remarks that have been made from time to time, and that the hon. Attorney General made this afternoon, are not nearly good enough.

The hon. Attorney General is condemned in this aspect by one of his own senior officials—Chief Magistrate Klein—who was appointed not many months ago. He is the chief magistrate for the province of Ontario. I have a copy of his report and I think it is worthwhile reading into the record just a few pages of his remarks. Here is what this senior governmental official has to say about magistrates' courts in the city of Toronto; this is not just picking idle newspaper comment, and I think that is the implication from some of the hon. Attorney General's remarks this afternoon, this is the report made by the newest shining light, apparently, in the hon. Attorney General's escutcheon.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member might say in his remarks that I made the report available to him. I first read it and made it all available to him. I think it is a good thing that my chief magistrate has seen this situation, is studying it, is reporting upon it to me; and I have made it available to my hon. friend.

Mr. Singer: I may say, sir, this is quite correct. I may say, now, since my hon. friend has introduced this, that I had very great difficulty in getting this report. I have forgotten whether I have written six, or was it eight, notes to the hon. Attorney General; but he did get it for me and I would not have it here this afternoon, unless it came from him.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I was studying it.

Mr. Singer: Yes; I know; he told me he was studying it.

But there is a principle that perhaps lies in this, and I am glad the hon. Attorney General interrupted at this point. Surely, Mr. Chairman, when a public official of the province of Ontario makes a report and that report is released to the newspapers, any member of the Legislature should be entitled to get a copy of that report just as easily as snapping his fingers. It should not take weeks or months until the report is given to a member of the Legislature.

If this was a secret report, then it would not have been in the newspapers; but there were long newspaper stories about what is said in this report, and it took me many weeks to get it. I thank the hon. Attorney General for giving it to me; but if reports are going to be released by public officials to the newspapers, then at least the hon. members of the Opposition are entitled to have those original reports and read them at full length and comment on them.

Now let me read what Chief Magistrate Klein says about the courts in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto.

The courts in the old city hall have for some years been so overloaded they have been unable to deal with their cases in the normal course without delay.

D court, for example, has so many cases piled up now that when for some unavoidable reason it becomes necessary to adjourn a case the earliest date that can be fixed is some two months ahead, whereas if there were adequate courtroom facilities it should be possible to fix a date within a week. The other courts in the old city hall have for some years been so busy that their lists are filled up for approximately a month ahead.

For example, the homicide squad advises that on November 23, 1964, there were two capital murder cases in which the prosecution wanted to get a date fixed for preliminary hearing before the magistrate, but the earliest dates available were December 22 and December 23.

Imagine, Mr. Chairman, in a case of the seriousness of a homicide case, where the Crown wants a preliminary hearing, they are unable to get a courtroom available for a month. The accused had been arrested in one case, on November 5 and surely it is in the interests of the administration of justice that he be brought before the courts, that there be a preliminary hearing, just as quickly as is humanly possible. Because of our inadequate and ridiculous courtroom accommodation, this just cannot be done. Moreover, the magistrate goes on:

Under the present conditions many cases have to be tried piecemeal on various days and at various intervals because of the lack of courtrooms where it should be possible to put the longer cases in separate courts and to hold the trial of cases continuously from morning till afternoon, or from one day to the next if necessary.

In 1962 there were four criminal offence courts in the city hall and on December 31, 1962, there were 1,689 adjourned charges still pending in those courts. In 1963 there were five criminal offence courts and on December 31, 1963, there were 2,119 adjourned charges still pending.

Some of the cases would have had to be adjourned in any event, but at a conservative estimate it would probably take two full months of steady going in each of the five present courts in the old city hall to clean up that backlog alone.

Mr. Chairman, can there be any greater condemnation of our system of administration of justice than lies in those words written by the chief magistrate of the province of Ontario?

What are we doing about it? We are looking at it. We are having another conference. If the courtroom facilities are not there and people are being denied what they are entitled to, they are being denied a fair shake before our courts. They are not getting what we understand is British justice.

In light of the experience and on the basis of the statistical data available it is estimated that an average of 5,000 criminal cases a year constitutes a full load for any one magistrate's court. In 1963 there were 62,000-odd criminal charges and liquor charges, 20,000 vagrancy and drunk charges; so that there were 42,000 criminal and liquor, other than drunk charges dealt with in the five courts in the city hall.

The chief magistrate estimates it is a reasonable work load to have 5,000 cases in a court, and in Metro they are working on 8,000 and there is a two-month backlog. What kind of justice do you call that, Mr. Attorney General? Where is your solution, and how long does this situation go on?

The Metropolitan Toronto police court bureau points out that at the present work load, the court detectives in the court bureau have to work right through their lunch hour every day because there is not enough time to make phone calls and to attend to all other matters that are necessary in connection with the cases being tried in court. You would think that the hon. Attorney General would be concerned about the work that the court detectives have to do. I think they are entitled to have a lunch hour the same as anybody else, but our system of courts and our system of the administration of justice does not allow it.

In 1964, up to the end of October, a period of 10 months, 7,042 criminal charges were disposed of in A court, or in round figures around 700 charges a month, or 8,400 a year.

This is one of the questions we will come to later when we get to that particular branch of the estimates.

One of the questions I asked was about average loads, and the figures that came up did not indicate anything quite as bad as we have here in Chief Magistrate Klein's report. His estimate, I point out again, is 5,000 as a reasonable work load; and here is A court working at 8,400 a year. What kind of justice do the people who have to appear in that court get? In a year, 365 days, with 200 working days, how many cases go before a court and are dealt with in a day?

Mr. Chairman, I would like the hon. Attorney General to tell us how any magistrate can possibly bring his attention and his thinking, no matter how fair he is, no matter how hard he tries to work, to this sort of a case load? How he is going to dispense justice reasonably to the people who have to come before these courts. Mr. Klein goes on:

For some years the situation has been such that there are often as many as three or four adjournments in a single case, simply because on each day on which the case comes up in court the list is so crowded and the prior cases take so much time that the case is not reached and has to be adjourned.

For example, in a period of 10 days, from September 9 to 13, and from September 16 to 20, 1963, in A, B and C courts alone, there were 82 separate criminal cases involving 108 charges that had to be adjourned because they were not reached. Where the accused were on bail or under summons, their cases had to be adjourned for anywhere from two to four weeks in order to find a date when it appeared that the list might not be too crowded.

Just think of that one for a minute, Mr. Chairman; just think of that last statement. In those three courts, in the period of ten days, there were 82 separate criminal cases involving 108 charges that had to be adjourned because they were not reached. What happens to the accused in that period? What happens to the time they lose, to their families, to the nervous strain and stress of the time off work; those are the ones who are fortunate enough to be out on bail. What happens to the ones who cannot get on bail—either because they have not sufficient finances, and are not going to be released on their own recognizance under the present system, or because of various other reasons? What happens to the people who are held in jail—through the fault of the system of administration of justice of which unfortunately they have run afoul. They have to stay in jail, because the courts are too busy to deal with their cases, for varying periods.

Magistrate Klein sets this out, and what do we get this afternoon? We get no encouragement. There is no encouragement that there are going to be adequate magistrate court facilities in this, the largest municipality in the province; in this, the capital city of the province; in this, the municipality which has a third of the population of the province of Ontario. We are having another conference. The municipal officials and the provincial officials are going to sit down and talk about it, and soon—I asked the hon. Attorney General this when he was making his remarks—we might have an answer. And the mayor of the city of Toronto, who is trying to keep his tax line as low as he can, says, “I haven’t got any money in my budget to build a new magistrates’ court building”—and I cannot blame the mayor of the city of Toronto for this. He feels—and, I think, rightly so—that the responsibility for providing adequate court facilities is and should be a provincial responsibility.

Is the province going to make the mayor a whipping boy in this? It would not surprise me at all; there has been this implication. The responsibility for the administration of justice in the province of Ontario, Mr. Chairman, lies with this government, and lies with this hon. Minister. And when his own senior officials can make a report like this, then I suggest that that responsibility is not being accepted, I do not think it is even being noticed; or, if it is being noticed, then it has been passed by as being not worthy of consideration.

There is another aspect—and I do not think this is too important, but it is worth mentioning: The Metropolitan Toronto police court bureau estimates that, on the basis of a minimum average of two witnesses a case, at $6.75 per witness-day, there has been a loss in witness fees alone of $1,097 a day. This would mean a minimum loss in witness fees of approximately $25,000 a year, or an average of $8,125 per court for these three courts alone. So, if for no other reason, Mr. Chairman—and the other reasons are far more important if you have any love at all for the system of administration of justice under which we think we live—than a practical saving of money, this bringing in witnesses and having to pay them fees and not using them, then calling them back a few weeks later, is another motivation.

But, Mr. Chairman, we hear nothing about this. There is no brave, new, bold scheme to provide a proper system of administration of justice in this, the largest municipality in the province of Ontario. And this is the capital city, the area in which one-third of the people of the province lives.

Magistrate Klein goes on and says:

It even appears that, because of the delays, inconvenience, and loss of time and money that would be in store for them, a number of persons are discouraged from laying charges that should be laid, and thus offenders go free.

And this is another very serious reflection on our system of courts and our system of administration of justice.

People are not anxious to become involved with the law when it results in loss of pay, in substantial inconvenience, in being cramped up in miserable quarters, in having no facilities available for them, in disrupting their family life, and so on. Surely, Mr. Chairman, our duty in this regard is simple and it is obvious? Surely, Mr. Chairman, we are entitled to a proper system of magistrates’ courts in this municipality of Metropolitan Toronto?

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Hear! Hear! Let us have action.

Mr. Singer: And he goes on; he makes some suggestions on additions to the present five courts in the old city hall. There should be at least three more courts to take the overload, and to make possible for magistrates’ courts to function in a proper manner.

His estimates contemplate that the courts will be working at full capacity, as under normal conditions, and any increases in crime will require additional courts and court facilities. He talks about facilities for justices of the peace. And listen to this, Mr. Chairman:

At present there are two offices occupied by justices of the peace who hear complaints. There is no waiting room. Frequently when a complainant or police officer is interviewing a justice of the peace in order to lay a charge, or to take out a search warrant, the interview has to be erupted because of other people coming and going.

What could be more obvious to anyone concerned with the administration of justice than that an important official, a justice of the peace, should have an office where he can talk to people privately? And Magistrate Klein says this is not so.

For the present volume of work there should be, on a conservative basis, four separate offices for the justices of the peace hearing complaints, together with space for a receptionist and a waiting room.

And that is not there. Well, enough for Magistrate Klein.

But, Mr. Chairman, can there be any greater condemnation of the disrepute into which our present system of justice has fallen than this criticism from a senior official of the hon. Attorney General's department?

I want to turn to something more specific insofar as the conduct of a certain magistrate is concerned; and it is with no pleasure that I feel I have the responsibility and the duty, Mr. Chairman, to lay these facts before this assembly. It does not come lightly to the lips of a lawyer to stand in this assembly and to say that a person occupying a judicial office needs and deserves public criticism. But in this case, and one I will refer to later, it is my very carefully considered opinion that both these gentlemen need and deserve public criticism.

It has been suggested, apparently in the press, that it would have been far better had I come to the hon. Attorney General privately concerning Magistrate Robert Dnieper. I am not going to deal at any great length on my private discussions with the hon. Attorney General but let it suffice to say that, both before the question went on the order paper and while it stood there unanswered, the hon. Attorney General and I had several discussions. He knows about them as I do and it was not my desire to rush into print or to publicly embarrass anybody that brought this matter to this point, Mr. Chairman.

The fact is that I felt it was my duty to put these questions on the order paper and the answers are there. I am going to read them, and then I am going to outline to hon. members some of the reasons why I thought it was important that these matters come up for public discussion. I asked:

(a) Has the Attorney General, or any of the officials of his department, received any written or oral complaints concerning the activities of Magistrate Dnieper as a magistrate since his appointment?

(b) If so, how many such complaints have been received?

(c) If so, what generally has been the nature of such complaints?

(d) If so, have any such complaints been received from the law society of Upper Canada, any legal organization in the province of Ontario, or any police body?

(e) If so, what action, if any, has the Attorney General taken, or does he propose to take in the future, in connection with such complaints?

And the answers by the hon. Attorney General were these:

(a) Yes.

(b) Seven.

(c) Critical comments of the magistrate during court proceedings.

(d) Yes.

(e) The complaints have been drawn to the attention of the chief magistrate and the magistrate concerned.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not satisfied that the action taken is sufficient. Let me outline some of the reasons why I am not satisfied.

I have a file here full of clippings and editorials reporting on the activities of this gentleman as he sat on the bench. In a Toronto Telegram editorial dated February 25, 1965, the writer says:

Magistrate Robert Borden Dnieper disapproves of drinking by people under the age of 21.

So do most of us. That is why the laws of our province forbid youths under 21 from taking drinks containing alcohol.

As magistrate in the city hall's E court—or liquor court—Magistrate Dnieper occasionally encounters the young person charged with offending this law. Naturally, he has to deal with these cases according to the regulations prescribed by the Legislature and makes findings according to the evidence and sentences according to his conscience.

However, one must wonder about the magistrate's set of standards. Should a person too young to be allowed a drink be obliged to answer charges in court without the aid of counsel?

On at least two occasions Magistrate Dnieper has refused remands in the cases before him, remands which would have enabled the accused to have obtained counsel. Last year the magistrate sentenced a 20-year-old boy to a fine of $100 or a 30-day jail term on a drinking offence. It was the boy's first offence and an emergency had prevented his counsel from appearing.

He was refused a remand.

Now, this week, he has sentenced a 19-year-old to 30 days in Mercer reformatory on a similar charge.

I am skipping a few words here, and I read the concluding paragraph:

Sentencing under-age persons not represented by counsel is a denial of reasonable justice.

I am not criticizing, Mr. Chairman, the findings of any magistrate insofar as the facts before him are concerned. When it comes to the question of who he is going to believe or disbelieve, he is in the position to make these decisions because the persons appointing him had some faith in his ability to be fair and reasonable. I agree with the hon. Attorney General when he says that we in this assembly cannot sit in judgment on how a magistrate exercises that kind of discretion and I agree that it is not up to us to bring into this Legislature every question of whether a sentence should have been greater or less, unless it is so outstandingly unusual. I do not think that sort of thing is proper to be discussed, but I do think, sir, that when a pattern emerges, as it does in this case, that it is worthy of serious and careful public consideration and public discussion.

There is a series of comments on the magistrate, and the magistrate in Oshawa tells the accused to tuck his shirt in; asks the accused if he was properly dressed when he appeared before the courts, and there are a series of editorials commenting on this—some of them taking a very serious view of it.

There is a story of this magistrate deciding that he was going to hold court in a police cruiser at 4 a.m. on the highway, and he did it. How can the people of Ontario believe that we have a reasonable system of justice when early in the morning a magistrate takes it upon himself to hold court in a police cruiser on the highway?

There is the story of the magistrate concerning himself with the guilty pleas by two doctors who were charged with an offence under, I suppose, The Drug Act or The Narcotics Act. The magistrate refused a guilty plea and he told the lawyer, according to these press reports, that he had been cute and that he was being dishonest by misleading the court.

Some 24 hours later there was a public apology. Surely this sort of thing should not be expected in our courts?

There is a story that this magistrate told a young man who appeared before him at Oshawa, and whom he was sentencing on another offence, that he was lucky that he was not looking at a rope. The sentence was 30 days.

There is the story that this magistrate asked police yesterday to consider a perjury charge against a minor who was found asleep in a car with an open case of beer. In quotation marks in this story, the magistrate is quoted as having said:

Without the slightest compunction I could have you charged with contempt of court and you could rot in jail until you decided to give truthful evidence.

Is this the sort of thing, Mr. Chairman, that we can expect from our magistrates sitting on the bench?

These clippings are quite extensive, and there was no difficulty finding them.

There is the editorial comment of the Kingston Whig Standard made on November 29, 1961, and the concluding paragraph dealing with the magistrate's comment in relation to dress of people appearing before him. It reads:

This sort of thing, when it reaches the public, does nothing to confirm the dignity and wisdom of the courts and we suggest that there are certain areas into which the magistrates of this province could profit from some firm and authoritative direction.

The magistrate is quoted in another story in 1961 of suggesting to an accused that he was a wise guy, a big hero, and a smart Alec. I do not think the magistrates are supposed to feel called upon to make this kind of remark. When accused come before them, they are supposed to listen to the evidence and, if they find the accused guilty, they are supposed to sentence them.

The Chatham Daily News, June of 1961, in an editorial headed "Clothes in Court" said:

The recent incident in which Magistrate Dnieper, Whitby, criticized a defendant who came to court in his ordinary working clothes has drawn a lot of comment, most of it apparently in support of the magistrate. With all due respect for the magistrate, we feel compelled to dissent. The young man, who explained that he had come to court directly from work in a factory, appeared wearing a blue shirt with sleeves rolled up and jeans turned up at the cuffs. "Go home and change" the magistrate commanded, and threatened to hold the man in contempt if he was still attired in his work clothes when he returned. So the accused had to drive five miles home, change his clothes and return five miles. What, anyway, is wrong in a man wearing his work clothes in a court of law, provided they cover him adequately? Like magistrate and counsel, he wore his work clothes in court. The difference was merely one in the quality and cut of the material. So far as we are aware, there is no prescribed uniforms for civilians necessarily making court appearances. We do think the man might properly have turned down his sleeves and his trouser cuffs. But the question remains, what would have been the situation if the clothes he wore were his only clothes? We are not too sure the magistrate's action was not a contravention of the Bill of Rights.

The Toronto Daily Star has an editorial entitled, "Snob Justice." Its concluding paragraph reads this way:

After all, justice as classically represented, wears nothing but a blindfold and robes of the simplest cut and design. Perhaps Magistrate Dnieper ought to blindfold himself mentally to the grade of clothes which are worn.

The Kingston Whig Standard again, and I do not think I read this one before, Mr. Chairman:

If the accused man had rechanged his clothing, could he not then have had a lawful excuse? On the face of it, it is difficult to see how the magistrate's views could be supported in law if not in the realm of common sense.

In other words, the obvious reply to this question of "What right?" would seem to be "Every right in the world."

Well, I agree with the hon. Attorney General that there is frequently a misleading concept to be obtained by reading only press clippings and coming to positive conclusions without examining transcripts of evidence. But I suggest that it is no secret that the hon. Attorney General's two predecessors received substantial complaints concerning this gentleman, and that the present deputy Attorney General and his predecessor received substantial complaints about him. And I suggest, sir, that it is no secret either that, not too long ago, when this magistrate was sitting on the bench in Oshawa, a delegation from the Ontario county law society, a law association, appeared before him—not this gentleman, but one of his predecessors—and suggested to the then Attorney General that if this magistrate was to continue to sit on the bench in that county the members of the Bar who practised law in that county would be most reluctant to continue to appear before him. And I suggest again, sir, it is no secret that, as a result of that complaint, that magistrate was then moved from Oshawa to Toronto.

I think it is important to follow this through with a record, and I have here in my hand a transcript of evidence. And I will say quickly, before the hon. Attorney General points it out, that I have this transcript of evidence because the hon. Attorney General made it available to me.

This transcript of evidence—

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): A fine fellow.

Mr. Singer: He is indeed, and I said that and I mean it; he has been very helpful to me and most co-operative in the things I have asked him for.

Mr. Bukator: Do you think he will be today?

Mr. Singer: This is a transcript of evidence taken in magistrate's court E in the city of Toronto, and the case is the case of Her Majesty the Queen against Leslie Charles Harrow. The transcript was taken by L. Wayne Robinson, official court reporter, on November 20, 1964. I am going to read a substantial portion of this transcript into the record as I think it is very important that we be aware—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Why do you not table it?

Mr. Singer: No, it is more important. The effect of tabling it, I feel, addressing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister of Labour, would perhaps be to obscure some of the reasons why I feel I must complain about the conduct of this magistrate. And I am sure that the hon. Minister of Labour, as a lawyer, as a good lawyer, will be shocked with me as some of these portions are read.

I am starting to read here on page 3. And I may say that Mr. Martin Kelso is the Crown attorney in this case. Mr. Kelso introduces the matter and says:

Perhaps to clear the air—

page 2—and this is the sort of normal procedure. Court lists are run by pages; and to identify the case to the magistrate, it is referred to by the page as a method of showing which case he is calling. Page 2—Leslie Harrow; and Mr. Shaw. I am not sure, perhaps the hon. Attorney General can tell me, if Mr. Shaw at this date was a lawyer or a law student.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not certain either. He was counsel anyway.

Mr. Singer: He was counsel in any event. It is not necessary, Mr. Chairman, in magistrates' courts, for accused to be represented only by lawyers. Occasionally the magistrate allows students to go on. In any event, I would suggest that, if Mr. Shaw was a practising lawyer, very possibly at the time he appeared he was reasonably new to the practice of law. So, either he was a junior lawyer or he was a law student, and I cannot state—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Or an agent.

Mr. Singer: Yes. Well, I think his remarks indicate he has some familiarity with the law, in any event.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): May I ask the hon. member: Is there not a proper place for the airing of this sort of thing other than the Legislature? Is there not a proper procedure laid down by statute for this?

Mr. Singer: No, Mr. Chairman, there is not. I am interested in the remarks of the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, and I refer him to The Magistrates Act, section 3, which describes how a magistrate can be dealt with for misbehaviour or inability to perform his duties properly—only if the circumstances respecting the misbehaviour or inability are first inquired into, and the magistrate is given a reasonable notice of the time and place appointed for the inquiry, and is afforded an opportunity by himself or his counsel of being heard, and cross-examining the witnesses, and so on. So this contemplates certainly that the only person who can do this is the Lieutenant Governor in council.

I would have hoped, as a result of my private discussions of this subject with the hon. Attorney General over several months, that perhaps it would not have been necessary to make these remarks here. But, as I say, when I read my question and my answer—that the complaints had been drawn to the attention of the chief magistrate and the magistrate concerned—I am not satisfied with the answer. I believe that the only alternative I have is to bring these facts to the attention of this body.

Mr. Kelso says:

Perhaps just to clear the air, page 2, Leslie Harrow.

Mr. Shaw: Your Worship, I have been asked to speak to this case and I ask for a remand for two weeks.

The court: —

And the court in this case is Magistrate Dnieper:

The Court: Why, sir?

Mr. Shaw: I must confess I am not just as familiar with this fellow, Your Worship, as I was just called in by legal aid and I expect that they want to have sufficient time to have a solicitor to attend.

And that was why I asked the hon. Attorney General if he knew whether Mr. Shaw was a solicitor, and I suspect that question indicates that perhaps he was not.

The Court: I am sorry.

Mr. Shaw: I have just been told that the reason is that Mr. Mintz—

And I may mention that Mr. Mintz is a solicitor who is part of the legal aid setup in Metropolitan Toronto:

—is handling the case and he is at the hospital where his father is in an extremely serious condition.

The Court: On the contrary, sir, I spoke to Mr. Mintz and Mr. Mintz said he was not handling this case. The case goes on and it goes on right now. Mr. Harrow told me yesterday that Mr. Mintz was handling this case and Mr. Mintz, in very clear terms, instructed me that he was not.

Mr. Shaw: I am sorry. I have been misinformed then, Your Worship.

The Court: Either you have been misinformed or I have been misinformed. I spoke to Mr. Mintz.

Mr. Shaw: Fine.

The Court: Sir, come on. You appear for this man in this case. You will have to request withdrawal from the case.

Mr. Shaw: Your Worship, I was just going to speak to a person who is representing legal aid. Might I ask if the case stand down for several moments in Your Worship's discretion to allow me to receive some instructions? I had never spoken to the accused in this matter.

The Court: Do you wish to withdraw from this case or do you wish to represent this man?

Mr. Shaw: Well, I must confess, Your Worship, I am not aware of whether or not it would be proper for me to handle the case as I was just called in and I would prefer if the case could stand down for several moments to receive instructions from the accused and/or the representative of legal aid.

The Court: Well, whatever it is, it is bad for you, whilst a case is going on, for counsel to turn his back on the court and walk out.

Mr. Shaw: I apologize, Your Worship, I was just going to the third pew. I was not intending to leave the courtroom, I am sorry.

The Court: Mr. Kelso, I do believe we should have a recess at this time and call this case immediately after recess.

Mr. Shaw: Thank you, Your Worship.

The Court: I can tell you now, this case is going to be heard today.

Now the criticism there is obvious, Mr. Chairman. Here is a young man appearing in court and charged with two offences. There is a request for a remand and the magistrate comes to the conclusion, because of some conversation he had with a lawyer the day before, that a particular lawyer is not representing this accused and the magistrate says in clear and unmistakable terms: "I can tell you now this case is going to be heard today." Is that reasonable justice?

RECESS. UPON RESUMING

Mr. Kelso: Leslie C. Harrow.

There is no question, it goes on that day.

The Court: Mr. Shaw, I might inform you that this man yesterday told me that Mr. Mintz was acting for him, whereas Mr. Mintz was not. He said it was because Mr. Mintz was appearing in another court, and Mr. Mintz told me he was not appearing in another court. No, Mr. Mintz was available; and no, Mr. Mintz was not acting for the man.

Let me interrupt again, sir. What particular concern has the magistrate in whether Mr. Mintz or Mr. Sopha or Mr. Smith or Mr. Rowntree was acting? Surely the court should be concerned with whether or not the accused man has a reasonable opportunity of defending himself; and the court is not concerned, obviously, in this case, with that fact.

Mr. Shaw: Your Worship, I was in the legal aid office when a telephone call came through and apparently Mr. Mintz was on the other end and he said he was calling from the hospital and that he had a case in E court with Mr. Harrow and that his father had a relapse or something to this effect and that he could not be here because he had to be in the hospital. As I was in the office, Miss Rainwood—

I think Miss Rainwood is a secretary in the legal aid office:

Miss Rainwood asked me if I would speak to the case and get a remand and when I came down I did not realize that it was not Mr. Mintz.

Obviously at this point, this young man, Mr. Shaw, is feeling his neck and is unhappy and uncomfortable; and not being a lawyer, as I think we can presume, is not too sure about how he can best proceed to act in the best interests of the accused.

I just thought that it was at large and I was to ask for a remand. The time I was stated to ask for was three weeks, and it was on this basis. I did not realize that Mr. Mintz was involved in this, and so when I said that I wanted to have time to investigate I found that this was the case and that he had just come in. When I turned around to speak to Miss Rainwood she informed me Mr. Mintz was in on the case and unfortunately could not get down from the hospital. This was the extent of my knowledge of the case.

The Court: Then, Mr. Mintz should have better co-operation in his office. However, the case will go on.

The court is concerned about co-operation that a lawyer has with his office; but come what may, that case is going to go on, and it does.

Mr. Shaw: Thank you, Your Worship.

Clerk of the Court: Leslie Charles Harrow you are charged within three months ending on the 14th day of November, 1964, to wit, on the 13th day of November, 1964, unlawfully did being a person under the age of 21 years consume liquor in contravention of The Liquor Control Act of Ontario. How do you plead?

Now, that is a very serious charge.

How do you plead, guilty or not guilty?

The Accused: Guilty!

Clerk of the Court: You are further charged on the 13th of November, 1964, that you were found in an intoxicated condition in Annette street public school at 10.15 p.m. How do you plead to this charge, guilty or not guilty?

The Accused: Not guilty.

Mr. Kelso: We will deal with the charge of being intoxicated. I call PC Thompson.

Police Constable, Raymond Thompson, the witness, having been called and duly sworn testified as follows:

Direct examination by Mr. Kelso, counsel for the Crown.

Q. You are a metropolitan police constable?

A. I am.

Q. It is part of your duties to enforce the provisions of The Liquor Control Act?

A. It is.

The reason, Mr. Chairman, that I am reading this evidence in detail is because as the evidence progresses the action of the court in regard to some other witnesses, I think, is most significant.

Q. Would you tell the court what you observed of the accused and his condition on November 13th of this year?

A. Your Worship, on November 13th I had occasion to answer a call at 269 Annette Street, which is Annette Street public school. On arriving there, Your Worship, I observed the accused, Leslie Charles Harrow, in the foyer of the public school in a drunken condition. At the time I saw him he was staggering in the foyer trying to get out the front door of the school which was locked. There was a dance in progress and I took hold of the accused and brought him out to the back of the school yard and at that time his breath smelled strongly of alcohol and when I asked him a few questions I had to repeat them a few times. I placed him in the squad car, took him to the station where he was charged with drunk in a public place and minor consume.

Q. Would you point out the accused, the person you refer to?

A. I am sorry, sir, it is the accused right here.

Mr. Kelso: Indicating the accused, have you any questions you wish to ask him?

Mr. Shaw: Yes.

Mr. Shaw cross-examines.

Q. PC Thompson, do you know what was going on in the school at this time?

A. Yes, there was a school dance.

Q. Do you know whether or not the accused had been dancing prior to the arrest?

A. No, I do not know.

Q. You said he was staggering. Did you observe any other symptoms which immediately led you to believe that he was drunk or were you some distance away?

A. I was the distance of this room away.

Q. At a distance of this room away, you come to the conclusion that he was drunk?

A. Yes, and when he walked towards the door I could see that he staggered towards the door; when I got hold of the man I knew he was drunk.

Q. You formed the opinion in your mind just from seeing him from a distance of this room away?

A. No, not immediately. When I got hold of the boy first I formed the opinion that he was drunk. I talked to him and took him to the scout car. I did not form this opinion just by seeing him.

Q. You smelled liquor on his breath?

A. Yes.

Mr. Shaw: Thank you.

The Court: Thank you.

The next witness, PC Molner.

Police Constable Horace Molner, witness, having been called and duly sworn testified as follows:

Direct examination by Mr. Kelso, counsel for the Crown.

Q. You are a metropolitan police constable?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Would you tell the court what you observed with regard to the accused's condition on November 13th of this year?

A. On November 13th, a Friday, at approximately 10.25 or 10.30 I was on duty at the station. I observed PC Thompson and the accused person walking down a hall towards me. There was another youth with them at the time and I noted that the accused was swaying and weaving down the hall. He had to be supported and as he passed I noticed his eyes were blood-shot and slightly glazed and I could smell the odour of an alcoholic beverage on his breath.

Mr. Kelso: Any questions you wish to ask this witness?

Mr. Shaw: Yes.

Cross-examination by Mr. Shaw.

Q. PC Molner, did the accused tell you what he had been doing before he was arrested?

A. I had no conversation with the accused.

Q. You had no conversation with the accused? All right, thank you.

Mr. Kelso: That is the evidence for the prosecution on the charge of being intoxicated.

And now we come to the defence evidence and I think it is most significant.

Mr. Shaw: Call Wilfred MacDonald to the stand, please.

Remember, Mr. Chairman, that at this point there are in court the magistrate who is conducting the hearing, Mr. Martin Kelso representing the Crown—an experienced, capable man who has been doing this work for years and does it very well—and Mr. Shaw, a young law student, I gather. Mr. Shaw calls as a defence witness, Mr. Wilfred William MacDonald.

Q. Mr. MacDonald, do you know the accused?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. You were with him at this school on the night in question?

A. Yes, I was.

Q. Do you recall what Mr. Harrow was doing immediately before or some time shortly before the arrest in question?

A. Well, shortly before he was arrested, he was dancing.

By the Court: What kind of—

“By the court”—just in the introductory evidence, under direct examination by defence counsel, the court has started its interruption. You can see the direction in which this magistrate goes—

By the Court: What kind of a dance was it?

A. It was just a school dance; they play records.

And still by the court—

Q. A public school?

A. Yes.

Q. Does the accused go to the public school?

A. No, Your Honour, it is not just for people who go to that school; it is for anybody; it is for anybody who wants to go there.

Q. Who runs the school?

A. Yes, sir, I think so.

Now Mr. Shaw managed to get in one more question—

Q. Do you recall the length of time the dance had been going on? Or how long you and the accused had been at the dance?

A. We were at it since it started from 8 o'clock.

By the Court:

The magistrate just cannot resist getting into this—

Q. How old are you?

A. Seventeen—16, pardon me.

Q. Well, how old are you?

A. Sixteen.

Q. Why did you say you were 17?

A. I will be 17 in March.

The magistrate has inserted himself into the evidence given by a defence witness; taken it away from defence counsel and is now berating this defence witness, and the defence witness really has not said anything yet that is controversial!

Q. Why did you say you were 17?

A. I will be 17 in March.

Q. You will be 85 in a few years now, too, but you do not give that answer.

Interjections by hon. members.

Q. How old is the accused?

A. Twenty.

Q. Did you go there by yourselves or did you bring your girl friends?

This is the court still asking questions:

A. Well, our girl friends were supposed to be there but they did not show up.

Q. This dance—was it mostly composed of the children who go to the school?

A. No, sir, it was children from all different schools who go there.

Q. What, public school children?

A. Well, high school children, too.

Mr. Shaw happens to get in one or two questions:

Q. Is it a community dance?

A. It is a community dance, Your Worship, I understand.

Q. Mr. MacDonald, what sort of dancing?

Now the court is back in again:

Q. Just a moment, I am not finished with this man. Does the accused go to school?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you go to school?

A. No, sir.

Q. What does the accused do for a living?

A. He works, I think.

Do not forget, Mr. Chairman, this accused is being charged with being drunk in a public place. What right does the magistrate have to insert himself into a trial in this way and berate a 17-year-old youth who is giving evidence?

Q. Do you have a criminal record?

The court to the witness. The witness really has not given any evidence of importance at all:

Q. Do you have a criminal record?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Sing it out, please.

A. Pardon?

Q. Let us have it.

A. I was in for breaking and entering.

Q. When?

A. October 30.

Q. Your sentence, please.

A. Eighteen months, probation.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Completely illegal.

Mr. Singer: Can you imagine in our courts today a magistrate taking over a defence witness and conducting, with a 17-year-old youth, this kind of an examination—

Mr. Sopha: Contrary to The Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Shaw continues:

Q. Mr. MacDonald, are you under oath here?

I guess the magistrate resented Mr. Shaw getting in at all, for the court reminded him:

It is improper for counsel to remind the witness he is under oath.

Suddenly the magistrate realized that something in that court could be improper. Mr. Shaw replied: "Thank you, Your Worship," and continued to question the witness:

Q. Mr. MacDonald, what dances were being conducted that night? What sort of dances were there? Tango or waltzes, or what?

A. Fast and slow, rock and roll.

Q. Was the accused dancing? Engaged in these dances?

A. Yes.

Q. You mean those dances where they all stand in one place and shuffle their feet?

Now there is a fine contribution by the magistrate:

A. No, the twist, too—you know, you twist all around the room.

By Mr. Shaw:

Q. Did the accused dance most of the dances?

A. Not most of them, but he danced some of them.

Q. I have no further questions of this witness, Your Worship.

I guess they figured they might as well let the Crown attorney in and do a little cross-examining. So Mr. Kelso now comes in. Mr. Kelso is known to any member of the profession who comes in contact with him as a gentleman and as a responsible lawyer who handles himself well and properly in court. Mr. Kelso conducts a reasonable and normal cross-examination:

Q. Were you drinking with the accused?

A. No, sir.

Q. Are you sure?

A. Yes.

Q. The accused was drinking?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. You knew he was drinking?

A. No, I did not know he was drinking, but I found out.

Q. He consumed quite a bit?

A. Pardon?

Q. He consumed quite a bit of liquor?

A. I do not know.

Q. You do not know what he had?

A. No.

Q. Did you see him there when he was arrested?

A. Yes, sir, I was with him when he was arrested.

Q. You were with him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you arrested?

A. I was taken to the station with him, but I was not arrested, I do not think.

Mr. Kelso is the Crown attorney acting in that case. He asked the questions—with drinking and so on. With the police evidence there is probably enough for the magistrate to convict. I am not concerned, Mr. Chairman, about whether there was a conviction or whether there was an acquittal. I am concerned with what the record reveals in this case by the court. Now he is back again:

Q. What is a 16-year-old doing going out with a 20-year-old?

A. I cannot see anything wrong with it.

Q. You may be right.

Mr. Kelso continues:

Q. And the accused was making a bit of a nuisance of himself at the dance, was he not?

A. I would not know about that.

Q. I did not think you would know about that. Now get out of the box.

Mr. Shaw, call Robert Bonneville to the stand, please.

This is the second defence witness, Robert Arthur Bonneville. The witness having been duly called and sworn, testified as follows. Direct examination by Mr. Shaw, counsel for the accused:

Q. Mr. Bonneville, do you know the accused?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You were with him on the night in question?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you observe him some time prior to the arrest?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he take part in any of the dances?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What nature of dancing was going on?

A. Rock and roll, modern music, folk songs.

Q. Was the accused able to dance these?

A. Yes.

And now the court:

This is your witness; do not lead him.

Mr. Shaw: I am sorry, there are no further questions.

Cross-examination by Mr. Kelso, counsel for the Crown.

Q. Had you been drinking?

A. No, sir.

Q. What were you doing at the dance?

A. Dancing.

Q. And what was the trouble with the accused to be in the condition he was in?

A. Nothing that I could see.

Q. Was he acting in a normal manner?

A. He wasn't doing nothing.

Q. Was he acting in a normal manner?

A. Dancing, yes.

Q. After, when he was not dancing and he was trying to get out of a locked door, you did not see that, did you?

A. No, I was on the dance floor.

Q. Well, you do not know anything about what you are talking about. The accused had too much to drink, had he not?

A. I do not think so, sir.

Q. You do not think so?

A. No.

And here he comes again:

By the Court: Do you know him?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There is obviously more material and we can continue tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in moving the adjournment of the House, I would simply say that the order of estimates will be to continue with the hon. Attorney General's department first, then The Department of Public Works, and thereafter The Provincial Treasurer's Department.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MAY 6, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, students from the following schools: in the west gallery, Swansea public school, Toronto, and Welland South public school, Welland and in the east gallery, Vincent Massey public school, Oshawa, and Topcliff Avenue public school, Downsview.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mrs. A. Pritchard (Hamilton Centre), from the standing committee on education, health and welfare, presented the committee's report, which was read as follows and adopted:

The committee begs to report the following bills with certain amendments:

Bill No. 87, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Bill No. 88, An Act to amend The Public Schools Act.

Bill No. 89, An Act to amend The Separate Schools Act.

Bill No. 90, An Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

ONTARIO INSTITUTE FOR STUDIES AND EDUCATION

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to establish the Ontario institute for studies and education.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, due to the rather important nature of the bill, I intend to give a slightly longer explanation, if the House would agree. I think, really, it is necessary to give some of the history behind the bill and to name some of the factors which have shaped the thinking on this particular subject.

The idea of educational research is far from new in Ontario. Informal studies by individuals and larger scale investigations by commissions have demonstrated that the solution of problems may be facilitated by a systematic assembly of facts. Egerton Ryerson conducted innumerable surveys of education in Ontario and other jurisdictions, and on the basis of the facts obtained and opinions expressed, devised a system of elementary and secondary schools and post-secondary institutions, so modern and advanced for that day that it served as a model for the most of the rest of Canada.

One early inquiry was conducted under the direction of G. W. Ross, the Minister of Education who, in 1885, introduced the first regulation requiring that English be taught in every public school of the province. In 1906 a commission was appointed to collect information on the cost of textbooks in our province and elsewhere and the best means of publishing them.

I guess the most noteworthy commission was, of course, the Royal commission on education in Ontario, which was appointed in 1945 under the chairmanship of the late Mr. Justice J. A. Hope. The commission's treatment of some of the basic problems of Ontario education will continue to exert a constructive influence for some years to come. It is of interest here to note that the report of this commission recognized in print for the first time the part that research must play in the educative process.

It was in 1931 that the department of educational research of the Ontario college of education of the University of Toronto was formally set up under Dr. Peter Sandiford. The early function of this department was to adapt U.S. tests of intelligence and achievement and to construct new ones for use in Canadian schools. With a moderate growth in staff, research activities were expanded into the areas of finance, the nature of learning, and experimental methodology.

Under the direction of Dr. R. W. B. Jackson since 1957, the department of educational research has assumed several important roles and functions. While remaining a branch of the university, it has also become a research organization for The Department of Education, an independent centre originating its own projects, a data processing unit, and a consultative authority for other organizations in the province. Dr. Jackson's department has demonstrated the value of research and has provided worthwhile guidance for educational decision-making at all levels of government and among voluntary agencies. It has pointed the way toward sound educational investment. It has given us an indication of what may be expected from a combination of scholarly activity and practical involvement.

Graduate studies and research, of course, go hand in hand. Graduate studies without research is a contradiction in terms. Staff members of the department of educational research played a major part in the work and the education of the school of graduate studies at the University of Toronto, which is provided through the Ontario college of education. During the years, increasing numbers of candidates have graduated with masters' degrees and doctors' degrees in education. They have gone on to posts of leadership in Ontario and in other provinces of this country.

All of the provincial departments of education in Canada, and almost all of the major colleges and faculties of education throughout this country, number among their key officials, holders of advanced degrees from the Ontario college of education, University of Toronto. A recent count showed that 137 staff members of Ontario teachers' colleges hold at least one such graduate degree, as do three of every four municipally employed Ontario directors of education.

But with the explosion of knowledge in all fields, together with an unprecedented expansion of our total educational enterprise, it has become urgent to have substantial expansion in resources for graduate study in education. The time has therefore come to build a greater structure on the foundation of the department of educational research and the school of graduate studies of the Ontario college of education.

The proposed legislation will enable the Minister of Education to name a board of governors for the Ontario institute for studies and education. Members of this board will represent the major educational enterprises and interests in the province, including the teachers, trustees, universities and The Department of Education. The institute will be largely supported by public funds.

It is this government's view that such an institute will provide an atmosphere where first-rate scholars will conduct investigations into educational problems of all kinds. In the tradition of the department of educational research, they will be aware of the needs of the educational system at every level. They will be able to devote themselves to the improvement of education, both through basic research and through the application of their efforts to questions of immediate practical interest.

The institute will be organized into several divisions. One division will concentrate on studies of the characteristics of the learner and of the nature of the learning process; another will be concerned with the discovery and evaluation of the most effective instructional techniques and practices. Still another will deal with administrative and financial problems. A planning division will project school enrolments into the future, and will determine the supply and demand for teachers from kindergarten to university. It will also look at social, economic and cultural changes and attempt to determine their impact on education. A measurement division will be concerned with the development of an increased range of aptitude, achievement and personality tests for school use. An information division will study the implication of recent developments in data systems, and the historical and the philosophical, sociological and anthropological foundations of education will also receive attention.

Field services will be provided so that expert knowledge can be supplied to school boards and other agencies undertaking educational research projects. An information service will be developed in which the most modern techniques will be used to make educational information available to all who need or can make use of it.

As resources of staff are added by recruitment from other provinces and countries, as well as by internal training, a rapid expansion of the programme of graduate studies will be possible.

Students with a master's or doctor's degree in education will be able to work in close association with expert researchers and to relate their own projects to a comprehensive pattern of study. Thus research and instruction will be combined under the best possible circumstances. More highly educated teachers, principals; inspectors and officials will ensure a continuing elevation of educational standards and aspirations to meet the growing demand placed by society on our educational programme.

Arrangements are being made whereby the University of Toronto will supervise the programmes of graduate instruction and award the postgraduate degrees. Eventually the institute may move from affiliation with the university for this purpose to complete independence. Whether or not it has organizational independence, the institute is expected to co-operate closely, not only with the University of Toronto, but with all Ontario universities as well as with secondary and elementary training institutions.

Staff exchange for varying periods will be arranged, and frequent consultation will ensure an interdisciplinary approach to the solution of educational problems.

It is expected that the new institute will make sufficient appeal to the Ontario curriculum institute that a merger can be arranged. We understand that the latter body would welcome such a development.

During the immediate future provincial funds for the support of educational research and postgraduate study will be concentrated in the one institute. The most urgent task is to develop a single, strong centre for these activities rather than dissipating resources among a number of institutions.

It will be one of the objectives of the institute to help set up and to recognize courses that fit into its own instructional programme in whatever parts of the province qualified instructors may be found. Eventually these may be the first steps in the development of independent programmes, if the number of students justifies such a development.

As a means of implementing its research findings, the institute will lean heavily on publications. It will also develop a programme of seminars, workshops, short courses and other forms of in-service training. These will supplement formal pre-service training and will establish the means for teachers to engage in continuous professional improvement.

The first director—of course, if this bill is passed—will be Dr. R. W. B. Jackson, who is widely known as the most outstanding educational researcher in Canada. The availability of a man of his calibre and reputation, I think provides one of the best possible guarantees of success of the institute during its formative years. Under his leadership, Mr. Speaker, the institute should become one of the main pillars of education in Ontario and I would suggest perhaps, in fact, in all of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister a question?

Mr. Speaker: It is not really the time to do so, but I will allow the hon. member a short question.

Mr. Young: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

This question is, does the hon. Minister expect this institute to be set up this year, and if so, what budgetary provision is being made for it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We can get into this in some detail on second reading, but we anticipate that it will be set up this year and it will mean a substantial financial contribution as far as the government is concerned.

THE ONTARIO WATER RESOURCES COMMISSION ACT

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Ontario Water Resources Commission Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Financial Administration Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, there are three major amendments to The Financial Administration Act.

The first two amendments have been suggested by an investigation of the organization and methods services branch of The Treasury Department on the instructions of the Treasury board. These amendments concern internal practices of The Treasury Department with respect to financial administration. They will tend to bring The Financial Administration Act into line with current practice.

The amendment to section 34, also in accordance with the recommendation of the Treasury board, increases the amount of delivery on hand with the Queen's printer from $650,000 to $1 million. This is really a provision for inventory.

Section 62 of The Financial Administration Act was amended to enable Ontario to recognize the claims of the government of Canada against persons to whom Ontario owes money, and to extend the context to the Crown agencies. This amendment has been necessitated for several reasons, one of which is the fact that the federal government collects the provincial income tax. This amendment is pursuant to the recommendation made by the Treasury board meeting last June.

THE CORPORATIONS TAX ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Corporations Tax Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, the major amendment to The Corporations Tax Act reflects the changes in the federal Income Tax Act as they apply to the taxable income of corporations for the current fiscal year.

In addition, the Act provides that the same measure of incentive be given to corporations in what are referred to as "designated areas," as has been provided under the federal Income Tax Act. The areas covered by this legislation would be identical with those provided in the federal tax regulations.

THE LOGGING TAX ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Logging Tax Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, the only amendment to The Logging Tax Act is one concerning its administration. Section 34 of the Act is amended to permit the communication of information obtained under this Act to either federal or provincial jurisdictions on a reciprocal basis. That is, as long as information communicated is used by such jurisdictions for purposes of administration of its taxing statutes, and as long as similar information is available to this jurisdiction, such information can be exchanged.

THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1961-1962

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Income Tax Act, 1961-1962.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, beginning with January 1, 1962, all Canadian provinces imposed a provincial tax on income of individual residents in the province. The rate of the provincial tax is a percentage of the federal tax payable as computed under the federal Income Tax Act. The rate for Ontario was 19 per cent of the federal tax for 1965 and 21 per cent for 1966.

Section 33 of the federal Income Tax Act provided for a deduction from tax payable, equal to the tax paid to the province. In 1964, section 33 of the federal Act was amended to permit a deduction of 21 per cent of the federal tax payable for 1965 and 24 per cent for 1966. The amendment to The Income Tax Act now being introduced increases the rate to coincide with the federal abatement. The tax burden on the individual is not in any way increased by the proposed amendment, although the net revenue to the province is.

THE RETAIL SALES TAX ACT, 1960-1961

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Retail Sales Tax Act, 1960-1961.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, several amendments have been made to The Retail Sales Tax Act, although they are all of a minor nature and deal primarily with administration. There has been no increase in the tax, although further exemptions have been made under it. Sections have been clarified to indicate exactly what is required by a vendor or purchaser.

An exemption has been granted to the Ontario cancer treatment and research foundation, so that it can purchase hospital equipment free of tax.

An important amendment to the Act is the exclusion of tobacco products. The Tobacco Act will be introduced at the current session and will pick up this exemption.

THE SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Succession Duty Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, the amendment in this bill has six purposes: To ensure that superannuation, pension and death benefits, and the whole amount of group insurance proceeds will be taxed on a uniform basis; to exempt from duty, retirement savings plans registered under the federal Income Tax Act and trust deed investment funds where the deceased dies domiciled outside Ontario; to extend the exemption at present given to charitable organizations that carry on their work in Ontario, to charitable organizations that carry on their work in Canada; to increase from $1,500 to $2,500 the amount which may be paid without the Treasurer's consent out of the deceased's bank account; to extend the time in which a refund of duty may be made, after an amount purporting to be in full settlement of the duty has been paid, from one year to four years.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to direct the following question to the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond):

Is the salary scale for attendants at Oakridge hospital at Penetanguishene lower than that for custodial officers at Guelph? If so, why? Are there any plans for increasing the salary scale at Oakridge?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the hon. member's question is, yes, the salary scale for attendants at Oakridge is lower than that of custodial officers at Guelph.

The remainder of the question, sir, I am not in a position to answer, since these matters lie within the purview of The Department of Civil Service. My department, as I am quite sure the hon. member knows, has not the responsibility to set wage and salary scales. This is done by The Department of Civil Service and the question should rightly be directed to that department.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Scarborough West had a question and was not present. Would he care to ask it today?

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I had a question of the hon. Minister of Health, relating to government policy on collective bargaining in the nursing profession. I wonder if the hon. Minister has reached a decision on that matter?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no. The matter is still under consideration.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to introduce to the House a man who is sitting under the press gallery, the Hon. Menachem Begin.

Mr. Begin is leader of Israel's second largest political party. He is leader of the Opposition in the Israeli government. He has a long record in the history of Israel. He was one of the most active leaders in the war of liberation and it is said that he is the inspiration for the leading character in that famous book and film known as Exodus.

I think it is fitting that we recognize Mr. Begin this afternoon, because today is the 17th anniversary of the founding of Israel, that bastion of democracy—if I may put it that way—in the Middle East. I am sure all hon. members of the House would join with me in offering to Mr. Begin, and his country, continued success in the life of this very young and very new and very important country of the world.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE CHILD WELFARE ACT, 1965

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare) moves second reading of Bill No. 119, The Child Welfare Act, 1965.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Speaker, is there any great urgency in putting this bill on today? It is comparatively new on the order paper.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Copies came up yesterday and the Opposition, of course, has had a copy since the bill was introduced last Friday. I am in no particular rush to push on with the bill. On the other hand, I thought it was logical in the development of the business of the House for it to be given second reading at this time. It will, of course, have to go to committee some time next week. If this is going to cause the Opposition any embarrassment, I would be quite prepared to put it over for consideration at some more convenient time.

Mr. Oliver: I would say, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances it does cause the Opposition embarrassment and I wish my hon. friend—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am always prepared to recognize the embarrassment of the Opposition. We will recall that order of business.

Mr. Oliver: Knowing something of it himself, he is prepared to recognize it in others.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It was printed and in the books yesterday.

Mr. Oliver: The ink is not dry on it yet.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, just to set the record straight, I do believe the bill was printed and placed in the bill books yesterday. I do not press the point, because I think it is a very good piece of legislation and I hope it will be well and thoroughly debated here. I have no wish that it receive anything except the fullest treatment by the hon. members of this House, so I am quite pleased to leave it over, if this is what the hon. member wants.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I would merely point out that I believe the hon. Prime Minister was out of the House at the end of the day yesterday. It is customary procedure to advise the members of the House of second readings that are imminent. I do not believe that was done at adjournment yesterday and that is why it is perhaps an embarrassing situation. We would be ready if there was so much as an indication a day ahead.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I asked that it be mentioned yesterday. I was not in the House at the end of the business session. If it was not mentioned, then I can perhaps understand the Opposition's embarrassment.

Mr. Speaker, I would then like to call the fifth order, which is second reading of Bill No. 44.

POWERS OF EXPROPRIATION GRANTED TO UNIVERSITIES

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General) moves second reading of Bill No. 44, An Act to make uniform the powers of expropriation granted to universities.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could save some time. I would like to say at this time, as information to the hon. members that when the bill comes to committee of the House I propose to add two additional universities to those set out in the bill, namely, Ottawa university and Waterloo university.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the words of the hon. Attorney General, saying that the bill will be amended to include these two universities, because it is on this basis that we had been prepared up to this time to speak against the bill, because certainly no bill that purports to make anything uniform for universities and does not include these two well-established universities is something that we simply could not support. I do feel that this would be a good opportunity to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the Waterloo Lutheran university particularly is very sadly in need of powers of expropriation. I am informed that there are large areas which are privately owned that intrude right into the campus itself and have become very much inflated in value because these powers have not been available up until this time.

Now, we have already discussed in the Legislature the fact that the government is not consistent in its dealings with Waterloo Lutheran. We know that the hon. Minister himself has admitted this inconsistency when he refused to go along with certain moneys that would assist Waterloo Lutheran university in establishing a much needed school of social work.

The impression we get here, and that was certainly carried very strongly in the bill as it was originally worded, was that there seems to be a programme to interfere with the development of the university. It is one that is very difficult to understand indeed. Nevertheless, we are assured by the hon. Attorney General that Waterloo Lutheran and the University of Ottawa will be included by amendment. With this in mind we would not object to the passage of the bill.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): May I inquire, as a matter of principle, from the hon. Attorney General: Since apparently only municipalities are put in a dominant position with respect to universities in the exercise of expropriation powers, how does he conceive that where a municipality owns the land desired by a university, the university will acquire it against the wishes of the municipality?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would think, Mr. Speaker, that if the university is the initiating corporation or body seeking expropriation it will proceed as this Act will provide, by the use of The Expropriation Procedures Act. It is, in this situation, the expropriating authority. If it is a municipality which has proceeded to expropriate, it has certain legal provisos now covering its methods of procedure, of which there are, I believe, three. I see no difficulty and no conflict here.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Attorney General did not understand my question.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps I did not understand it.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the member for Sudbury that this is not the time for questions and answers. We are debating the principle of a bill.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, that is why I began by referring to it as a matter of principle.

Mr. Speaker: The member will please be seated.

The better time to discuss this particular subject matter between the member and the Attorney General would be during the committee stage of the bill or when it reaches the committee to which this bill is referred. This particular time, the second reading, is for debate of the whole bill in principle. I am afraid I cannot allow a question-and-answer period to be conducted.

Mr. Sopha: Sir, I bow in obedience to your wishes. I was just so overwhelmed by the ambiguity of section 2 that I was anxious for an answer.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: Twenty-first order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, when the debate adjourned at 6 p.m. yesterday evening, I was in the midst of discussing the conduct of a magistrate, which I was indicating to the House was not my idea of the method or the manner in which our courts should be conducted. At the particular time when adjournment was moved I was quoting at some length from a transcript of evidence in the case of Leslie Charles Herrell and I had reached the point in reading from that transcript the point at which a witness named Bonneville was being cross-examined by Mr. Kelso, who was counsel for the Crown.

Perhaps, sir, just so that the House will have the continuity of it, I will revert back just a few lines to the beginning of Mr. Kelso's cross-examination. Mr. Bonneville had given his evidence-in-chief and then Mr. Kelso begins his cross-examination:

Q. Had you been drinking?

A. No, sir.

Q. What were you doing at the dance?

A. Dancing.

Q. What was the trouble with the accused to be in the condition he was in?

A. Nothing that I could see.

Q. Was he acting in a normal manner?

A. He wasn't doing nothing.

Q. Was he acting in a normal manner?

A. Dancing, yes.

Q. After, when he was not dancing and he was trying to get out of a locked door; you did not see that, did you?

A. No, I was on the dance floor.

Q. Well, you don't know anything about what you are talking about. The accused had had too much to drink, hadn't he?

A. I don't think so, sir.

Q. You don't think so?

A. No.

Then the magistrate inserts himself back into the picture again and takes over the cross-examination:

The Court: Do you know him?

A. Well, the kind of dances we were doing he would have been falling all over the floor, Your Honour.

Q. Do you know this man?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Does he usually stagger when he walks?

A. No.

Q. Does he usually walk straight?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then if two police officers stand and swear in the witness box that this man was staggering, would you say this is normal for him or would you say this is not normal for him?

A. Not normal.

Q. You heard the officers give their testimony?

A. Yes.

Q. Are you suggesting that the officers are mistaken or lying?

A. No, sir.

I pause at this point, Mr. Chairman, to remind you that this is not the cross-examination by Crown counsel. The Crown counsel, a very capable man, as I explained yesterday, has just been pushed aside and the magistrate has taken over the cross-examination.

Q. Do you have a record?

A. No, sir.

Q. How old are you?

A. Sixteen.

Q. Do you go to school?

A. No, sir.

Q. All right.

The Court has concluded its cross-examination of the witness.

Mr. Shaw: No further witnesses, Your Worship.

The Court: Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, as we go through the last few pages of this transcript, for those in this House who may be at all familiar with legal proceedings I am sure we will see just how irregular and how unusual is the manner in which this trial is being conducted.

Mr. Shaw: Might I address the Court as to the evidence, Your Worship?

The first witness for the Crown, PC Thompson, testified that he observed the witness at a distance of this room away; he saw him stagger; he went over to him and saw the witness and smelled liquor on his breath and on the basis of this he came to the conclusion he was drunk.

PC Molnar said that he saw the witness—
And at that point the Court comes back in again.

The Court: I would appreciate, sir, that when you are summing up the evidence and asking the Court to come to a conclusion on the evidence, you do not misstate the evidence.

Poor young Mr. Shaw! Mr. Shaw had at that point been able to get six lines across in direct context and the magistrate interrupted him and told him that he was misstating the evidence.

Mr. Shaw: I am sorry, Your Worship, I did not intend to.

The Court: The arresting officer said when he saw him across the distance of this room away that he noted that he was staggering. You asked him if he had formed an opinion that the man was drunk at this time and the answer was no, and he stated, in fact, that the time he did form the opinion that the man was drunk was when he had taken hold of the lad and had noted the smell of alcohol, his eyes, and had spoken to him and noted that the man could not give an answer to his questions until they were repeated several times. Now that this is understood, please continue.

So the magistrate not only has conducted the cross-examination, he is conducting the summing up for the defence counsel, and I am sure the defence counsel must have been most appreciative.

Mr. Shaw: My understanding of this, with respect to this court—I do not wish to misconstrue the evidence—was that PC Thompson stated that he smelled liquor on his breath and I do not recall him saying that he engaged in conversation, but if I am mistaken—

And that is as far as he got on this occasion; the magistrate is back in again.

The Court: Thank you. Constable Thompson.

At this point the magistrate interrupts the defence counsel's summing up and calls back into the box a witness who had already given his evidence and had been cross-examined on it. Surely, if there was any doubt, the magistrate should have adopted the procedure that is usual in any court that I have ever been in—if there is any doubt as to what the evidence was, there is a reference made back to the reporter. There was a reporter in this court, because here is a transcript of the evidence. But not with this magistrate—"Stop, Defence Counsel. I am not interested in your summing-up. Bring the witness back and we will ask him some more questions." So back into the box comes PC Thompson.

The witness having been previously called and duly sworn, was called and testified as follows:

And guess who asks him a question? The magistrate, naturally.

Q. You are still under oath, sir. Did you, or did you not, in this witness box, tell us that you came to the conclusion that the accused man was drunk after you took hold of the lad and had spoken to him and he was unable to give an answer to the question and that you repeated the question several times?

I cannot think of anything more improper that can or should be done in a trial than this sort of thing. The evidence was in and there is no way of reopening the evidence at this stage in a trial. If there was any doubt about what the evidence was in anybody's mind, all he had to do was ask the reporter to refer back to his notes and have it read over again. Then the magistrate puts this five-line question to the witness. What do you think the policeman said?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Shaw: I stand corrected, Your Worship. I would state that PC Molnar, in his testimony, stated that he did not at all speak to the accused but he formed his conclusion on the basis of the manner in which the accused was walking.

Mr. Shaw did pretty well that time; he got in four-and-a-half lines.

The Court: And?

Mr. Shaw: His eyes. Right?

The Court: Right.

Poor young Mr. Shaw could not get half a sentence out without the Court telling him what to say and how to say it.

Mr. Shaw: I would say that after several hours of rock and roll dancing, and the accused has pleaded guilty to the charge of a minor consuming liquor, that it would be quite understandable that a person's eyes might be bloodshot after him being on the dance floor for several hours. I would state further that the officers did not testify that they asked the accused to perform any of the standard tests.

The Court: What standard tests?

Mr. Shaw: Such as walking a straight line.

The Court: Standard tests for what? Do you mean the standard tests to determine drunkenness?

Mr. Shaw: Yes.

The Court: It would seem to me that since the man was charged with being drunk in a public place—

It would seem to me that since the man was charged with being drunk in a public place, this was a reasonable reference that Mr. Shaw was making, but not in the the court's mind.

The Court: Or do you mean to determine the evidence brought before a court on a charge of driving while one's ability was so impaired by the use of alcohol or of drugs?

What a fatuous statement that one is! The essence of the test in this sense of the case, whether used on an ability impaired charge or a drunken driving charge or being drunk in a public place, is whether or not the individual charged was drunk or under the influence. Here the young law student suggested that there were no tests and the magistrate took great exception.

They are not standards to decide whether a man is drunk, or if they are standard enough to decide on a charge for drunken driving or ability impaired, why are they not standards when a man is being charged for being drunk in a public place? They are not standards to decide whether a man is drunk, on a charge of being drunk in a public place, or I have not heard of these tests on such a charge.

I think he gave the answer himself; there are many things that this gentleman has not heard of.

Mr. Shaw: I would state simply, Your Worship, that in conclusion, the evidence is not contradicted. The accused was on the dance floor for some length of time and was able to perform the dances.

The Court: Do you wish to say anything, Mr. Kelso?

Mr. Kelso: No, but if he had been drinking it would have made him drunker much faster.

The Court: Stand up. There will be a conviction on both charges.

Mr. Kelso: Apparently no previous record.

The Court: Sentence.

Mr. Shaw: Your Worship, might I ask that since the accused has pleaded guilty to the charge of consuming liquor, and this being apparently the first offence, he not be given a serious fine too burdensome on a youth of his age?

The Court: Twenty years old.

Mr. Kelso: He is not a baby.

Mr. Shaw: He is not a baby, but he does not have any criminal record and this is his first offence and I would ask that he be treated as such.

The Court: What?

Mr. Shaw: This being a first offence I would ask that he be treated as a first offender.

The Court: He will be treated as a first offender.

Mr. Kelso: I just wanted to remark on one thing. I have no sympathy for these people, these youngsters who go to school dances and mess up the dances by drinking.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to pay particular attention to the Court's next remarks:

The Court: Mr. Herrell—that is the accused:

—you will have to explain to this court some very good reason why you were drinking at a public school dance, because right now, sir, you are going to get an extremely heavy penalty.

The accused, as is his right and in the presence of counsel, has gone through the trial and not gone into the witness box, and here in plain and simple words, the magistrate instructs him to go into the witness box. Look what happens to him when he goes in:

The Accused: Well, Your Honour, I went to the dance and I had a couple of drinks there, and I went into the dance and we were supposed to meet our girl friends there, and they didn't show up until later, and so we were dancing and we came back and they came down to the dance later on and we started dancing with them.

The Court: Who came in?

The Accused: My girl friend and one of the witnesses' girl friend.

The Court: The other witnesses said they never showed up.

They are having a second trial. The trial has already taken place. The magistrate has found the accused guilty. He has forced the accused into the witness box and now he is cross-examining him apparently in relationship to sentence. What right has any magistrate to do this?

The Court: The other witnesses said they never showed up.

The Accused: They showed up later on in the night because they were there then when we got arrested by the arresting officer.

The Court: All right.

The Accused: There were a couple of fellows there sitting on the bench. They called the girl I was with.

The Court: Why were you drinking at this place and why were you at this place in the first instance?

With the greatest respect to the magistrate, what business was it of his? The accused was there, he was charged with being drunk in a public place—the sort of case that any magistrate deals with, particularly in Metropolitan Toronto, hundreds of times a week. The standard fine is $10 or ten days, and look at the production that is made of it.

The Accused: Well, sir, we go to all the dances there.

The Court: You do. And do you drink at all the dances there?

The Accused: No.

The Court: Are there public school children at these dances?

The Accused: Well, pretty well all 15 years of age and over.

The Court: And you are 20?

The Accused: Yes.

He has already pleaded guilty himself, to drinking under age. The evidence has already indicated that he is 20.

The Court: When I was sitting, in the middle of winter, there was a dance; and by reason of wise guys coming there and drinking there was a 13-year-old girl found lying spreadeagled naked in the snow on a night that the temperature was 18 degrees, and that was the last dance ever held there. I can tell you Mr. Herrell that I am going to set this down for sentence until I hear another case, because it may very well be that the sentence on you might be excessive. Get in that box there.

I do not think that any words of mine can add to the words of the Court. There is a reference to a very serious and a horrible incident that took place in another jurisdiction at another time and His Worship sees fit to bring this up in his remarks when the only charge he is dealing with is a charge of being drunk in a public place—two charges—and the charge of drinking under age.

There is no evidence—I have read the record, the complete record—there is no evidence at all that there was any fighting or quarrelling or attacking of girls or bothering of girls. All there is, is evidence of drinking.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Some people do not think drunk—

Mr. Singer: I quite agree with my hon. friend. Some people do not think drunkenness should even be an offence at all.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): It would get some of our best citizens.

Mr. Singer: To continue with this case:

Upon resuming:

Mr. Kelso: Maybe we could deal with Herrell now.

The Court: Any further representations, Mr. Shaw?

Well, I am glad he recognized Mr. Shaw was still around.

Mr. Shaw: I have nothing further to add, except that I might ask that the court ask Mr. Herrell what he can pay. This is perhaps a little bit irregular, Your Worship, but since time cannot be allowed in the circumstances, he has come with as much money as he can raise.

The Court: The amount of money in the prisoner's pocket is not a valid procurance for the setting of a sentence.

On the charge of drinking under age you are fined $100 or you are going to jail for 15 days. On the charge of being drunk you are fined $30 or ten days, consecutive.

I can only say, that you should be thoroughly ashamed of yourself.

There, Mr. Chairman, is the transcript.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, on a point or order, would the hon. member permit a short question?

Mr. Singer: Yes.

Mr. S. Lewis: Did the case go to appeal, and if so, what was the result?

Mr. Singer: I am not aware whether or it was appealed and I do not know.

The record is a court record and it speaks for itself. As I went through this transcript, Mr. Chairman, you will recall that the magistrate passed this case on for trial, apparently, the first time. There is no mention in the transcript that the accused had ever appeared before the court before. He was denied a remand.

The accused was being defended, I would think, by a very young and inexperienced law student who was not too sure how he should approach or deal with the magistrate. There was a refusal, completely without justification, for the remand.

There was this simply onerous and fantastic sentence for a first offence. A fine of $100 for drinking under age; and a $30 fine for being drunk in a public place.

There was a complete and utter neglect of courtroom decorum. There was a complete and absolute ignoring of respect for the law, interruptions and remarks and cross-examinations by the magistrate. Questions as to whether or not the witness had criminal records. Sing out your criminal record, he said. Sing it out. There were his interruptions in the summing up of the defence counsel, taking it over; his recalling witnesses, his leading the witnesses in question and not referring back to the record.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): I think I should at this time interrupt my hon. friend to set straight one remark that he has just made. In all fairness to the magistrate on the remark that the magistrate forced this hearing on for trial, the record is that the accused, Herrell, was charged and he appeared on November 14. He was remanded. He had no counsel. He was remanded to November 19, when he returned again and was remanded—he was again without counsel—he was remanded to the 20th and that remand was peremptory.

So I think that whatever may be said of the magistrate's conduct, we should have the facts correct. This accused did appear on the 14th, he was remanded to the 19th. He did not have counsel on either date. Whether he was able to obtain counsel or not does not appear. He was then told that his case would be heard on November 20 and that was made peremptory, which meant he must be ready to go on. So let us at least keep the record straight.

In answer to the question that was asked by the other hon. member, as far as I have been able to ascertain no application was ever made for appeal.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I think my remark was that insofar as the record indicates this was the first appearance. I was not aware of the additional information that the hon. Attorney General has given and I accept that as being correct. But there is nothing in the record that indicates this was anything more than the first appearance.

The lack of respect for the law, the interruptions of counsel when he was summing up, taking over of witnesses, the berating of witnesses; and above all the inexcusable reference, the completely inexcusable reference, to an incident that had happened in another place, which had absolutely no bearing, could have no bearing on the case with which His Worship was dealing; and the severity of sentence are the points I question.

Here was a young man, he made a mistake. He pleaded guilty to drinking under age and probably there is enough evidence to find him guilty. I am not arguing that and I do not think this is the place to argue whether the finding is correct or incorrect. I think the sentence speaks for itself.

There is the record, and it speaks for itself.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that since this matter has begun to be talked about in the press I have received numerous phone calls from many citizens who have come into contact with this gentleman. Some of the stories they have told me are simply hair-raising. I am not going to repeat anything I got over the phone, because I would not have had an opportunity to check nor would I be able to satisfy myself that the person I talked to was not perhaps making up a story.

But I have received some letters and I am just going to read an extract from this one, without mentioning the lady's name. Her name is here and the hon. Attorney General can see the letter if he wants, but here is what she says:

I am writing you this letter that you requested—

As I say, Mr. Chairman, as I received these phone calls I asked the people phoning me to write to me about it so that I would have the statement in their own writing and with their own signature on it. This action is in regard to Magistrate Dnieper:

Last summer as we were walking up on our street after parking our car, this man, that resides near us came up to us for no apparent reason and hit my husband. It seemed that he did not agree with the place that my husband had picked for parking his car. He claimed that we were obstructing the driveway. It was not his driveway.

The attack was unexpected and very savage. We called a police officer and he then told us to charge him with assault.

So the next day we went to room 55 at the city hall. Then came the court day my husband was called up to testify. He showed the cuts on his eyes and his chin, but Magistrate Dnieper seemed not to care at all about the case.

Then my husband said I had witnessed the attack. Well, he just mentioned for me to go up. I told of what I had seen and also that the man was quite drunk. Then, as I was speaking, Magistrate Dnieper hollered—and it is underlined twice:

—at me and said: "I've seen you appear before me many a time for different things. I know you quite well."

I then said: "I am sorry, Your Honour, you are making a mistake."

But he interrupted me and said: "Don't tell me that." And then I stepped down. I was so ashamed I could have died.

Then she relates to evidence that is given by other people and the disposal of the charge which I do not think is important. She tells me who she is and her relationship to several prominent people in this city. I am not going to mention that.

We have three children, two in school. My husband—

She tells me his job and what she does.

One consolation about this case was that it was not publicized because of my family connections.

But one thing about this Mr. Dnieper, after watching three cases before ours going before him, this man does not belong on the bench at all. This man laughs openly at people appearing before him. He was slouched in his chair, playing with a pencil.

After being in that courtroom I stopped believing in justice.

Then she concludes by saying:

I am not bitter any more about what happened to us, but I cannot help but think of the injustices caused by the irresponsible magistrate.

And she talked to me at some length in our telephone conversation. This was the first time she had ever been in court in her life.

I have a copy of a long telegram here from a gentleman, sent to a former Attorney General, not to this hon. gentleman, dealing with a similar series of complaints. This one seems to touch more on the evidence and the magistrate's opinion of the evidence, but his comments about the magistrate are quite bitter. I am not going to bother to read that into the record at length.

Mr. Chairman, let us leave Magistrate Dnieper for the moment.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Are you not going to make some sort of a charge yourself, surely after all that—

Mr. Singer: My hon. friend, if you will be patient, before I sit down I will have several suggestions to offer to the government in connection with this and with the second matter about which I am going to speak. I thought, rather than hear the same summary twice, the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests would like to hear it only once, because the summary will be the same in connection with both cases.

The second matter I want to deal with is the action in one particular incident of Magistrate O. C. McClevis, who is the magistrate sitting in magistrates' court in the county of Bruce. The hon. Attorney General is fully aware of this matter. Correspondence has been exchanged with him; I have copies of that correspondence. The information I have here is known to the hon. Attorney General.

This incident begins with a fatal accident which took place in the county of Bruce on September 7, 1963. Two vehicles came into collision. At least one person, possibly two, were killed as a result of this collision. The driver of one car was killed, the driver of the second emerged apparently unhurt. He was charged—the driver of the second car, Francis Noah Strader—was charged with careless driving as a result of the accident.

The trial came on before His Worship Magistrate McClevis on August 10, 1964, in the county court house at Walkerton. I have the transcript here in my hand. I am not going to bother to read it into the record at length. I am just going to make some brief references to it, but the transcript is here.

The Crown's evidence consisted of the evidence given by two witnesses. One was Constable Andrew Shepski, a provincial police constable who was the police officer who investigated the accident after it had taken place. As a result of the accident he had been summoned. He made the usual investigation, took the usual measurements, took photographs and so on, examined the vehicles and he gave his evidence as to what he found as a result of his examination.

The only other evidence that came before the court was that given by the widow of the driver of the other vehicle, who stated that she really could not recall what had happened at the time of the accident. On the basis of the evidence, as he saw it, the magistrate convicted the accused of careless driving and fined him $300 and suspended his licence for the period of one year.

Mr. Strader was advised by his counsel—and I should say Mr. Strader was defended by counsel at that trial—Mr. Strader was advised by his counsel that in his counsel's opinion the magistrate should not have convicted and he recommended to Mr. Strader that he bring an appeal in the usual way to the county court judge.

Mr. Strader thought that this was a reasonable idea, but he wanted some time to consider it. Mr. Strader was most concerned, being a farmer and being engaged, as I understand it, in the trucking business to a minor extent—he hauled gravel and that sort of thing. He was most concerned with the suspension of his licence for the period of a year. I think this bothered him very seriously, because he felt that his ability to earn a living would be seriously curtailed.

An affidavit setting out the facts of this incident, dated September 29 and sworn by Mr. Strader, was forwarded to the hon. Attorney General on October 7, 1964. I am not going to read the whole of the affidavit into the record, but substantially it outlines the details that I have already given you and it indicates that on August 17—I may say, sir, there is one portion of the transcript that I should read. I can summarize it perhaps equally as well.

Magistrate McClevis actually dealt with this matter on two occasions. First on August 10 when he found the accused guilty and gave him the sentence which I have mentioned. Then when the suggestion was made that there be time given to pay, the magistrate said: "I am reversing the sentence, he will be remanded one week for sentence."

On August 17, the then guilty man came back and the same sentence was, in fact, given. The magistrate had given the sentence, reversed it, remanded the guilty man one week for sentence and on August 17 confirmed the original sentence.

Mr. Strader, on August 17, when he appeared before the magistrate with his counsel, gave his chauffeur's permit to Police Officer Andrew Shepski, "who requested it from me for the purpose of handing it to His Worship, Magistrate McClevis." That particular incident is of some substantial importance.

Then, as I say, discussions took place about the advisability of an appeal and Strader expressed his great concern about his loss of a licence and began to wonder if there was any way the loss of the licence could perhaps be changed. A series of discussions took place. There were interviews with the magistrate, and with other people, and on August 28 Mr. Strader was given back the licence, this document—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): On August 28, that was 11 days after sentence.

Mr. Singer: That is right. That is exactly right.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: If the licence was suspended for one year why would he give him back the licence?

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister is getting to the point of the story very quickly. These are the questions that puzzled me very much.

The licence came back into his possession. It is a very interesting licence, because on the first line—and all of you gentlemen have licences; you, Mr. Chairman, I am sure must have examined yours. Inside there is a little place where, if you are unfortunate enough to have been convicted, there is space for details of it to be written down. I am sure it would not happen to you, sir, but if it happens to other people, this is how it works.

If you look at this particular licence, and it is here, there was writing on the first and second lines on the back of it. The writing has been rather amateurishly erased and it takes very little ingenuity to discover that the words that were erased are "17 August, 1964," under conviction date; under offences, "Section 60(a)," and under court location, "Walkerton."

Having received his licence back, Mr. Strader went to his counsel and said, "No point going on with the appeal, I have my licence back. Why go to the extra expense?" His counsel said, "Well, let's have a look at the licence." At this time the discovery was made of the writing and the erasure.

His counsel said, "In my opinion this is a most unusual procedure. I don't think it is a proper procedure. It is my opinion that you would be well advised not to drive because your licence has in fact been suspended and you might well be in breach of some of our statutes if you drive on the road while you are under a year's suspension."

Well, Mr. Strader, rightly worried about it, talked with officials of The Department of Transport; he talked with some friends of his on the metropolitan police force. They confirmed his view, that this was a most unusual procedure, in fact they had never heard of it. The suggestion was made that someone investigate with The Department of Transport and see if they had a record of the conviction. Lo and behold, it comes to light that on September 15, there was forwarded from Walkerton to The Department of Transport, notice of the suspension of Mr. Strader's licence for the period of a year. It was there and it was on the record and I imagine it was still on the record until it was subsequently dealt with.

As I say, this caused some real concern in the mind of Mr. Strader's counsel and he prepared for Mr. Strader this affidavit setting out these facts prior to the appeal being heard and he said to the hon. Attorney General, "Mr. Attorney General, in my opinion there has been a serious irregularity in this case and I would ask that you do something about it."

The next point in the chain of events—and that letter went forward on October 6, it is important to note—before His Honour Judge P. S. McKenzie, who is the county court judge of the county of Bruce, the appeal was brought against Andrew Shepski, the respondent informant. He was the police officer who laid the complaint. The appeal was made by Francis Noah Strader. And the order of His Honour Judge P. S. McKenzie is this:

Upon motion made under this court on this day by way of appeal from, and to set aside, the conviction of the appellant for operating a motor vehicle upon a highway, carelessly on or about September 3, 1963, contrary to the provisions of Section 60 of The Highway Traffic Act, made by His Worship McClevis, magistrate in and for the province of Ontario, on August 17, 1964, at the town of Walkerton, in the presence of counsel for the appellant and the informant, upon reading the information of the said conviction now on file with the clerk of this Court, upon hearing the evidence adduced and counsel aforesaid:

1. This Court doth order and adjudge the said conviction be, and the same is hereby, quashed and that this appeal be, and the same is hereby, allowed without costs.

2. And this Court doth further order and adjudge the fine and costs paid by the appellant in the magistrate's court and the deposit paid as security for appeal be forthwith paid to the appellant—

That is Mr. Strader.

—and suspension of the appellant's driving privileges is lifted.

Now mark you, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I was just going to ask: Was there a period of a year or 13 months between the accident and the first court case?

Mr. Singer: No, no. This was all within a period of months.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: 1963, and then 1964, right at the heading of the judge's order.

Mr. Singer: The first trial was August 17, 1964.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: But read the heading of the document you have in your hand now—

Mr. Singer: October, 1964, just a few weeks later.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes.

Mr. Singer: Well, a month and a half later. The accident was on September 7, 1963, the trial before the magistrate was on—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: 1963?

Mr. Singer: That is right. Then the trial came in August. There were many adjournments and remands and so on. The trial came in August of the next year. Then the appeal in October of 1964. Yes.

But it should be noted, Mr. Chairman, about this appeal, that there was counsel for the Crown—I would imagine it was the Crown attorney who appeared on behalf of the policeman informant—and there was counsel for the accused. And there is no mention in here—in fact, quite to the contrary, it is quite obvious in here that it was the impression of His Honour Judge P. S. McKenzie that on the date that he allowed this appeal and gave his order accordingly and this order was signed—this is the original order of the court, and it is signed by the clerk for the county court of the county of Bruce, and entered in the usual way in the proper books. The order is that the suspension of the appellant's driving privileges be lifted. So there appears to be no question in the minds of all who were in the court that the magistrate's sentence had been to suspend the licence for a year.

On October 7 the affidavit that I referred to was forwarded to the hon. Attorney General with the advice that the appeal had been taken and allowed. And the hon. Attorney General was asked if he would inquire into the matter. On October 13 the hon. Attorney General acknowledged receipt of the letter enclosing the affidavit and wrote:

You will understand that I wish to receive some comment upon this matter by the Crown attorney and other persons associated with the matter before expressing an opinion to you. When I am more fully informed about the situation I will contact you.

On October 19 the hon. Attorney General's letter of October 13 is acknowledged and Strader's lawyer awaited the hon. Attorney General's reply after his investigation.

On November 13, a month later, a further letter was addressed to the hon. Attorney General asking him if he had any comment yet. On December 11, another letter went forward to the hon. Attorney General, pointing out that some time had elapsed since the acknowledgement was received from him and he had as yet given no opinion.

On December 15 a letter was received, signed by Mr. Dick, who is associate deputy Attorney General, acknowledging receipt of the correspondence and saying that he had discussed it in detail with Mr. A. A. Russell the assistant deputy Attorney General and inspector of legal offices who had been in touch with several of the persons involved in the matter and was continuing his investigation, and further:

I have asked him to get in touch with you as soon as he has all the material that he feels he requires to properly advise you.

A letter dated December 17 was received, signed by Mr. Russell, the assistant deputy Attorney General saying:

I have received further information concerning the Francis Noah Strader situation and have referred the complete file to Chief Magistrate Klein for his attention. He will be getting in touch with you direct.

On March 1, no further word having been heard, another letter went forward to the hon. Attorney General suggesting, among other things, that the writer was most anxious to receive a reply as a result of the Attorney General's investigation, and commenting that he had spoken to Magistrate Klein and suggested—and this is in the letter received by the hon. Attorney General dated March 1:

Magistrate Klein then inquired of your writer as to what your writer thought Magistrate Klein should do about the situation. Your writer made certain suggestions and Magistrate Klein advised your writer that the adverse publicity concerning Magistrate McClevis would, of necessity, be harmful to the whole system of justice at the magistrate's court level and therefore was to be avoided—and that, in any event, he did not think—because of his just having been appointed chief magistrate and therefore having a minimum of experience in that position in comparison with most other magistrates—that he was in a position to go about criticizing other magistrates on the manner in which they conducted themselves in court.

A letter was received from the hon. Attorney General dated March 15, acknowledging the letter of March 1—this was almost six months from the time the correspondence started—and the hon. Attorney General said:

I am as concerned as you are as to any misconduct on the part of any officer engaged in the administration of justice and for this reason I am today advising the chief magistrate to investigate the matter.

Now the hon. Attorney General said that on March 15, but you will recall that Mr. Russell said on December 17 that he was referring to Magistrate Klein. Now, either the hon. Attorney General was misinformed or Magistrate Klein had to get a couple of references before he moved into high gear. The letter continues:

I am sure you will agree with me that the chief magistrate should carry out this phase of the resolution of the difficulties since it would be unusual, if not improper, for me to review the decision of a judicial officer.

When Mr. Klein has completed his investigation and reviewed the material completely, I have directed him to discuss the matter with me and let me have the report, together with his recommendation. I do not feel that a meeting with you—the writer suggested a meeting:

—at this time would be appropriate.

Then, finally, sir, on April 2, a letter dated April 2 is sent forward, signed by the hon. Attorney General which sets out his apparent view of this situation. I am going to quote at some length from this:

The chief magistrate for Ontario has now had an exhaustive conference with Magistrate McClevis and Mr. McNabb—who figures in this to some extent:

—respecting the matters which were set out in the affidavit of Mr. Strader and other matters which you have raised in your correspondence with this department. I have considered the report of the chief magistrate and I have also considered the material which he has enclosed with his report.

Magistrate McClevis has no recollection of any writing on the back of this particular licence, and he emphatically denies that he either wrote upon the licence or, more particularly, erased any writing.

Mr. McNabb has no knowledge of any erasure and he states that he did not look at the licence nor examine it for any writing thereon.

Well, the fact remains, sir, that on August 17 the licence was handed to the police constable in the court and about ten days later it was given back. There is sworn evidence before the hon. Attorney General that when it came back it was in the condition as it now is and it is obvious that there has been an erasure on this licence. It has been a very amateurish type of erasure. If you study it quite hard you can see what the erased words were.

I am not suggesting that I know who put the writing on or who erased it; I have no idea, but I would suggest that it would have been and could have been and should have been a very simple matter to find out who did it, because it went into the hands of the policeman on August 17 and it came back to Strader on August 24. In that period of time it should be very simple for anyone experienced in investigating anything to find out where the licence went until it got back to Strader—the simplest sort of an investigation that I think that anyone trained in investigation would be required to do. The letter goes on:

It appears from the material before me on that day that following the imposition of the sentence on Mr. Strader, the accused attended upon the magistrate in his office—and I think this is quite correct and is contained in the affidavit:

—at which time he made a most impassioned plea for the return of his driving privileges—and I think this is correct, too, but I think that the hon. Attorney General would agree with me that at this time it was too late. The magistrate had done his job; he was, as we say in law, punctus officio—he was finished with it. He heard the case; he gave the conviction; he made the sentence and he was through with it. If there was any further remedy it had to be done through appeal procedures as was later done.

At that time the magistrate had Mr. Strader's licence and had made no endorsement whatever on it, nor had the particulars of any conviction been typed on it.

I do not know, as I say, I have no knowledge at all of who did the writing on it. Certainly it was not typewriting, it was handwriting—you can see that, and I am not suggesting that the magistrate did it. I do not know. Then the hon. Attorney General said this:

The magistrate quite properly felt he was still seized of the matter—and with the greatest respect to my hon. friend, I cannot see how he can make that suggestion. How can the magistrate have properly felt, or "quite properly felt," to use the hon. Attorney General's words, that he was seized of the matter? It may be the magistrate's thinking that he was seized of it, but if that was his thinking, I think, sir, and I am sure the hon. Attorney General would agree with me, and I am sure all lawyers in this House will agree with me, that the magistrate, if he felt that, was quite, quite wrong, since he had not endorsed the record. I asked the hon. Attorney General—I am not sure what kind of a record had to be endorsed in this sort of thing—what writing, what record is there? The magistrate hears the evidence, he comes to his conclusion and says, "Strader, you are guilty. I will sentence you in a week," and in a week's time he says, "Strader, you are fined $300 and your licence is suspended for a year," and if that is the end of his docket for the day he gets up and goes home. There is no record to endorse. What record is there to endorse? The record is here in the transcript; this is what is used in the appeal procedure.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): It is sometimes on the summons—he usually endorses the sentence on the information.

Mr. Singer: He has to make a report, yes. And the report follows in due course to The Department of Transport and the Court undoubtedly writes something on the summons or on the piece of paper. But there it is, and here it is on the record. Approximately, on August 21, he decided to alter his decision; and I say, sir, that the hon. Attorney General knows far better than I, that on August 21 the magistrate had no right whatsoever to alter his decision to suspend the licence of the accused. He thereupon delivered the license over to McNabb who was then the solicitor for Strader. Strader, of course, is already familiar with the manner in which his licence was returned to him. The certificate of conviction and the file of The Department of Transport is dated September 15, 1964, so it is there, there is no question about it, which was subsequent to the time the magistrate was considering your client's submission in respect to the suspension of his licence.

Then he says this, which I find most puzzling:

It would appear to me that through an error in the office of the magistrate, the certificate of conviction was ultimately forwarded to The Department of Transport without the correction authorized by the magistrate having been made, insofar as it related to the suspension of the licence.

Now, I am advised, sir, that the staff in the magistrate's office consists of himself and his secretary. It is not a large staff and it is not a complicated staff and the explanation that an error was made—appearing to be a clerical error—is one that I find very hard to accept. If these facts are as the hon. Attorney General states them, can anyone explain to me, sir, how, when on October 6, His Honour Judge P. S. McKenzie heard the appeal and in the presence of the Crown attorney, His Honour Judge McKenzie ordered the suspension of the appellant's driving privileges lifted?

Surely the Crown attorney would have been amongst the first to be informed if there had been any change in the disposal of the case on August 17. Surely that matter would have been forcibly brought to the attention of His Honour P. S. McKenzie? In fact, sir, it was not.

It would appear there was at no time any intent on the part of the magistrate to be other than considerate of the particular problems of your client.

Any magistrate, I would imagine, should be considerate of all people coming before him.

But that as a result of the breakdown in the clerical machinery in his office the appropriate record was not amended to conform with the actual decision of the magistrate.

Well, I say, sir, if the hon. Attorney General really believes that sentence, then I am at a loss to understand his reasoning process. As a result of breakdown of the clerical machinery—that is either the magistrate or his secretary—the appropriate record was not amended to conform with the actual decision of the magistrate.

The actual decision of the magistrate, sir, is in this transcript, and the actual decision of the magistrate is in the order of the county court judge; and either the hon. Attorney General is quite wrong or the transcript is wrong and the Crown attorney was wrong and the county court judge was wrong. I just cannot believe that the matter proceeded to this length and to this point and all those people were wrong and this sentence in the hon. Attorney General's letter is correct.

I understand that the appeal which you undertook on behalf of Mr. Strader was ultimately allowed and the question of the return of the licence is academic insofar as Mr. Strader is concerned.

But I say, sir, it is much more than academic. Just because the original conviction was reversed, surely the procedures that took place in that court in relation to this conviction and in relation to the confusion about the records and in relation to what the magistrate decided and in relation to what was eventually done and in relation to who wrote on the licence and in relation to who erased what was written on the licence and in relation to the advice that was given to The Department of Transport about the fact of the suspension of the licence for the period of one year—are much more than academic.

I can well understand, however, your concern as to the possible alteration of records—and here the hon. Attorney General is just touching on the nub of this thing. This is the matter which concerns me so very seriously:

—in the manner in which you felt was inconsistent with the due administration of justice.

I agree with that view. I think there can be no other possible conclusion in this matter but that an attempt was apparently made to alter records in a manner that is entirely inconsistent with the due administration of justice. The hon. Attorney General goes on to say:

However I trust that the foregoing will allay your suspicions—

Well, the gentleman who gave me this correspondence advises me that his suspicions were not allayed.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, do not stop.

Mr. Singer: No, I am going to read the rest of it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Do not stop in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. Singer: All right.

—will allay your suspicions for I do not feel there has been any improper conduct on the part of the magistrate or his adviser, and that in fact the confusion has arisen because of his desire to give every reasonable benefit of the doubt to your client, Mr. Strader.

That is the end of the sentence. Let me go back to where I started about the words "allay your suspicions."

The gentleman who gave me this correspondence advises me that his suspicions have not been allayed, that he subsequently attended on the hon. Attorney General, discussed it with him, and that further he wrote to him again on May 4, which is just a couple of days ago, and advised the hon. Attorney General that he was not satisfied with his decision which is contained in the last paragraph of the letter. He thought perhaps there was another method of approaching this very serious problem, and I suppose I am the other method.

Now, the second part of that sentence which I think is equally important:

I do not feel there has been any improper conduct on the part of the magistrate or his adviser and that in fact the confusion has arisen because of his desire to give every reasonable benefit of the doubt to your client, Mr. Strader.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I need to tell you or any hon. member of this House that the time to exercise reasonable doubt is when the hearing is going on. Every man is presumed innocent until he is proven guilty and any accused is entitled to the benefit of any reasonable doubt. The magistrate, in his wisdom, heard the evidence and came to the conclusion. Presuming—I would certainly presume—the magistrate gave him the benefit of any reasonable doubt and came to the conclusion he was guilty. The magistrate, in his wisdom, decided he was going to impose a sentence, a fine of $300 and a suspension of the licence for a year.

What does the hon. Attorney General mean when he says the confusion has arisen, "because of the desire to give every reasonable benefit of the doubt to your client, Mr. Strader"?

Presuming the magistrate acted in the judicial manner, he gave it to him. He found him guilty. The county court judge later disagreed with him, and I am not concerned really about whether he should have found him guilty or whether he should not have found him guilty. That is neither here nor there. The county court judge disagreed with the magistrate, as was his right.

But the fact is that at this stage, when we talk about the records, how can there be any question of reasonable doubt being exercised in favour of Mr. Strader? The magistrate had done his job, whether rightly or wrongly, and was finished with it. The letter goes on:

I have no evidence before me, nor has the chief magistrate, as to the written words that were at one time placed upon the man's licence; nor do I have any indication as to what person was responsible for the erasure of these words.

I say, sir, that here is the licence. I do not know whether the hon. Attorney General has seen it or not. If he wants to see it, he can have it right now. It is obvious that there were words on here. I have been able to interpret them and I would think that the hon. Attorney General's laboratory could very quickly bring these words out and bring them out in a fashion that the handwriting could be obvious. In a ten-day period, from the handing of the licence by Strader to the policeman until it was handed back to Strader, the simplest sort of investigation could determine whose hands it passed through and who might have written these words on it.

The very simplest kind of an explanation, and the words are there and the hon. Attorney General can have this licence and he can conduct this kind of investigation, which he should have done when this matter first came to his attention. It would be a very simple matter, in my opinion, to get samples of the handwriting of all people through whose hands this licence passed in the ten-day period, and compare them with the handwriting that was on the licence. In that way one could very simply determine who did the writing—perhaps not who did the erasure but who did the writing, in any event. The answer lies within the hands of a very few people who had this licence within that ten-day period. Any department, such as the hon. Attorney General's, that could not trace this down if it made half a try would not be able to do its job very well.

I do not believe it is necessary for me to go into the allegations and counter-allegations that have been made, since it is obvious that the views of several people as to one particular date or incident may be somewhat different. I would point out, however, that Magistrate McClevis emphatically denies making some of the statements that Mr. Strader has attributed to him.

I suggest that the hon. Attorney General was seriously wrong when he gave the opinion in that paragraph. I think it is necessary. It was necessary then and it is necessary now that the allegations and the counter-allegations in a very serious matter of this sort be thoroughly investigated, and even though there are conflicting opinions, Mr. Strader in any event has been prepared by himself to swear an affidavit—I would presume Mr. Strader is an honourable man—and the original affidavit is in the hands of the hon. Attorney General.

There is one man's version of what happened. There are other people who may have different versions, but I would suggest merely because the versions are conflicting that in a serious matter of this sort, you just do not throw up your hands and say: There are conflicting opinions and therefore let us forget about the whole thing. This is what, in fact, the hon. Attorney General says in the penultimate paragraph of his letter, and this is it:

In view of the very thorough investigation made by the chief magistrate, I would suggest, sir, for the reasons I have already outlined, I do not feel that there is anything further which has to be done in respect to the allegations that have been made, and I assure you that I am satisfied as to the propriety of the conduct of the magistrate in this particular matter.

That may be the hon. Attorney General's opinion, but I am not satisfied and I do not share that opinion. I say that in a serious charge that is made by a responsible solicitor of the Supreme Court and a member of the law society of Upper Canada to the hon. Attorney General, backed up by an affidavit by a citizen, this sort of answer is not good enough. If the hon. Attorney General states he feels there is nothing in this, then surely the hon. Attorney General had a duty to report the complaining solicitor to the law society, because the complaining solicitor must be imagining things and making charges that are irresponsible. If, on the other hand, the complaining solicitor is correct, then the magistrate or someone associated with him must be wrong.

I suggest that no proper investigation has taken place, and I suggest that the hon. Attorney General's conclusion is not satisfactory, either to the gentleman to whom the correspondence was addressed, or to my colleagues and myself, or to the people of the province of Ontario. If Mr. Strader is lying and he has lied in his affidavit, the hon. Attorney General has a responsibility to bring this out and charge Mr. Strader with perjury. If, on the other hand, McClevis is wrong, then, surely, there must be some manner in which this matter can be satisfactorily dealt with.

Those, sir, are the facts in connection with the affair concerning Magistrate McClevis. In relation to these two matters and the two magistrates whose names I have mentioned, let me say that in my opinion they indicate that something far less than should be desired has gone on in magistrates' courts in our province.

May I say as well, sir, that it is my opinion that 99.9 per cent of the magistrates in the province of Ontario conscientiously try to do a good job. I do not always agree with their decisions, other people do not always agree with their decisions, but it is my opinion that the vast majority of the magistrates in the province of Ontario bring to their job and to their position of responsibility the best intelligence that they know how, honesty and integrity, and they make the decisions in the light of the evidence as they see it. By and large, they listen and they are respectful and they deal with accused people in proper manner, they respect witnesses, they respect counsel, and so on, and this is how it should be.

But I say, sir, in these two particular cases the situation is very different. What, then, is the answer? This is the question that my friend, the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests asked me a few moments ago. There are two possible solutions, or perhaps even three.

Let me deal with McClevis first and we will come to Dnieper in a moment. Insofar as the McClevis incident is concerned, the record, as I have it, is far from complete. If there is any answer to the various questions I have asked, and it requires further investigation, that investigation should be conducted immediately. But I would suggest that the evidence that I placed before this House this afternoon is almost impossible of answer in line with what the hon. Attorney General wrote in his letter. But if there is any more investigation to be done in the McClevis matter, let the investigation go on.

I would suggest that if the facts are as I believe they are, and as I have brought them before this House—and I think the facts in the Dnieper matter are so overwhelming and so many incidents are involved, with the one transcript that I read into the record, and there are others, and with the complaints, the newspaper stories, the written letters, the phone calls and so on—that you must come to the conclusion with me that the administration of justice is not going to be properly looked after as long as Magistrate McClevis and Magistrate Dnieper continue to sit on the bench in the province of Ontario.

I would suggest that they both be asked to submit their resignations. In the event that they do not, then, sir, the procedure indicated in sections 2 and 3 and whatever other pertinent sections there are relating to this matter—pardon?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The other pertinent one is the one whether it should be referred to a judge or judges. Is that not what you would want done?

Mr. Singer: I say that in the event either of these gentlemen does not want to submit his resignation, then the procedure referred to in section 3, which is the referral to a judge or judges, be resorted to and that there be a full and complete public inquiry into the charges that I have brought before this House. I say, sir, that I fully realize, recognize and accept the serious responsibility I have taken upon myself in bringing these matters to this House, and I do not enter into this kind of series of remarks without considerable trepidation, without a great deal of self-analysis and without a great deal of concern as to whether or not the end result is going to be to assist in better administration of law, or is going to hurt the administration of law.

It is my opinion, sir, that we have to guard our system of law jealously; it is a good one and it has to be well looked after. But it is my opinion as well, sir, that people concerned with the administration of law are not sacrosanct, are not above criticism. Unfortunately, on occasion—and the occasions are rare—there comes a time and there comes a place when criticisms, if they are carefully researched and honestly felt, must be brought before this assembly. I would think that the whole process of the administration of law would be encouraged and the public faith in it would be heightened, if it were made abundantly clear that when instances such as these have come about, there would be a full and complete and thorough airing of it and investigation of it, and that it would be dealt with in a manner satisfactory to the public.

In conclusion, I want to say, sir—and I quoted these remarks when I began some considerable time ago, but I want to quote again from the remarks of His Honour Judge Forsythe when he spoke to the magistrates' meeting a few days ago:

Unless you are kindly and patient and full of dignity and courteous to the people who come before you, they will get a bad view of the administration of justice.

We here must do our best to make sure, insofar as it is within our power, that people get a good view of the administration of justice, and I am convinced that we as legislators or as lawyers are not going to sweep things under the rug because on occasion they may be nasty, but, when action is necessitated, it will be taken, it will be promptly taken and fairly taken, and it will be taken without fear or favour.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this discussion of the estimates of the hon. Attorney General's department this afternoon on behalf of our party, I would like first of all to congratulate the hon. Attorney General on the excellence of the report of the committee on legal aid which was tabled in this Legislature some time ago. It is, in my opinion, of all the reports that I have seen, one of the finest examples of a thorough, documented, well-supported study of the legal aid systems in other jurisdictions, and a thorough presentation of a proposed system for the province of Ontario, which is so immeasurably better than anything we have had to date in this jurisdiction that I find it difficult either to criticize it or to suggest an alternative approach. I accept the report and I urge that it be implemented by legislation at this session of the Legislature.

I think it is essential that legislation should be brought forward to implement that report during this session because of the kind of incident which the hon. member for Downsview has referred to in a rather lengthy dissertation. I would like to return to the remarks of the hon. member for Downsview in a few moments, but first of all I would like to comment very briefly again on the legal aid report.

There is simply no fair comparison with the report which was submitted on the securities legislation. The securities legislation report, in my opinion, is an unsatisfactory report; it is based on an analytical rather than a systematic, experiential study of what is required for securities legislation. I think anyone reading the two reports would come to the identical conclusion that I have come to. I will refer at some greater length to the securities committee report during the particular item when that appears in these estimates.

Returning to the questions which have been aroused in everyone's mind by the two cases which the hon. member for Downsview has brought before this House, I would say that he has caused me a great deal of concern in the presentation of the first case. On the second case, either my span of attention had dissipated or I was not able to grasp all the significance of the points which he was bringing forward.

The hon. member for Downsview has indicated that it was with some concern and trepidation and soul searching that he had brought the case of Magistrate Dnieper before this House. The concern which I have is that this seems to illustrate so conclusively the attitude of the Liberal Party—of which he is the spokesman in this particular field—to law and to the administration of justice in our society. I think it is quite appropriate for any member in this House to stand up, and if there is no other way in which a question affecting the judiciary can be brought before the public then he is entitled to bring it before this Legislature. Undoubtedly the hon. member for Downsview has satisfied himself that he had no other way. But I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that what the hon. member for Downsview has done is irresponsibly read into the record here a transcript, highly dramatized, of an incident relating to the administration of justice, which was shocking, I am certain, to most of the hon. members of this Legislature in the way in which he presented it. He chose to do so in the full realization that the hon. Attorney General of this province is as concerned, if not more concerned, about the particular complaints that have been laid against that magistrate than the hon. member for Downsview. Despite the full knowledge that the hon. Attorney General was so concerned about it, he chose to read the transcript into the record of this House.

This is not the only example of irresponsible statements which have come before this Legislature. The hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) was equally irresponsible last March when in a statement before the orders of the day he alluded to and documented at some length an incident in which the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) and myself were involved relating to the Ontario reformatory at Guelph. I will refer to that matter in a different context later in my remarks.

The hon. member for Downsview documented the incidents of complaints known to him about Magistrate Dnieper. These are not new incidents, they are well known; indeed, as he stated, they were well publicized in the press on most occasions. The substance of the complaint against Magistrate Dnieper and the way in which it arose had nothing to do basically with whether or not in his court there was or was not a substantial miscarriage of justice in any given case.

The complaint started to build up about Magistrate Dnieper because he was rude, and particularly because he was rude to the legal profession. The reaction of the legal profession—and I do not dissociate myself from it at all—is a reflection on the way in which many of the members of our profession deal with the problems of society. He referred particularly to the action taken by the lawyers in Whitby. Any lawyer in this House, indeed any member of this House who was faced with this kind of problem, would not write and indicate that unless something were done—he would refuse to appear before that court. Whether he appeared before that court or did not appear before that court, people would be brought before that court to be charged.

The proper way in which the profession of which I am a member should have dealt with Magistrate Dnieper or any other magistrate in similar circumstances would have been to take every single case that was heard before that magistrate, to have defended every single person who was accused in that particular court, and in an incident such as this to have immediately taken the matter to appeal. In my view so many of those convictions would have been upset that the problem with which the hon. Attorney General is faced would have been easy of solution for him. Instead of that, the members of my profession, because they had been rudely treated—and this is the only reason, and I will explain that in a minute or two in my remarks—chose to state in Whitby that they would not appear.

When a magistrate has been appointed, the hon. Attorney General has a very difficult problem to remove that magistrate from his position. I am not familiar with the attitudes of the predecessors of the present hon. Attorney General to the questions which have been raised about Magistrate Dnieper. I am familiar with the matters which have been raised in this House today and something of the attitude of the hon. Attorney General. I have also taken the trouble to go to the court and hear Magistrate Dnieper, and I, too, was upset and concerned about his rudeness, about his interjections, about his interruptions and about the way in which he tends not to act in conformity with the decorum, which our particular profession seems to think an essential element of the administration of justice.

Mr. Sopha: Is it not?

Mr. Renwick: I will come back to that later; it may well be.

I would take you to the same court that the hon. member for Downsview referred to. Everything else is identical in the court except the magistrate sitting on the bench. It happened that the hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Eagleson) was in that same court that morning. The magistrate was impeccably dressed, urbane, civilized, articulate, conducting his court in that fine tradition of the casual administration of justice which came down to us from England in the 17th century.

Mr. Sopha: Did he have spats on?

Mr. Renwick: Just about. A young girl came before that court charged with the identical offence. There was no question of her being defended in that court at all. She was 19 years of age, she had been arrested on a Saturday night or early Sunday morning for drunkenness. She was fined on a plea of guilty with no advice from anyone, and I take part in the indictment of my own profession for what happens. First offence, $100 or 30 days.

In the same court, on the same morning a boy, 17 years of age—completely unrelated to the other incident, but the same magistrate—the hon. member for Lakeshore could correct me if he were here, but I believe in my own mind it was $25 or 30 days.

“May I have time to pay?”

“No time to pay.”

That was the end of that case.

The third one—and I believe it was the same morning but I cannot vouch for this. It was the same offence, an older man. I do not even remember the sentence but it was not the $10 or 10 days variety.

He said, “I have a job, Your Honour. May I have time to pay?”

“No time to pay.”

The point which I am trying to express to this Legislature is that the fault does not happen to lie with one particular magistrate who may or may not have a wider range of eccentricity than is generally accepted within our society, but the fault lies with the inability of the administration of justice in our province to provide for the defence of persons who come up in magistrates' court.

Now, I am not sufficiently naive to think for one single moment that everyone who is charged with an offence in magistrates' court should plead not guilty, nor that there should be no guilty pleas entered at all; or that necessarily a lawyer should stand up and defend that particular accused. It may not be even remotely related to the total administration of justice. But I do say—and I insist that it be done in this province if there is any way in which I can further it—that every person who is accused in a magistrate's court be advised by a lawyer as to exactly what his rights are.

I am not one who subscribes to the view that a printed notice handed to him in a jail is sufficient advice of what his rights are. I think that there should be an automatic reversal of any conviction in which it is not clearly shown by the record that the magistrate has given the accused person the right to be represented by a lawyer if he chooses to be so represented.

But regardless of that warning, I think it should become incorporated into our system of the administration of justice in magistrates' courts that each accused person should have a lawyer advise him before he pleads to the charge. Whether the accused person wishes to accept that advice, that is his privilege. But he must have that advice.

The experience which I have had—and it is not an extensive experience in magistrates' courts, but in the last while I have had some experience of the operation of those courts—would lead me to believe that the most difficult task which any lawyer is ever faced is the decision to instruct his client to plead guilty.

I think in many ways it is easy to plead not guilty and let the routine proceed. But I happen to take the view that it is not necessarily the obligation of our profession to advise everybody to plead not guilty and then go through the whole routine of the court in defence. I think there are many cases where this should be avoided and I think most lawyers in this room would probably agree with me that this is not an unrealistic way to approach cases in the magistrates' courts.

For this reason I would ask the hon. Attorney General, on behalf of this party, on behalf, I am certain, of a large number of hon. members of this Legislature, if he would not introduce, even though it may not be perfectly tidy or perfectly worked out, if he would not introduce in this Legislature at this session the first bill introducing a legal aid system into the province of Ontario so that come next session, or come the next time, when experience has shown that amendments or corrections are necessary, we can get on with the business of providing an adequate and effective legal aid system.

I would like to return to the hon. member for Downsview. This has concerned me about the Liberal Party, and I accept all the statements of the heart-searching that he went through before he brought this matter before the House. But once again we have an incident brought before this House when there is no single, solitary element of compassion for the person who was subjected to that particular trial in Magistrate Dnieper's court. Indeed, the hon. member had no idea whether the case had gone to appeal or what disposition had been made of it, none whatsoever.

Mr. Singer: That is utter nonsense, that remark.

Mr. Renwick: He was not prepared to make that kind of an inquiry. He is very concerned about the courtroom facilities in the magistrates' courts. I, too, am concerned. I do not put all this importance on the actual facilities for those courts—whether there are magnificent edifices or fine surroundings for the courts to operate. Again, this appears to me to be part of a tradition which indicates that in some way our system of law is designed to overawe the person who appears before the magistrate or before the judges in our courts.

I would like to see the magistrates with proper facilities and proper courts. But no matter how fine the building, for most persons who appear in magistrate's court or in the courtroom—maybe for half an hour, an hour, or an hour and a half—the beauty of their surroundings or the fineness of the surroundings is not going to determine the attitude which those people have toward the administration of justice. What is going to determine their attitude is the attitude of the magistrate; the attitude of the prosecutor; the degree to which any concern is shown for him as an individual within our society; the degree to which there is some concern shown for what will happen to him after he is sentenced; the degree to which some concern is shown as to whether or not he can return to his employment, if he has employment to return to; the degree to which some of the problems with which the particular individual may personally be faced are compassionately considered by the courts, and after being dealt with in the courts, on a continuing basis by persons qualified in our society.

I am, as a new member, constantly faced with the realization in this Legislature that if at any time matters are brought before the Legislature that are within accepted traditions of government expenditure in our society, the criterion is how much more we can spend. We have just finished the hon. Minister of Highways' (Mr. MacNaughton's) estimates and we have spent $329 million, an increase of $30 million over the preceding year. I would say to the hon. Attorney General that if the $30 million increase that is going to be spent on highways in the province of Ontario this year were devoted to his department, to The Department of Reform Institutions, to The Department of Health, to The Department of Public Welfare, to The Department of Education, for the purpose of providing for our society by a diversion of the required amount of our financial resources, persons who are trained in the various disciplines needed to enable the large majority of our citizens to cope with the problems of a complex and an urban society, then I would think that we would be making tremendous progress in the province of Ontario, in terms of the improvement of—particularly today—the administration of justice.

I would like to turn to a not unrelated topic. I believe I have expressed the feeling that we in this party have toward the necessity of the immediate introduction into the province of Ontario of the legal aid system envisaged by that committee's report. A matter to which I would now refer is a matter which blew up in this Legislature a year ago last March when I was not here, and it may be that the hon. member for Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Thrasher) and I have a somewhat objective viewpoint on what took place on those particular few days in this Legislature. Again I find myself with grave difficulty understanding the position of the Liberal Party.

An hon. member: You are not the only one.

Mr. Singer: We have just as much difficulty and the people have great difficulty—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): He has obviously hit a sore spot.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): We have difficulty understanding Ottawa.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, may I proceed?

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): They would prefer that you did not, but you had better go ahead.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): We really are not too worried.

Mr. Renwick: In the remarks today of the hon. member for Downsview we did not hear a single, solitary sound about organized crime in the province of Ontario, or if there is in the province—

Mr. Singer: Do you want another hour-and-a-half about bail and legal aid and organized crime?

An hon. member: We suffered in silence, give him the floor.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, if I may say so, we would have preferred that.

Mr. Singer: Well, next time I will submit my text to you first.

Mr. Renwick: I asked for it yesterday but was refused.

Mr. Singer: I just did not happen to have it on me.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Renwick: But, Mr. Chairman, there was no reference to organized crime by the hon. member for Downsview. Indeed, there has been no reference by the Liberal Party or anyone in this Legislature in the short time that I have been here, to Bill 99, or any of the problems involved in organized crime other than occasionally to taunt the government about the ineptness of that bill with which, of course, I heartily agree because it was inept.

A whole year has gone by and the problem of organized crime and of syndicated crime in the province of Ontario has just disappeared from public discussion. I would say that this is one of the unfortunate results of the debate in this Legislature last March that for some reason there has been a withdrawal from discussion of that very current and pertinent problem of this society. I am one who believes that the former leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. John Wintermeyer, building on the foundations which the leader of this party (Mr. MacDonald) had laid on many occasions before that—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Must have been a poor foundation.

Mr. Renwick: —contributed a very substantial amount to the public discussion of organized crime, and brought to the attention of the government, who would refuse to believe any of it, the recognition of the fact that there is organized crime in the province of Ontario. But the problems remain and the difficulties remain and have not been dealt with—the problem of how in our society we relate individual freedom in an urban society, or metropolitan society such as we live in, with the existence of organized crime.

To what extent are we prepared to devote time and attention to studying the very difficult problems of the relationship between individual liberty and the needs of society, in terms of the existence within that society of organized crime. A person would be foolish to say that because we happen to be in the province of Ontario there is never going to be a group of people who are prepared to exploit, for profit purposes, gambling, prostitution, narcotics, highgrading. He would be foolish to suggest that such groups of persons would not avail themselves of every single facility of modern business in order to achieve the profit which they know lies within those prohibited areas of human behaviour.

On the other hand, we have the police commission and the Ontario provincial police and the metropolitan and other police forces throughout Ontario, who are charged with the responsibility in our society of making certain that organized crime is sought out, is destroyed—that the persons who, in fact, are the kingpins or the main persons behind organized crime, are brought to trial. We have to provide the police forces in the province of Ontario with all the facilities and all the up-to-date methods of investigation which will allow organized crime to be constantly and continuously subject to attack, in the hope that by and large there will be an overall destruction of such crime in the province of Ontario. But how do we relate the police powers to the rights of the individual? To what extent are the police to be provided with the facilities of questioning persons who in their judgment, have knowledge or are prepared to make information available to the police, about organized crime? To what extent is it up to this Legislature to raise their hands in holy horror at the thought of an in camera questioning of a witness by some kind of a police authority?

I do not pretend to know the answers to these problems. I place them before the Legislature in terms of the kind of difficult problem which the hon. Attorney General's department should be engaged in solving, and which for the past year it has been ignoring.

There is a great deal to be said, returning to the question of the witnesses being questioned by the police, for an in camera hearing of a particular witness, because there may very well be witnesses who are prepared to come forward on matters related to organized crime but who would be frightened to appear at a public questioning. The danger to them would be a matter of their lives, and not many people are prepared to put their lives in the hands of a public inquiry or a public questioning.

I think, on the other hand, that such a person should be entitled to have with him some other person. In our society it is traditional to have a lawyer. But someone, again, who would advise him of his exact rights in the situation. Not, again, that the person must take the advice, but that he will be fully advised and in any event there will be an independent person available if such questioning were to take place.

Again, I would like to focus the attention of the House, not on a solution to the problem, because I have not got a solution, but simply on the fact that this Legislature and the hon. Attorney General's department must begin to devote itself to the isolated specific areas of our society, where the conflict of the liberty of the individual and the organization and the protection of the society in which we live come to the fore.

I would therefore suggest to the hon. Attorney General that rather than just answer questions in these estimates when he comes to the particular votes where these matters come forward, he should open up his mind to us about this particular problem and about some of the other problems about which I am concerned and about which I am certain hon. members of this House are very much concerned, so that we can have the benefit of an intelligent interchange of ideas and thoughts about them.

Another area which is of considerable concern to me and which I raised in the committee a day or so ago, on the hearing of the private investigators and security guards bill, is the question—about which we read so very much—of the invasion of privacy. I certainly am one who believes that at this present time, until a proper analysis and study has been made of the techniques of investigation which are presently available, the private investigators in our society should be prohibited from using any of those techniques in carrying out their investigations. Until there has been some thorough consideration of the extent to which the public authorities—the police—are entitled to use these devices for the protection of society, then I say there should be a blanket prohibition against private investigation agencies using those devices.

When the question was raised before the committee, the answer given was simply that in the discretionary power given to the registrar to suspend the licence, it may be that if certain devices were found to be used—and I believe I am correctly stating the reply which was made—this might well result in suspension. But in substance, what I believe the hon. Attorney General was saying on that occasion was that they really do not have any clear, firm, thought-out, well-reasoned ideas about the use of various forms of devices.

I would turn to one particular form of device which, in my opinion, private investigating societies should not have, and that is the so-called lie detector—I believe the official term is polygraph. I do not know, but apparently in the city of Toronto one private investigation agency has a polygraph. The reason I would ask for an absolute prohibition of the polygraph and its use by a private investigation agency, is this:

Suppose some hon. members of this Legislature took themselves back to the time when they were 20 or 21, or 26 or 27 years of age, and were working in the downtown business community for a business organization. Suppose that within the organization where they were working, thefts had occurred. Suppose the management came to them, or the private investigation agency on behalf of the management, started to question them about the thefts, and put this proposition to them: "If you will just submit to a lie detecting test from a machine, of course we will know that you are not the one, and you will also be doing our organization a tremendous service because we will be able to locate the person responsible for the thefts."

Then put yourself in the position of the young girl or the young man in such an organization, who says: "Oh no, I do not think you have any right to ask me to take a test to find out whether or not I am telling you the truth. If you want to test my credibility—if they were so sophisticated as to use this particular kind of language—take me to the court, but you have no right to ask me to submit to some kind of a mechanical test to test my veracity and therefore I refuse to do so."

You can be quite certain that within the particular organization, that particular person would thereafter be damned, because for practical purposes, the request would have been so transmuted in the way in which it was placed before the group of employees that the mere refusal to take a test under a lie detection machine would be consistent only with the guilt of that person.

I earnestly ask the hon. Attorney General to prohibit private investigating firms in the province of Ontario from using lie detecting machines and I would ask that the use of the other types of techniques which are available—and I am certain the hon. members of this House are well aware of them without my attempting to enumerate them—be denied to private investigating firms until such time as the hon. Attorney General's department has some clear-cut, well-reasoned decision as to the method of use of these devices and the degree to which they should be permitted in our society.

Each of us, I am certain, will recognize that what I am attempting to do is to isolate some of the areas where this conflict between the individual and his group relationship in the society, and the conflict between the individual and organized society as a whole, must be looked into and dealt with in terms of the free interchange and public discussion of viewpoint, both in this Legislature and elsewhere, so that we can begin to arrive at some adequate way of solving these problems.

I would like to turn at this particular point to the whole question of the administration or the executive branch of the government, and by "executive" or by "administration"—I will use those particular terms in the next little while—I mean the total executive branch of the government; that is, the Ministers of the Crown and all the boards, commissions and tribunals associated with government administration throughout the province of Ontario.

I think that for a long period of time we have tended to make a distinction between the Ministers of the Crown and the operations of the traditional and other government departments, and the functioning and operation of the innumerable boards and tribunals which operate under authority of this Legislature, whether directly from this Legislature or under municipal government throughout the province.

In his opening remarks the hon. Attorney General stated the problems, as I see it, very adequately when he referred only to two branches of government. He referred to the principle of our society in which we keep the judicial branch of our society separately distinguished from the legislative branch of our society. By omission, he reflected the way in which we have traditionally ignored the relationship between the administration in its broad context to the life of the individual in the society.

Again I have had not a great deal of experience with commissions or boards. I have watched with some interest the standing committee on government commissions and I think anyone who is a member of that committee would recognize the extreme difficulty, indeed for practical purposes the inability, of the members of the standing committees to find out creatively about the commissions that appear before the standing committee.

Certainly it is not adequate, in my opinion, in the province of Ontario at this time that there should be a one-hour session or a one-and-a-half or two-hour session before standing committees as presently constituted. The members of the standing committees have only available to them—and I think this applies whether the members are government members or members from the Opposition parties—what they happen to collect or remember over the course of the past year as an arsenal from which to question the members of the commission.

The members of the commission tend to put before the standing committee innocuous reports which give no grounds for criticizing their activities in any way. There has been no indication that the members of the commission are prepared to discuss forthrightly any of the problems with which they are faced. They are—I think this is a true statement—constantly on the defensive when appearing before the standing committees.

I think of two or three committees that one could refer to, I could refer to one in particular, by way of illustration. The racing commission, if one were to read the statute, and I will not bother to read the statute here, but if one were to read the authority granted to the racing commission one would assume that the authority was an all-embracing authority with respect to racing in the province of Ontario. But first of all we find that the charters for authorizing racing in Ontario have nothing whatsoever to do with that commission; that the question of pari-mutuel betting at the racetracks has nothing whatsoever to do with that commission; that so far as harness racing is concerned, all the commission can do is to go along with whatever the North American society or harness racing association decides. Its ambit of authority is in fact restricted to granting a large number of permits or licences or authorizations to individuals who work or operate at racecourses during the racing season. And on the few brief questions which I put to the chairman of that commission I found out that there was no procedure by which his commission was organized, there were no rules of procedure within that commission, there was some question but he stated that if anybody appearing to apply for a licence wanted to have counsel that he certainly would not object to counsel being provided.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, the racing commission has nothing whatsoever to do with the estimates.

Mr. Bryden: Why does the hon. member not just sit down?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I had the same thought in mind as the hon. member for Sudbury but I think, as I turned it over in my mind, I believe the hon. member has in his mind that this does affect the field of administration of justice and I think perhaps he is right—

Mr. MacDonald: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And I was going to reserve my remark at this point until later but I believe this whole question of procedure before commissions and boards and bodies of that kind is one that is now being studied, not with any idea of delay but being studied currently and thoroughly by the commission on civil rights. I was about to say there is only one commission that I am aware of within the department of the Attorney General and I believe that is the securities commission or law reform—the one I just referred to—and the Ontario police commission. I am quite certain the securities commission was up before the committee. I do not know whether you summoned the police commissioners or not but I do agree that the hon. member is perhaps taking a wide turn and covering a lot of territory, if I were to relate it specifically to the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General. But I think he is in the field of civil rights or the administration of justice and I had decided not to interrupt.

Mr. Singer: Well, there was a resolution, Mr. Chairman, standing in my name on this very point.

An hon. member: So what?

Mr. Singer: Oh, so what! The yattering here really does not affect me at all, Mr. Chairman.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the hon. member for York South is wearing his halo quite as tight as he is. Nevertheless, the fact remains the hon. member for Riverdale is out of order. I request your ruling.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the point that has been made by the hon. member for Sudbury and I appreciate the latitude extended to me through you, Mr. Chairman, by the hon. Attorney General, because it is a matter related to the administration of justice when it comes to the commissions of this government or of this legislative assembly granting the right to earn a living by being employed at a racetrack. This is a matter which does relate in my opinion to the administration of justice when there are no rules or procedures available to anybody appearing before that commission. I would return to the Ontario securities commission and make this very same point about that commission.

There is a tendency among the commissions of this assembly, to act in a benevolent, paternalistic way toward those who appear before them. They appear to depend a great deal on the degree to which they know people or the degree to which someone belongs to the group or the club from which they belong. I was shocked and upset to think that the securities commission of this province was operating by meetings in motel rooms or corridors of hotels in the course of the inquiry which is now going on up north, related to the Windfall affair.

I think that the point, and the only point, which I have to make in these two illustrations is that we cannot any longer in a mature, sophisticated urban society afford to have the boards and commissions of our government operating on a benevolent, paternalistic system of administration.

I think that there have to be procedures and rules established—and I am not so certain that it has to be a written code—but there have to be recognized procedures and rules so that a person can go before those tribunals with a reasonable assurance that the matters which are of concern to him will be dealt with reasonably, accurately and that the reasons given on the facts which are before the board have some relation to the decision which is, in fact, given. There should not be considerations of whether or not you know a particular person who should appear for you in order that you will get a better hearing. I think that any member of this Legislature would recognize that there is a substantial degree of truth in this manner of operation of the various boards and commissions of this government and of our assembly.

I would like to turn to—nothing particularly novel or unavailable elsewhere—but I would like to turn now to some remarks which I have, on this whole field of the relationship of the administration, in its broad context, to our society. I would like, in the course of the next remarks, to accomplish three things. One is that I would like to disabuse the House of any suggestion that because a solution has been found elsewhere, that we should not incorporate it within the framework of our society. The immediate argument which a large number of people raise to the introduction of a new idea into our society is that it is not consistent with the traditions of our society, that we are really operating quite well, and that to translate something foreign in here would in some way infect the body politic.

To do this I must deal with the attitude of lawyers and of judges to administrative justice in the United Kingdom and by transmission in Canada and I would like to—unfortunately, in this particular context—read the remarks which I wish to make. Again, there is nothing novel about them and nothing unusual about them, but I think that they will help to place the question of administrative justice into a context where, as time goes on, we can have a reasonable discussion of it and perhaps come to some solution of a difficult problem.

I am certain that hon. members will recognize in the history of our own province, and in the history of other provinces in Canada, in the history of the United States of America and of England, that legislatures have continuously striven to limit the discretionary powers of the Crown by bringing the Ministers of the Crown under political control exercised in parliament. Once this was achieved it was believed that the dual control by the courts for legality and by parliament for discretion and policy, was sufficient to ensure the subjection of the executive branch.

By 1900 most of the countries of western Europe were preoccupied with the problem of administrative justice. In Britain the question was posed and the wrong answer given by Dicey in his famous book, The Law of the Constitution. In the words of one scholar, he managed both to define the rule of law in a way which meant that no other country in Europe possessed it and also to misinterpret the powers and responsibility of the conseil d'état in France so as to mislead whole generations of English lawyers as to what administrative justice was about.

In fact, Dicey's views were in full accord with the particular spirit of the English law. The administration of the law and the practice of the law in England retained much more of the medieval spirit than in other European countries. It was a small, closed profession and the judges in the courts were drawn from among the most successful practitioners of the art. The complications of common law made its understanding much more of a mystery than that of the more coherent, written law of the European continent.

Furthermore, the social composition of the English judiciary and legal profession was far narrower than on the European continent, so that lawyers and judges drawn from the wealthier classes were almost unanimously hostile to the extension of public services, to any form of state intervention, and to interference with property rights and the relations between master and servant.

By the end of the 19th century countries other than Britain, which had started from the principle that the ordinary courts should deal with the control of the administration, had seriously revised their views. The period between the wars in Britain saw increased interest in the problem of administration and justice.

The most famous broadside came from Lord Hewart in his book The New Despotism, published in 1929. He discovered a plot of the civil service to take over the powers of government by eliminating the control of the courts and by annexing the powers of Parliament. This parody was taken seriously by some people. The judicial attack on the civil service was principally directed against the increasing number of administrative tribunals, on the grounds that these tribunals were ousting the courts from their traditional jurisdiction.

But administrative tribunals were set up as a part of the administration to assist the administration in exercising the discretionary powers granted by Parliament. The judiciary's case would have been a great deal stronger had it consistently adopted the contemporary attitude of the French conseil d'état, which subjected the exercise of all administrative decision to rigorous scrutiny, not only for compliance with the law, but also for compliance with an as yet vague doctrine of reasonable use of power.

Traditionally, the British judiciary had allowed an extensive field of administrative discretion to, for instance, the Home Office, the Foreign Office and the armed forces, while at the same time inveighing against the discretionary powers vested in administrative tribunals acting as agents and advisers of the administration. This schizophrenic approach to different types of administrative discretion seriously weakened the force of the judiciary's criticism. It was not surprising that critics should see in the attack on administrative tribunals and the civil service, a veiled attack on the new social services which had made increased administrative discretion necessary. The effect of the lawyers' attacks over the years was to convince the Left that the judiciary was not a fit institution for controlling the executive.

The problem of controlling the administration was aggravated in the post-1945 years by the growth of new public services, but the judiciary itself had made a solution more difficult. During the war a series of judgments had extended the unfettered discretion of Ministers to a point which foreign observers found intolerable. A doctrine of acts of government more comprehensive than had been known in European countries since the turn of the century seemed to have been accepted. A series of cases involving property rights was used to bring the problem to public notice.

In 1955 the Franks committee was appointed to inquire into administrative tribunals, their powers and procedures. Its report supported the lawyers' contention that they were not part of the administration but performed merely judicial or quasi-judicial functions. The result appears to be that parts of the new public services will fall under the control of the legal profession, but the vastly more important traditional powers of discretion exercised by the civil service and the Minister would still remain subject only to the rather ineffective political control of Parliament.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, it is about 6 o'clock and this is a convenient place to recess.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 201:

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, before the adjournment I was placing my thoughts on the record, not particularly original, as to the reason why the attitude of the legal profession in particular and the general attitude towards British administration of justice is to exclude entirely the concept of administrative justice. I was hoping, by placing the historic context of that warped attitude on the record, to do something to facilitate the introduction into the province of Ontario of an adequate system of administrative law and justice.

To carry on with that particular phase of my remarks, I would like to deal with the French conseil d'état, which is without question the most highly developed administrative court in Europe. I do so solely to place before the Legislature the way in which this particular administrative court operates, again in the anticipation that a reasonably concise, but I hope clear, statement of the functions of that court will assist in the establishment of some such similar court in the province of Ontario.

The present organization and powers of the conseil d'état are based on an ordinance of 1945 promulgated by the provisional government of General de Gaulle. The conseil has two types of powers, both of which stem from its origins under Napoleon. It is the government's advisory body on legislation and law and also the supreme administrative court of the country. I shall deal only with the latter power of the conseil.

The immediate question which comes to mind, of course, is the line of demarcation between the conseil d'état and the ordinary courts of civil administration. In general, the ordinary civil courts have full jurisdiction in cases involving public authorities or between public authorities and private citizens, subject to certain obvious exceptions. First, the operations of the ordinary judiciary are excluded in most instances; second, the liberties of the subject remain in the hands of the ordinary civil courts, gross abuses of administrative power remain in the hands of the ordinary courts, and disputes in nationalized industries remain in the ordinary civil courts.

When the line of jurisdiction is not clear between the administrative courts and the ordinary courts, the matter is decided by a special court composed of an equal number of judges from the supreme civil court and counsellors from the conseil d'état. Should there be a stalemate, which is very rare, the Minister of Justice takes the chair and has a casting vote. There are two types of administrative suit—one, an action for the annulment of an administrative act or decision on grounds of illegality, and the other, an action inviting the court to recognize the existence of a subjective right which the administration has damaged and to obtain redress. This administrative law is uncodified and the conseil has built up a full concept of the liability of public authorities for damage.

The action for annulment of an administrative act can be brought against decrees, laws, regulations and ordinances of general application as well as against individual orders and decisions of the administration. The action is not available against laws, the judgments of ordinary civil and criminal courts, acts of government and contracts. The only serious loophole in the past was the acts of government.

The French administration, like any other administration, was ready to use the argument of public policy or public interest to escape from the control of the conseil d'état, but the conseil d'état has persistently reduced the number of matters which are immune from jurisdiction on this ground. Today the argument is only rarely advanced.

The reasons which may be invoked in support of an action for annulment are, first, on the grounds of ultra vires; that is, the authority which made the decision may not be legally empowered to do so. A mayor may not take a decision reserved by law to his municipal council, a prefect may not issue an ordinance which legally requires the Minister's signature, the Minister may not promulgate a regulation without authorization from Parliament. Secondly, the administration may have failed to follow the prescribed procedure, ignored substantive requirements concerning the form the decision should take, or neglected necessary prior consultations. But the conseil d'état insists that the preparatory fault be one of substance and not merely a frivolous or unimportant oversight. The failure to observe the regulations must be such as to have seriously affected the interests of the plaintiff or the fairness or objectivity of the final decision.

The third major reason for annulment of an administrative act for illegality is that the law has actually been broken. This includes not only those cases in which there is a contradiction between the law and the decision attacked. The conseil d'état also considers illegal any decision which violates the letter of the law or a decree or regulation of general application which is in contradiction with the res judicata of an administrative or civil court.

The most interesting examples show how the conseil d'état, while regarding its jurisdiction as being limited to ensuring the observance of the law, nevertheless imposes rules of conduct on the administration. Furthermore, it is frequently ruled that when the administration is legally entitled to exercise discretionary powers of the conseil d'état has no power to overturn that decision or substitute its own views, but through its own jurisprudence it has evolved methods of inquiring into the details of decision-making.

One of the ways in which it has achieved this position is by insisting that administrative decisions do not conflict with the general principles of law as it defines them. It holds, for instance, that the right of equality contained in the declaration of 1789 means that it is illegal to impose heavier duties or burdens on one citizen than on another or to discriminate between applicants for public office on grounds of political affiliation, colour or religion.

By the same token, it insists that even discretionary decisions must conform to the facts of the case. If a Minister were to refuse a building licence on the grounds that the building would spoil the particularly beautiful countryside in a protected area, it would be sufficient for the plaintiff to show that the area concerned was full of industrial properties successfully to contest the Minister's decision before the conseil d'état; or an official may be reduced in rank if his professional work is at fault, but the conseil d'état would not allow a Minister to adduce from the fact that the official was a communist the fact that his professional work was at fault. Decisions which are based on facts or reasoning, must be in conformity with the facts and the reasons advanced.

Clearly there are circumstances where the administration can be under no obligation to justify its use of discretionary power, and then a plaintiff's success will partly depend on his ability to attack the decision from its weakest point.

There has been one final course open to the plaintiff which the conseil d'état has developed to a point where not even when the administration is allowed the widest discretion can its acts go unchallenged and unexamined. He can base his case on the charge that there was the use of legal powers in proper form for purposes or for reasons contrary to the spirit of the law, or to the general principles of law. It can never be easy to provide documentary proof that this offence has been committed, but the conseil d'état is prepared to deduce consequences from the facts of the case.

For instance, the conseil d'état has deduced such a use where a musical society was refused permission to give a concert on public property when in exactly similar circumstances the municipal police band was given permission.

Another case concerned a mayor who refused a merchant permission to have a stall in the municipal market. The conseil d'état held that there was such a use, since the mayor had furnished no proof that the merchant was likely to break the market regulations, which would have been a satisfactory reason, and the merchant had shown that he had some time previously refused the mayor's request to apologize to a municipal councillor after a local incident. The conseil d'état deduced a connection between these two incidents and annulled the mayor's refusal.

There are many similar cases. The interesting development is that the conseil d'état inquires into the reasons behind an essentially discretionary decision. It is coming close to the view that every administrative decision must be based on reason and that these reasons should be explicable to a body of highly trained men, experienced in the practice of administration. Such a body is likely to give the fullest credit to a decision honestly arrived at and to appreciate the margin of guesswork implicit in many of the most important administrative decisions.

The second major action before the conseil d'état is that to obtain recognition of a subjective right and to obtain redress for the damage caused by administrative action. Here the conseil d'état acts like an ordinary civil court when judging actions, for instance breach of contract or damages. The conseil d'état has gradually evolved its own doctrine of the responsibility and liability of the public services. The legislative basis of the conseil d'état's action was, until 1945, very slender, but its doctrine of the responsibility of public authority still has no legislative basis even to this day. It is entirely a creation of the conseil d'état itself. The point of departure was the famous decision by the tribunal of conflicts in the case of Blanco in 1873. This held that the responsibility of the state for damage caused to private persons by an action of persons employed in the public service cannot be determined by the principles laid down in the civil code for the responsibility of one private citizen to another. This responsibility is neither general nor absolute, it is subject to special rules which vary according to the needs of the service and the need to reconcile the rights of the state and those of private persons.

The importance of this decision was first that actions for damages against the state became the responsibility of the conseil d'état and not of the civil courts. Second, that although designed to protect the state from liability for damages, it clearly stated the need to find a way of reconciling the needs of the state with the rights of the citizen. It recognized that the state may need extraordinary powers in order to perform its duties in the general public interest, but at the same time recognize that the citizen might reasonably demand redress for any special damages caused him which were not imposed on other private persons.

By 1938 the conseil d'état had so developed these two points that it abandoned its original position that only administrative acts were liable to cause damage and maintained that even legislative acts, when they caused damage to one or a small selected group of citizens, could justify the award of damages. Nevertheless, the conseil d'état recognized certain limits to the responsibility of public authorities.

It accepted, for example, that certain services were by their nature peculiarly susceptible to minor risks which were inherent in the provisions of the particular services. The conseil always required a plaintiff to show that the administration had been guilty of a fault; but in the case of services, such as the police, emergency medical services or administrative services in isolated parts of French overseas territories, it required a plaintiff to prove that the fault was of exceptional proportions. It recognized that some public services, if they are to operate at all, must entail a certain unavoidable risk to others.

Even here, however, the conseil d'état has gradually shifted its position in favour of the private citizen. Formerly, it always required proof of a fault on the part of the service concerned; later it accepted that in certain cases, for instance in certain traffic accidents, there could be a presumption of fault and then the administration concerned should pay the damages. It also elaborated a distinction between personal fault and fault of the service.

Only in the second case would it award damages against the public service. If it found that the accident could not reasonably be imputed to the charge of the service, the plaintiff had to go to the civil courts and sue the official for damages as a private individual. It often happened of course that no damages could be extracted from the official, who was simply not in a position to pay them. Whenever possible, therefore, a person damaged would sue the administration.

In view of the frequent injustices this caused, the conseil d'état accepted after 1919 that a public service could also be held liable for damages caused by a personal fault of its agent when in its service. This gave the plaintiff the alternative of suing the agent personally through the civil courts or the administration through the administrative courts.

In 1949 the conseil d'état went a step further and accepted that it was possible to sue the public service whenever it could reasonably be held that its agent was on duty. This change in jurisprudence, while it afforded every protection to the interests of the public, left the interests of the public inadequately protected. A public service was not allowed to recoup the damages it had to pay from the official who had caused them, and in 1949 this was partly remedied by the provisions that where there is both a fault by the public service and a personal fault by its agent, the court can divide the responsibility between them proportionately. They assess the extent to which the fault was the fault of the agent and he has to pay that proportion of the damages finally awarded.

Finally, the conseil d'état has recognized that the liability of a public service can be engaged even when there is no fault either on the part of the service or on the part of the agent. Formerly it would accept an action without proof of fault only in cases involving the construction or operation of public works. This was later extended to cover those fields, such as munitions works, where the state was directly engaged in a highly dangerous trade.

The question assumed particular importance as the result of the use of firearms by the police. In circumstances where the use of firearms was fully authorized innocent bystanders might be killed or seriously injured, should the public service be held responsible for damage, even though no fault was imputed to the police themselves? The conseil d'état decided that persons who through an administrative activity suffered particular damage, which was not shared by any other significant group of people, could reasonably seek recompense for the damage suffered from the public authority concerned.

It has been said that:

It is hardly necessary to insist on the distinctive character of the French conseil d'état. It has a unique record in European administrative law and a unique reputation among administrative courts for impartiality, intellectual brilliance, common sense, administrative wisdom and experience; and in ability to reconcile the interests of efficient administration with the rights of the citizen, it has no equal.

Mr. Chairman, the final portion of the remarks which I want to make tonight are related to the function of another foreign-developed facility, which has been mentioned many times in this House. But again for the benefit of overcoming a prejudice toward the introduction into our system of foreign ideas, I would like to speak at some little length on the question of an ombudsman. I would of course recognize that the hon. member for Downsview has a resolution on a bill.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): A bill.

Mr. Renwick: A bill on the order paper, referring to a parliamentary commissioner. But I would like simply to assist him in the promulgation of his ideas of a parliamentary commissioner—

Mr. Singer: Thank you, I appreciate it.

Mr. Renwick: —by dealing with the ombudsman as he functions in Sweden.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Singer: Stop your mumbling.

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): You went on for a day and a half—forget it.

Mr. Singer: Oh, no. I was talking to the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden).

Mr. Renwick: According to the current instructions, the ombudsman in Sweden exercises a general supervision over courts and civil servants to ensure observance of the law, the Constitution and letters of instruction. He investigates charges of illegality, negligence or gross disregard of the interests of their service in the performance of official duties. He can institute proceedings against officials in the courts on any of these grounds. He is to pay particular attention to those offences which involve fraud, or abuse of power, or which impede the course of justice. If he finds, however, that an administrative or judicial fault has been committed without any unlawful intention, he need do no more than ask that the offending decision be corrected.

If a case involves a member of the Supreme Court or a Cabinet Minister, it has to be referred to the court of impeachment. The ombudsman acts as prosecutor in the proceedings before the court of impeachment. If the Riksdag orders proceedings to be taken against one of its own members, the ombudsman is again responsible for the prosecution. The ombudsman has the right to be present when decisions are taken by courts and administrative agencies but he has no right to express his opinion on the matter under discussion.

He is also required to undertake tours of inspection throughout the country and to examine the operations of administrative agencies both in the provinces and in the capital. He can delegate his investigating authority to a subordinate if he considers this will help his work. On the basis of these inspections and the complaints his office has received from the public the ombudsman makes an annual report to the Riksdag.

In his instructions he is particularly asked to call attention to any serious shortcomings in the work of courts or administrative bodies or to any loopholes in the law which appear to require legislation or amendment. The ombudsman has a special responsibility for all questions concerning the liberty of the citizen, particularly the arrest and detention of persons and any other cases involving the deprivation of liberty. He has power to demand all prison returns and can without notice examine the management of prisons and detention establishments. These include asylums, mental institutions, remand homes and treatment centres for alcoholics.

The ombudsman works in two ways. He investigates complaints by the public sent to their office in writing and he makes tours of inspection and inquiry into the working of state offices.

Any citizen can bring a complaint before the ombudsman. He does not require the services of a lawyer although it is not unusual to have one. A complaint is simply to be sent in writing with any documents or evidence in support of the complaint. A prisoner is entitled to forward his complaints directly to the prison governor's office in a sealed envelope, not subject to censorship. When the complaint arrives in the office, it may be written off as clearly the work of a crank or a prima facie unjustifiable and unverifiable. Otherwise it is forwarded to the office or official whose actions are challenged. The ombudsman asks the office concerned for further information or for comment. It is not unusual for the original complaint to be based on a newspaper cutting, supported by a more elaborate version from the individual concerned.

The office concerned returns its comment, together with any statements or documents demanded, to the ombudsman. The ombudsman's office then forwards this explanation to the person making the complaint. Many cases go no further than this, the office concerned either having given the affected person satisfaction or justified its action to the ombudsman. No action is taken in about a third of the complaints received in an average year because they are clearly unjustified.

In 1955, 160 complaints were written off in this way. The complaints covered the whole range of administration. From 1950 to 1955, between a third and a half of all complaints were against the court, the police and the public prosecutor's officials in roughly equal proportion. Another third of the complaints were against central ministries and government departments, and the next largest category, though declining in relative importance, was against prisons, mental institutions and other places of detention. Out of an average of about 700 cases which come to the notice of the ombudsman each year, about 100 are dropped as not warranting attention, another 100 are rapidly rejected as being unfounded or inaccurate. This leaves some 500 cases a year which are pursued.

In 1952 and 1955, 150 of these cases, when investigated, showed administrative errors, fault, negligence or bad faith.

An ombudsman has considerable discretion as to how far he takes a case against an official. He does not have ultimate power except to prosecute the official concerned before the ordinary court. And he is normally loath to do this unless the offence is serious or he is left no alternative. In most cases, an ombudsman simply points out the official's error and suggests that he put it right. If he agrees to do so, the ombudsman notifies the person who made the original complaint and advises him how he should now approach the office.

In other cases, the ombudsman may be prepared to allow the official to settle matters informally. Only an average of 10 cases a year involve prosecution. The figures of these cases suggest that the ombudsman has little interest in victimizing minor officials for they appear rarely and only in cases where there was clearly no alternative to prosecution. It is more common to find senior officials being publicly faced with their responsibilities.

In 1955 the police chief and the public prosecutor in a county area were prosecuted for illegally confiscating a fisherman's boat. The county governor was prosecuted for the wrongful detention of a chronic alcoholic. There was one odd case in which a pastor of the state Lutheran Church was prosecuted for threatening one of his erring parishioners with police action.

Since the office of ombudsman was created, five Cabinet Ministers have been prosecuted, as well as several very senior officials, including the administrative heads of ministries and Royal boards. The ombudsman requires permission of the Riksdag before proceeding against a Minister.

There has always been some criticism of the ombudsman's system as such. The original desire of the right wing to put control of the public administration under the Crown with the ombudsman as a Crown official disappeared by the end of the 19th century. Since the rise of social democracy there has been no hope of abolishing Parliament's most valuable instrument for controlling government business.

By 1939 the argument had swung the other way. It was claimed that the parliamentary system of government provided all the checks necessary, and the disappearance of the old dichotomy between executive and legislature had made the ombudsman superfluous. A Swedish parliamentary committee which examined the position in 1939 rejected the idea of abolishing the office. It believed, however, that with the greatly improved guarantee for fair and impartial justice accorded by a parliamentary state and with a more independent ordinary judiciary, the ombudsman should perhaps concern himself more with constitutional matters and less with detailed work of administration.

The committee added, however, with great prescience, that with the obvious growth of social services and the extension of state activity, the abolition of the ombudsman would only lead, in the long run, to the need to find some new method of controlling public service. There was, indeed, every likelihood that the real importance of the ombudsman would increase in the near future. The committee concluded by reiterating the far-sighted comment of its predecessor in the 1859-60 Riksdag: The less cause that the ombudsman has to intervene with his official authority, the more surely is the objective of his office attained.

Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. members of the Legislature will be perfectly clear on what I have attempted to do, and that is to indicate that the problems involved in the relationship, in our complex society, between an individual and organized society and between the individual and the organs of his government, cannot be settled in any single way or by any simple approach. There must be a number of facilities available, a number of channels of communication, a number of thought out and carefully studied plans to ensure that in the kind of society that we have there will be preserved to the individual the maximum area of security and of freedom consistent with the needs of organized society.

In concluding, Mr. Chairman, I simply want, in my own words, to put before the Legislature the ways in which the New Democratic Party approach problems related to legal philosophy, to the application of law in our society, and to the administration of justice.

I would like now to close simply by reciting those particular propositions:

1. That law exists in and for organized society. The individualistic approach to law misses the significance of what is actually happening.

2. We stress communal realities and communal needs, not the maxims of individualistic laissez-faire.

3. At a time when increased productivity is the universal fetish of economics, we adhere to an ethical tradition which refuses to leave the human being out of account.

4. Our aim is the socialization of the law, to make the law conscious of its obligations to all classes of society and especially to the weak and unorganized.

5. Our system of representative government does not blind us to the real difference of interest between the group that governs in our society and those that obey.

6. Law involves the weighing of social consideration.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, this might be an opportune time for me to make some brief comments in reply to some of the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Downsview. I do not propose to go into great detail, though I have made notes on a few remarks upon which I would like to comment. I think he first spent some time on the subject of bail and the unsatisfactory situation which he submits exists in the matter of securing bail, and, in that area, I would simply say that the subject of bail and the provisions which govern bail, are of course set forth in the criminal code.

When bail must be called for, it is a question whether it is bail or personal recognizance, and it is something within the discretion of the magistrate. I tried to indicate in my remarks to the House that the studies which are going forward, the conferences on magistrate procedures, the conferences on uniformity of sentencing and on the approach to the problems of magistrates' courts generally, and the instruction which is being carried forward, studies of the chief magistrate, his conferences with magistrates, his visits with them—all are seeking to improve our system of administration of justice, particularly in the magistrates' courts.

I would assure the House that the subject is one which deserves study, which should be improved. There has been a considerable study on the matter in my own time in this office. That study is going forward and I think I may assure the House that some improvement will have been noted and further improvement, I think, may be expected.

The hon. member for Downsview spent a good deal of time in his speech on the court facilities, the physical situation of courts, particularly in Metropolitan Toronto. I will admit, again, that there is room for much improvement here, that there has not been the space which should be available, if we are to conduct adequately the administration of justice. But again, I would say this: I made available—I do not want to stress this point—to the hon. member, the report which I had requested from my chief magistrate. May I say this: that the chief magistrate, Arthur Klein, was appointed some time in the summer of last year. There had been two previous appointments. Unfortunately, one of the appointees died and one, through reasons of health, was unable to carry on. The chief magistrate spent some of his early time in getting acquainted with the magistrate's bench and with certain other problems which I had directed to his attention. Then, in November he was requested to take up the study of the facilities which might be secured, that we might have adequate courtroom space, facilities, proper surroundings in which to conduct this phase of our administration. That study was completed and handed in during this session and after I had taken a little time to study it, I did make it available to my friend, the hon. member for Downsview.

I must say that, having indicated that we were studying it and having made the report available, and having in the question which was asked about it, I told the hon. member these things, this is part of the answer, which I quote:

The inspector of legal offices has advised the Attorney General within the last three years of the necessity for expanding magistrates' facilities in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. As a result of such advice and following negotiations with the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto several improvements were made as follows:

A. New buildings were constructed in Willowdale in 1960.

Now, these I take no credit for.

B. New buildings were constructed in Scarborough in 1962.

C. Additional court space was released in the city of Toronto at 57 Adelaide Street in 1962.

D. Additional facilities were provided on Hollis Street in York township in 1962.

E. Additional two courtrooms were made available on King Street, Toronto, one in 1961 and one in 1964.

F. Facilities were improved in New Toronto in 1962.

Then this paragraph:

In November 1964, the chief magistrate, Arthur O. Klein, QC, was designated to work closely on behalf of the Attorney General with the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto on the requirements of additional magistrate's court facilities. Negotiations are presently being carried on with the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto with a view to providing additional courtrooms for magistrates in the old city hall.

Now, when the hon. member asked me yesterday, "When are you going to have them," I said, "Soon, but I do not know just the day when the old city hall facilities are going to be available." But I can say this to the House: Those negotiations are going forward. There is very good co-operation and, I think, a clear understanding. I mention the fact that it is the responsibility of the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto to provide the courtroom facilities, but the Attorney General's department is interested because primarily, under our constitution, the responsibility starts with the province and we pass it on, as you know, to our counties, to our cities and in northern Ontario, to the districts which are assisted by the province.

Now, I must say that I felt a little—shall I say hurt?—but not very seriously, to find my friend, the hon. member for Downsview, taking my report, taking what I thought was a rather good effort, and turning around and berating me with it.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Plagiarism!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Speaking of plagiarism, there came to my mind some lines from Julius Caesar, when he was being assassinated, Mr. Chairman. I think there are a couple of lines there that say:

Ingratitude, more strong than traitors' arms, quite vanquished him.

I was not quite vanquished. But I felt some pangs of ingratitude.

Mr. Singer: I would not have known about it if the chief magistrate had not been—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Now, I think I should, although it is distasteful to me, to really deal with the subject, but I think I must say something on the matter which the hon. member took so long to deal with and on which he went into such detail; that is the situation in the court conducted by Magistrate Dnieper. It is distasteful, I say, to do this in this House. I do not think it is the place for the administration of justice to be approached in this way. I think there is a better way to do it.

An hon. member: How?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I shall tell you.

I must make it clear I do not come strictly to the defence of the magistrate. I admit, since I must speak to the subject, I admit that the magistrate's court is not conducted always, and perhaps quite frequently is not conducted, in the most dignified and best way, that there is discourtesy. There is evidence of it.

I cannot find, however, great evidence of a denial of justice and it is on this point that I wish to speak and then tell the House what steps are being taken and were being taken. I did suggest to the hon. member that I felt this question should not be in this House, that we could deal with it in another manner and I will come to that.

In the McHarg case, the case of the girl who was 19 years old, one of the newspapers said she was denied the right of a remand. This was not so.

Mr. Singer: On a point of order. I am sure my hon. friend will permit to say this. I did not mention that case at all.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member did not mention the name, but he read many newspaper clippings which distinctly referred to it—many of them.

The young lady in question came up for hearing on January 6, 1965. The case was remanded to January 21. It was further adjourned to February 5 and then again adjourned to February 19, and on February 19 was heard. She was accompanied by her mother, but not with counsel. So there were three opportunities for remand which were given and taken, and when the young lady came up there was a hearing. I got the transcript of the evidence and read it very carefully and had it reviewed very thoroughly. There was nothing in that hearing that indicated any miscarriage or any denial of justice in any respect.

The transcript is here; I do not propose to read it all.

After the evidence—

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister would permit a question on that particular case? As far as the administration of justice goes, does the McHarg case not seem to be a stupid decision? Just a strictly stupid decision?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is a question on which I will reserve judgment for a moment; perhaps the hon. member might reserve his judgment until I have finished a few more remarks upon it.

After the evidence had been heard, the Court—this is Magistrate Dnieper, I am reading from page seven of the transcript—said:

Miss McHarg, you now have the opportunity of calling witnesses on your own behalf and giving testimony yourself on your behalf. You are not required to do so, but you may if you wish. Do you wish to give testimony, call testimony, either, neither or both, madame?

The Accused: No.

The Court: Thank you. Do you wish to produce no evidence?

The Accused: No.

The Court: Pardon?

The Accused: No.

The Court: No what? No, you don't wish to produce it or what?

A very determined effort to find out exactly what the accused was saying.

The Accused: I don't want to give any testimony.

The Court: Is there anything then that you wish to say to the court in connection with your guilt or innocence by way of argument?

The Accused: No.

The Court: Thank you. There will be a conviction.

Now at this point the Crown attorney, who was Martin Kelso—the hon. member for Downsview has referred to him as a very fair, capable lawyer. He was acting as Crown attorney. At this point I should like to—

Mr. Singer: Who is the Crown attorney?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Martin Kelso, QC!

At this point I should like to say this, and I say it out of my own experience having been a Crown attorney and I say it out of my knowledge as a lawyer, of our administration of justice and our attitude toward the law. It is the duty and the obligation of a Crown attorney being in the court to see that justice is done. We have a saying, as I am sure the members of the legal profession are well aware: "The Crown never wins; the Crown never loses."

Mr. Trotter: Does the hon. Attorney General call that sentence justice?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Will the hon. member reserve his judgment for a moment?

Mr. Martin Kelso was present in the case that the hon. member cited and I just mention that there is a duty on the Crown, whether the accused is defended or not, there is a duty on the Crown to see that justice is done and to stand between a magistrate, if necessary, and an accused, whether he has a defence counsel beside him or not.

Mr. Martin Kelso got into the hearing when the Court said there would be a conviction:

The Crown: I have her record —

This is where it is distasteful to me to cite this young girl in this House, but I think it is necessary.

I have her record which shows that on the 13th of December, 1963, she was convicted of drinking under age—this was a year previous:

—and fined $10 or five days. On the 13th of June, 1964, she was convicted of a similar offence and fined $15 or three days; and on the 14th of October, 1964, she was again convicted and fined $25 or five days.

So this is the fourth offence now before the court.

The Court: Is that correct, madame?

Asking the girl.

The Accused: Yes.

The Court: Is there anything you would like to say to your sentence?

The Accused: No.

The Court: Any criminal record?

The Accused: Yes.

Now we have had three offences for drinking under age going back over a period of years.

The Court: May I have it, please?

The Accused: I was charged in 1963 with theft under, and in 1965, theft under.

It is significant to note the words "theft under." That means a charge for stealing goods under $50 in value. This young lady had been twice convicted and she is quite familiar with the expression, she just says theft under twice. But her mother was there—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): She needed help!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: She needed help. Now bear with me.

The Court said:

Were you convicted on those charges?

The girl replied:

I was charged, you see, in 1963 with theft under, and in 1965, theft under.

The Court: Were you convicted on those charges?

The Accused: Yes.

The Court: What was the penalty on the second one?

The Accused: The first time it was a $25 fine, the second time it was ten days in jail.

The Court: With whom were you at the tavern?

She named a young lady and, if you will allow me, I will not mention this lady's name, for her sake.

The Court: Is she a frequent companion of yours?

The Accused: Not any more; she got married.

And I would like to spare the publicity.

The Court: She what?

The Accused: She got married.

The Court: Do you know Miss [Blank's] criminal record?

The Accused: Yes.

The Court: Good or bad?

The Accused: Bad.

The Court: Why do you hang around with her?

Now here is where perhaps you will see where the Court was trying to find out what to do.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Why in the world did he not get a probation officer's report? Why did he not get a pre-sentence report instead of all that nonsense of questioning this girl?

Mr. Trotter: Exactly!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not defending it I said; I want you to understand the facts.

Mr. Sopha: If he wanted to help the girl, the way to do it was to get a pre-sentence report.

Mr. Trotter: Another 30 days in Mercer.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: To continue:

The Court: Why do you hang around with her?

The Accused: We went to school together.

The Court: If she goes to hell, will you go with her?

I do not defend this language:

The Accused: No.

The Court: If she jumped in the lake, would you jump in too?

The Accused: No.

The Court: What will it take, Miss McHarg, to indicate to you that you are not to do this?

Is there anything you would like to say Mr. Kelso?

Now here is where the Crown performs.

The Crown: She seems to be fairly persistent. When the police tried to serve the subpoena on her mother, she lied to them, and I would suggest that a jail term would do her good.

This is the Crown attorney who has been described as a very capable and fair man. I express no opinion.

The Court: Have you anything to say on these comments? What are you doing now, Miss McHarg?

The Accused: I am not working.

The Court: I am rather inclined to think that Mr. Kelso's suggestion of a jail term is correct. How long a term do you think would be sufficient to prevent you in the future from doing this?

The Accused: I don't know.

The Court: Is your mother working?

The Accused: Yes.

The Court: What does she work at? Is she going to pay your fine?

The Accused: No.

The Court: Well, who has been paying your fine?

The Accused: I went to jail.

The Court: It will be $100 or 30 days.

Now, all I have done is to recite the facts and I think I must express this opinion, that on that case alone which received a great deal of publicity and on which there was a great deal of newspaper commentary, there was no conduct which could be called misconduct on the part of the magistrate. In order to set the record straight I have taken some time on that particular transcript.

Mr. Trotter: I just want to mention on that case—and this I think might come under another estimate of the administration of justice, but since it has been brought up here I would just like to say this. A former Attorney General, now the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), I think once suggested to this House that people who are charged with liquor offences should be treated in a different manner than we treat them under our law at the present time.

It is no wonder that the chances of the average person in Ontario going to jail are eight times greater than they are in the United Kingdom, simply because of the way we administer justice and treat accused having to do with liquor offences. If there is any hope of ever getting that girl or similar people out of the sausage mill at the city hall, the thing is to have a pre-sentence report, or to at least have some sufficiently strong probation system, where these people are put back on their feet.

Once they start at that age, at an age when you can reform them or do something with them, that is the time to help them. Otherwise you are going to be keeping them in our institutions as long as they live.

To my mind that case which you have brought up—and it was not the hon. member for Downsview, I do not think he mentioned it—but to my mind that case is indicative of how ridiculous some of the decisions are. Whether it is the fault of the magistrate or not it is certainly the fault of the system. Essentially it is the fault of the provincial government, the way we administer justice here in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would go a long way in agreement—

Mr. Trotter: Why does the hon. Attorney General not do something?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —with the hon. member for Parkdale.

Mr. Trotter: You and the former Minister—you have been there for 23 years—why do you not do something?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have been here much less than 23 years. I have not had time to do all the things I would like to do yet. But let me say this to you, that there come across my desk quite frequently, applications for clemency, many of them for persons who have been convicted for drunkenness, and repeating and repeating and repeating—foolscap sheets full of convictions over a period of a few months or a year. These things cause me great concern. They are convicted and given $10 or 20 days, $10 or 30 days, or $20 or 60 days, and then the magistrate sees the list lengthening out, repeated and repeated and repeated. And the 10 days is up and on the 11th day there is another conviction, $10 or 30 days, and the 30 days is up and the conviction follows, $10 or 90 days, which is the limit. Then they appeal, "Let me out, I have got a job to go to." And I investigate them; it is a great effort to refuse an appeal for clemency. But the magistrates' courts and the police, the Crown attorneys, when I investigate, say to me. "If you let him out our experience is that he will be back, the police will just be dragging him in tomorrow night." And I know that in many cases—in many, many cases—this is so.

Mr. Bryden: Well, after 90 days they will anyway.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, in the 90 days they do, at least to some extent, dry out, but there are several things that bother me, and I must say this to the House. They are kept by the country for 90 days. That is one thing, at a great deal of expense. We do not yet have the facilities to treat them and cure them if they are capable of being cured; and I must admit, from my experience, I think a great many of them are incapable of being fully cured of this habit. But we are not, and I agree with the hon. member for Parkdale, we are not equipped. Perhaps we are not treating our drunks, our drunken habitués, properly, but it is a problem we are struggling with and I assure you I am very much concerned with it. I do not know the answer as I stand here tonight. But I went through that case, through certain facts on the record, to set them right, and I want to say this further, with respect to Magistrate Dnieper, I do not defend, as I have said, all his performance in court, but the matter is under consideration. I am aware of section 3 of The Magistrates Act, I know what has to be done if it comes to that. If I feel that is necessary I can recommend it, but I propose to continue my investigation and proceed in the way I am proceeding, and I shall have to leave it at that.

With respect to Magistrate McClevis, I must refer to this, because there are facts here which are not on the record. It was a very complete trial and I am going, at the outset, to say this, that the complaint was made by a very eminent lawyer, Mr. Douglas H. Carruthers, whose name was not mentioned by the hon. member for Downsview. He defended Mr. Strader on the charge of careless driving before Magistrate McClevis in September, 1963. There was a conviction and a fine of $300. The charge was, I think, as I have said, careless driving, and in the interim and before any record had been made or any minute endorsed on the record, there was a change of solicitors and a Mr. A. J. McNabb, QC, was consulted by the accused, the convicted. He went to see the magistrate and the magistrate, having heard his plea on behalf of this convicted person, decided not to suspend the licence. The fine was paid.

I may say this, and I am going to make it brief, Chief Magistrate Klein was instructed to investigate in December of last year. While there is nothing in my hon. friend's file to indicate that he was investigating through the early part of this year, he did so, and there is a record here to show that before March 1 he had made quite a thorough investigation. He was instructed by myself to investigate further and he did so.

The magistrate made a statement and he said—speaking of the accused, at the time he came back after his conviction:

When he came into my office he was in tears. He told me about his mother, about the two farms. These two farms were far apart which he had to travel to. He said he would be absolutely up against it if he lost his licence. I said, "You will have to see your lawyer." He said, "He took me to the cleaners and I fired him." I said, "You will still have to see your lawyer." He said, "All right," and he left.

Now, this is from material when the appeal was being considered.

That is all the conversation I had with him. He was very decent about it. His licence at the time was on my desk; it had not been endorsed; no particulars of the conviction had been typed on it. In the normal course the licence and conviction slip would be sent to Toronto within three or four days depending on how busy the staff was. I have two women in my office, one of whom is the court reporter.

And then later he says:

Subsequently I decided to cancel the suspension. I gave the licence back to Mr. McNabb, the other lawyer, one day when he was in my office. I don't know anything about any erasure or anything on the licence. I couldn't say for sure whether I told the Crown attorney that I was going to cancel the suspension. I have cancelled the suspension in similar circumstances in four or five cases over the last 20 years.

Now, he further states, and this is for what it is worth:

Mr. W. Freeborn, the late Crown attorney for the county of Bruce, advised me some years ago that such a practice was proper, and I remember him citing some authority.

This is the magistrate's statement. I have not read it all but it is all here for anyone who cares to see it.

Mr. Singer: Does the hon. Attorney General think it is proper?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have not finished yet. I will tell you what I think when I have finished.

Magistrate Klein wrote me a very full and complete memorandum of the law, very complete and very thorough, running to some seven pages. And then he wrote on March 31, the last paragraph of his letter:

One would think it possible that the magistrate's staff had written the endorsement by hand and that it was subsequently erased by the magistrate's staff for some reason, perhaps by mistake or by somebody else, perhaps the accused, after the magistrate had said he had cancelled the suspension and had handed it back.

That was part, the last paragraph of that letter.

And then further in his letter of March 26, he ends a two-page letter of comment, discussion, advice. The last paragraph reads:

I do not think that there is a prima facie case of misbehaviour on the part of the magistrate, or of inability to perform his duties properly, or that there is any evidence to warrant the appointment of a Supreme Court judge to make an inquiry under section 3 of The Magistrates Act.

Further to that, just to complete this story, I read now from Tremear's annotated Criminal Code, the edition of 1964 at page 1524, notes to section 713 of the code, and the heading is: "Amendment of Minute." Everyone will recognize that Tremear is the authority, one of the authorities certainly.

Mr. Sopha: And Cranshaw!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps Mr. Cranshaw, he may have the same comment. But this is the note:

It has been said [this is the law] that so long as the formal conviction has not been drawn up the magistrate has a locus poenitentiae—

I will have to ask the hon. member for Sudbury, perhaps, to translate that for me:

—has a locus poenitentiae to change his minute of adjudication so that it will accord with his actual adjudication, or so as to omit something illegal. . . .

Apart from statutory regulation the law permits the justice to make a verbal conviction which is subject to reconsideration so long as no formal conviction is drawn up.

Now, the magistrate was frank to admit that he has done this on a number of occasions, the note goes on:

I know of nothing to prevent the magistrate—

These are backed up by citation of cases.

I know of nothing to prevent the magistrate from correcting in the minute any mistake he may have made in computing the costs.

Mr. Singer: Or of changing; that is not the way you read it the first time.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I read further. Yes.

Mr. Singer: What page is it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will read the language again for my hon. friend.

It has been said that so long as the formal conviction has not been drawn up the magistrate has a locus poenitentiae to change his minute of adjudication so that it will accord with his actual adjudication, or so as to omit something illegal, by distress not authorized of the statute. Apart from statutory regulation, the law permits the justice to make a verbal conviction which is subject to reconsideration so long as no formal conviction is drawn up.

Mr. Singer: What is a formal conviction then?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I take it it is the record, whatever the record may be in such a case.

Mr. Singer: The transcript? The record that goes to the county court judge—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Now, there were two Latin words in what I read, a "locus poenitentiae." It is interesting how another language will throw some light on this. The definition of those words in Mozley and Whiteley's law dictionary is this:

Locus poenitentiae—A place or chance of repentance, a phrase generally applied to a power of drawing back from a bargain before anything has been done to confirm it in law.

The criminal code says a magistrate has a place of repentance and he took it.

Mr. Singer: Oh, come now, you are reaching. There is nothing in the dictionary describing this sort of legal argument.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The law dictionary, the dictionary of law.

Mr. Trotter: Is there a place for repentance for Attorneys General?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The chief magistrate investigated and he says there is no place for such as the hon. member asks should be done here. The law supports him. The magistrate says, "I did not erase anything or enter anything on the record or on the licence." And he says, "I have had advice from the Crown attorney and I have done this occasionally over the past 20 years."

Mr. Singer: Well, may I ask again, sir: Is it your opinion that once a sentence has been given in open court that it can be changed?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: My opinion—now the hon. member has asked it, I will give it to him. I would say this—this is my own thinking—I think that a magistrate would have the right to do so. I think it is clear that he has the right to do so.

I think that the proper way to do it, having made a conviction and having assessed the penalty, that the proper way to do it is to notify the Crown attorney and notify the accused and have both the Crown and the accused back in open court and to there do it. I think he would be perfectly justified in so doing. But I do not think the fact that he did not follow that procedure makes him subject to the severe type of castigation that the hon. member throws upon him.

Mr. Singer: May I just suggest to the hon. Attorney General that if it was just a question of method, of nicety, that I would not have brought this before the House—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not think the hon. member should have.

Mr. Singer: But if, sir, as I suggest here, that there was something more in it than appears on the surface—and I think there was—I am sorry.

If there was nothing more in it than that to which the hon. Attorney General alludes, why then was neither The Department of Transport in Toronto, which has the official record, not notified; and why was the Crown attorney, who I would imagine is in almost daily touch with this particular magistrate, not notified before he went before the county court judge on the appeal? And why was there no indication at all given to the county court judge that this had in fact been changed?

With great regret I again suggest to my hon. friend that the facts just do not add up. Here you have a small community where the judicial officials—the Crown attorney, the magistrate, the county court judge, the police—are in frequent contact with each other, where appeals are not the run of the mill, where are unusual matters. Where the county court judge when he sits in appeal on the decision of the magistrate, certainly has available to him immediately, quickly and easily, all of the facts. And the Crown attorney—and my hon. friend probably has the Crown attorney's name there, I have it somewhere in my files—but the Crown attorney, if he was doing his job—and there is no suggestion he was not—certainly would have known if there was anything before the court that was not in accordance with the record.

But he went to the court and he argued the appeal on the basis of the conviction that the record showed and the sentence that the record showed. The decision given by His Honour, the county court judge, was in accordance with the facts as I stated them.

I say that the hon. Attorney General is trying to make a case out of whole cloth by taking the legal dictionary's definition, and trying to put it in the middle of Tremear, and add up to something that really is not there.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Just to close the matter, I trust, I would say that Chief Magistrate Klein in this very thorough investigation he carried on, was before The Department of Transport and did discuss these things with the Crown attorney. I think the appeal was carried on by Mr. Carruthers—

Mr. Singer: Yes, that is right, that is the man who apparently you said was fired and he came back to the appeal.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, he came back for the appeal, so he certainly was aware of all the facts. Furthermore the appeal would only be against the conviction. So I do not know what further might have been brought out in this matter than has been brought out in this whole, thorough investigation.

Mr. Singer: But the record—the order of the appeal—I read it, I have the original order here with the court's seal on it, and it lists the cancellation of the licence. Now if it did not exist, how could it possibly be listed?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Carruthers was the lawyer on the appeal. He would know this.

Mr. Singer: The Crown attorney would know and the judge would know it. Everybody knew it except Chief Magistrate Klein.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, there is one thing the hon. Attorney General says that rather surprised me. If an accused is found guilty and fined a certain amount of money and given 30 days to pay, am I to understand that maybe 15 days afterwards, like 15 days before the fine has been paid, the magistrate can notify the Crown attorney, notify the accused, to come back into court and reduce it?

Mr. Singer: That is what you are saying!

Mr. Trotter: That is what you are saying, because it could work both ways. The magistrate could call him back in and say, "I didn't fine you enough, I am going to double it."

When does the case end? I cannot understand your explanation.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member for Parkdale, I believe, is a lawyer?

Mr. Trotter: Yes, I am a lawyer.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I was asked my opinion and I think the cases are clear, that before the record is endorsed, before the conviction is entered—

Mr. Singer: On what?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: On the record, or wherever the magistrate—

Mr. Trotter: They put the stamp on right away in most courts—

Mr. Singer: What record are you talking about?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The same record that Tremear is talking about—information or whatever it may be.

Mr. Singer: Was there no endorsement on that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let me answer the hon. member for Parkdale. Before the conviction is entered, I say, and the cases are clear, the presiding judge or magistrate is in a position where he may repent or reconsider. I say the only thing he did wrong here was that he did not do it in open court. The proper procedure to do would have been to call back the Crown, to call back the accused, to say: "I fined that man $300. On second thought I am not going to enter that on the record, I am going to reduce it to $200"; and I think perhaps he could say: "I am going to increase it $500."

Mr. Trotter: Why the administration of justice would be in chaos, absolute chaos! It is silly; it is ridiculous.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is what Tremear says may be done.

Mr. Trotter: Oh, nonsense, I have never heard such an argument.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, get the book and read it.

Mr. Singer: We listened very carefully when you read it.

Mr. Trotter: It does not make sense.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would just say this in passing, on the remarks of the hon. member for Downsview, that I do not consider his comments criticisms of The Department of the Attorney General at all. To pick out and criticize one magistrate's court, or the performance of a magistrate and then another, I do not think bears or impinges very clearly or definitely upon the performance of The Department of the Attorney General.

Mr. Trotter: If the ground rules are just as you have set down, it is a wonder you are not in complete chaos.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You may wonder, but all that we have from the hon. member for Downsview was a criticism of the performance of a magistrate in, as he admits, one particular case particularly; and that of another magistrate in the the case with which I have just dealt.

I should like to say to the hon. member for Riverdale that I was much impressed with the learned dissertation he gave and I should like to compliment him upon it, particularly the discussion on the conseil d'état. If I may start at that portion of his address, I would say this: I think the comments about the conseil d'état are quite proper, quite correct; but I do not believe they apply in an administration of justice such as ours which is very different from the French system, particularly on the matter of onus in criminal matters; and in a system of responsible government such as we have, which also, as history particularly over recent years has shown, is much more stable than the French system, although both are democracies. I do not think those remarks are particularly relevant in our system of jurisprudence, in our administration of justice.

I appreciate the remarks with respect to the report of the committee on legal aid. In tabling that report in this House, sir, I did suggest that I thought it unlikely that we would be able to present legislation this session. While I would be glad if this were possible, I think the report deserves some further study. Not only the very competent and capable study which was done by the committee, which was a joint committee of the law society and of officials of my own department, but I think the legal profession generally and government must study this, because as you will appreciate the suggestion, the recommendation, calls for a very large, substantial contribution of funds to carry on the legal aid system.

I think we must be fair enough to ask for time to decide how much money—and nobody has yet been able to tell us just how much this will cost—how much money is going to be required to put this recommendation into operation, if we decide to move to that extent, or where that money is to be found. I think, therefore, the session having reached this stage of the year, I do not want to indicate that I shall present legislation at this session.

I am somewhat surprised to find the hon. member criticizing the report of the committee on securities legislation. I thought, and I still think, that that is an excellent report. A very capable, a very thorough study, bringing forward recommendations which are certainly new. If I heard the hon. member right he suggested that we were not breaking any new ground in this. But I find in that report suggestions for legislation with respect to insider trading, takeover bids, disclosure of information, proxy solicitation and many things for which we have no legislation at this time in this province. I think—

Mr. Singer: On this point I agree with you, I just want to see your legislation—

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, perhaps the hon. Attorney General did not hear me properly. I said that I would save my remarks on that report until the Ontario securities commission vote came forward. My only point was that it does not compare in any way with the legal aid report in terms of the research and study that went into it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think we shall just have to differ in a good-natured way on that opinion, because I must disagree with the hon. member.

The hon. member mentioned that the subject of organized crime had disappeared from discussion, something for which I say we should all be very glad. I do not think anyone would be so bold as to say that crime of one kind or another does not exist in every society and that it is likely to pass away. I think there will always be criminal elements, on our border and within our borders, seeking to take advantage of any lack of vigilance on our part and we must continue, therefore, to be vigilant.

All I would say in this regard is that I believe it was well expressed in the report of the police commission that the best way to fight crime, the best way to be protected against crime, the best way to prevent its inroads, to keep it down, is to have a strong and a capable and a vigilant police force; well trained, well qualified, well disciplined and with a high morale; and that I think we have. We have recruited additional numbers to that force, we have added an intelligence section to our police commission. We have added advisors, we have built up a force of which I think we may certainly be proud.

We have—and this I have always contended is an element in dealing with crime—an independent judiciary. This we have. One that is free of any suggestion that it is open to bribery or influence or corruption. This, I say, we have.

And most important of all, we have a population, a citizenry, who demand of their officials, of their courts, of their police, of their politicians, a high standard of conduct.

If you have those three things I think you need not fear too much that crime will gain a place of menace in your society.

As to the matter of the invasion of privacy which the hon. member for Riverdale mentioned, I think I shall leave my remarks until we come to debate the bill on security guards and private investigators.

I think with those comments I have covered most of the points I wish to deal with in these opening criticisms.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make about something on which I apologize somewhat to start with; because as all hon. members know I am certainly not a lawyer, but I am going to bring up something that I think has a great deal to do with the administration of justice in the province of Ontario.

During the past number of years—for many years—the number of which I do not know, there have been quite a number of people in the province of Ontario, clients of the legal profession who have lost a great deal of money. Now the first thing, Mr. Chairman, that I must do—because I think in my own party I have six members of the legal profession, and there is one in the New Democratic Party and innumerable members of that profession on the government side—so therefore I must be very careful in what I say.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 207 is the one you want.

Mr. Whicher: No, I do not think so. I think this deals, Mr. Chairman, with the administration of justice, and I think the hon. Attorney General will be glad to hear it right here. I am not going to take long, Mr. Chairman.

The fact is that over a period of a number of years, and particularly in the last four or five, many clients of several lawyers, members of the legal profession in this province, have lost large sums of money.

Now I do not think this is right, Mr. Chairman. I think that people in this province deserve all the protection that the law will give them, whether they happen to be dairymen, whether they happen to be real estate people, whether they happen to be treasurers of various municipalities in the province, or treasurers of school boards, or whatever it may be. If, for example, some treasurer absconds with some money in some area, some municipality in this province, that treasurer is bonded so that the municipality get back the money with which he absconds.

I can bring this business into this Legislature, because I happen to be a dairy owner myself. If any dairy owner in the province of Ontario either steals money or goes into bankruptcy, either through his own fault or maybe through no fault of his own is unable to pay the people from whom he buys milk, then that man is bonded and there is not one milk producer in this province who has ever lost any money, to my knowledge, because of the fact that a dairy operator went bankrupt or stole the money or whatever it might be.

The same is true, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to real estate operators, and many other people in this province who are bonded. But unfortunately, as far as the legal profession—and I have to be most careful here, because my very good friend, the hon. member for Sudbury is right next to me and very close to him is the hon. member for Downsview, who perhaps do not agree with me.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Do not be afraid of them.

Mr. Whicher: I am not, sir, I assure you.

I agree, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. members of this Legislature, and in fact probably 99 point some per cent of the members of the legal profession in the province of Ontario are honourable, honest men. But no matter how honourable and honest any profession may be, there is always one rotten apple, if not in one barrel in two or three barrels.

The facts are this, that in the province there have been several crooked lawyers in each and every year for the past number. In being crooked and stealing their clients' funds, they have hurt these people, and in many instances have taken large sums away from them.

Now the law society, as I understand it—and I certainly stand to be corrected in what I say here—but as I understand it, the law society asked each member of the legal profession to donate $100 to the compensation fund.

An hon. member: It is hardly a donation.

Mr. Singer: We have no choice.

An hon. member: If you do not pay it, you do not practise.

Mr. Whicher: There is a requisition comes forth for $100 from the law society of Upper Canada. I believe that in years past this requisition was perhaps $25 to $50, and I believe at the present time it is $100, which is used for people, under a committee of the law society of Upper Canada, as it is called, to give funds back to clients who have lost money through the misappropriation of lawyers who want to leave the country or get rich in a hurry.

Now I have nothing against that whatsoever, if the $100 that is requisitioned by my hon. friends who happen to be barristers in this House would cover the situation. But of course, Mr. Chairman, as everyone knows, and particularly those people, those hon. gentlemen who are sitting in the House who help to donate to the cause, this $100 is not by any means enough to look after the funds that have been misappropriated by crooked lawyers in the province of Ontario.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Take more from the honest lawyers!

Mr. Whicher: That could be true. That is what I am going to suggest in just a minute.

Now in the Ontario reports in 1964, volume one, which incidentally is dated March 26, 1964, and which deals with the law society of Upper Canada, there are some very interesting figures. For example, it shows the amount of money that was paid out by the discipline committee for application for grants from the compensation fund in the past year, in the year 1963. You might be interested to know that there was $108,000 paid out on behalf of the law society to clients of lawyers who had misappropriated funds in this province.

I think this is a great sum, but unfortunately it is not nearly enough; because in the same year, 1963—I am using their figures, Mr. Chairman—there are accounts totalling $1,503,000 that have not as yet, as of December 31, 1963, been disposed of. When I look at the amount of the fund, that is the fund that the members of the legal profession of the province of Ontario pay into, I find that at the moment there is only $319,000 on hand to look after a possible claim of over $1.5 million.

Mr. Chairman, this is simply not good enough. I can think of no other profession—not one—I can think of no other business where the clients of the people, whether they be milk producers—in whom I am interested primarily as a dairy operator in the province of Ontario—I can think of no profession or no business, other than the legal profession in this province, where clients can be hurt, and hurt so badly.

Some of these claims that were to be disposed at the end of 1963, of which there were 30 with a total of $1.5 million—one of them here I see is for $292,000. Another one is for $228,000; $148,000; $237,000. Mr. Chairman, these are figures that can hurt the largest estate in this province and it is not fair.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Even a political party suffers from it.

Mr. Whicher: Even a political party! I am glad to hear, Mr. Chairman, that the House leader agrees with me.

Mr. MacDonald: As so often, you are incorrect.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It affects the working of democracy.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, it affects many people from whom these funds are stolen. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Attorney General think about this situation. I know it may be somewhat embarrassing because, of course, he is a member of that profession and a very learned one, he is the first law officer of this province. But I just bring to his mind this, that if people who engage in real estate transactions, the real estate operator, the real estate agent, whoever he may be, their books are looked into at certain opportunities during the year, and that man is bonded to a certain extent. I know that the legal profession is a great one. I think any politician would be foolish to cast any aspersions whatsoever against it.

Of course, you are great, and you are all honourable, men; but let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that real estate operators are also honourable men, the treasurers of all the municipalities are honourable. The dairy operators, for example, if you wish to forget about myself—

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): You go too far.

Mr. Whicher: Let us talk, for example, about dairies such as Silverwood Dairies or Borden's Dairies. These people are all bonded, worth millions of dollars, so that their producers under no circumstances will be hurt.

Therefore, I suggest to you, that the lawyers of the province of Ontario should be bonded so that no client can ever be hurt. There may be some thought, Mr. Chairman, that young lawyers starting into practice might have some trouble being bonded. This, of course, is ridiculous, because it is quite possible to have a master bond for all of the legal profession in the province of Ontario. I assure you that the bond will be very low indeed, because that is the way it is worked out as far as other professions or other businessmen are concerned in this province.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would with the most respect ask the hon. Attorney General, and respectfully I ask that none of my learned colleagues or very learned friends from the government side, who are legal and have much more knowledge about this than I have, that they do not stand up now and tear me apart, because I am asking this most sincerely. I think that your clients deserve the same respect as my milk producers do, or whoever else it may be in this province.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Bruce for bringing the matter into this debate. I think I should say this to him, that it is a matter which gives the legal profession great concern. I say that not just as Attorney General but as a member of that profession.

I think it is fair to say this, however, that the profession, as far as I am aware, is the only profession which of its own voluntary law-making powers assesses itself in anything of this nature to take care of its clientele. True, other establishments, in other types of mercantile business, the persons who handle funds are bonded.

I think it is fair to say this also, that so far as the records show I think there has not yet been a claim made against the law society funds where it has been proven and established to be one arising out of a solicitor-and-client relationship that has not been paid. You cited a figure of a million and some hundreds of thousands of dollars of claims. But the record shows that the claims are greatly exaggerated, that apart from that a great number of them do not arise out of the solicitor-and-client relationship at all and that, as I say, the record shows that every claim that has been proven to be on the basis of a solicitor-and-client relationship has been met from that fund.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, could I ask one question?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let me just say this further.

If a dairyman took from one of his producers $10,000 to invest in a mortgage and failed to invest it and bought a Cadillac and went to Florida, the bond that he carries on under would not pay that claim. The dairyman is bonded for the debts that he owes in the course of his business to his producers, but if he gets into the business of taking funds for investment, he is not bonded for that.

Mr. Whicher: That is stealing.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is stealing, precisely; and the lawyer goes to jail. I just read last week of four years, I believe, for one of our colleagues.

Mr. Singer: One of our brethren.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: While I am on my feet I want to say this. The books of every lawyer, the books of every law firm, are audited; and are audited without notice. The law society sends its auditors in unannounced and they do an audit. Every law firm is covered and the assessment is not a donation; it is a demand and we pay it. I would like to say this, as a matter of interest, I said to the treasurer this year—a couple of months ago: "I do not practise law any more, I have no money belonging to clients and I have no obligation to clients." I guess it was my Scottish ancestry coming to the fore—and he said "Pay."

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, might I ask the hon. Attorney General how many auditors he has making these spot audits, because according to his book I am going to tell him—I do not want to ask questions that are the least bit sneaky—but according to his own book he only has one auditor. This is what it says here:

The committee considered correspondence with members of the profession and from two county law associations recommending the appointment of more auditors and the extension of the policy of spot audit. This policy is already in effect and the society is presently looking for a second auditor for permanent staff.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I agree that in the city of Toronto—perhaps I am wrong here—that in the city of Toronto you may have spot audits, but I suggest that in many areas of rural Ontario—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All through the province!

Mr. Whicher:—there are lawyers who have never had an audit. This is what I suggest to the hon. Attorney General.

There is one thing further that I would like to say. The hon. Attorney General suggested that the claims are sometimes greatly exaggerated. I would be the first to agree but I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Attorney General would also agree that in some instances claims are as they should be. Is it not true that no claim over $25,000 has ever been paid by the law society of the province of Ontario? Is it not true that if there were a legitimate claim, and supposing you had the money for $100,000, that that estate, that man, that client would only receive $25,000, even though it is completely legitimate and had been stolen by the lawyer from his client?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All I say is that there is sufficient in the fund so far to pay all claims that have been proven to be legitimate.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I say this most humbly and strictly as a layman, but I tell you—the fellow is dead now—but in the town of Wiarston a lawyer absconded with $40,000, he stole it, and the client did not receive one single, solitary red cent. Now, it may be true that the hon. Attorney General—I am sure that he is giving the facts and figures as he is aware of them—but I am saying this as a member of this House, in the town of Wiarston a lawyer absconded with $40,000 and the people concerned did not get 40 cents in return for it. This, Mr. Chairman, is wrong, and the honourable legal profession, not only in this House but in the province of Ontario, should admit it. They should be bonded, so that their clients are protected.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can only say this, that I attended the meeting of the law society this year at Niagara Falls, I heard the report of the treasurer and he was justifying to us the assessment which had been increased; the amount of $100 that we were asked to pay and required to pay if we were to practise law. I think he did say, I am quite certain he said, that no claim which had been proven to be in the nature of a solicitor-and-client relationship, where fraud or defalcation had taken place, had not been met; that every such claim had been met.

I believe he did say in that report a couple of months ago, I think he did say that henceforth, with the size of some of the claims which are coming forward, he was recommending that a maximum for any single claim be $25,000.

Mr. Bryden: It has been that all along.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not sure of that; but I do not treat this lightly, I think it is a serious thing. We lawyers have put forward suggestions that we be bonded. I know that when I practised law I would have been happy to be bonded. I carried a type of bonding or insurance to cover errors I might make. But I do not think that bond companies, when you are in a trust situation with varying amounts of trust money coming into your hands, I do not think it is possible to get bond companies to take that type of risk.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister a question. It comes from a layman—myself. Perhaps it should be addressed to the law society, because I suspect the responsibility rests with them. But I am a bit curious to find out, where there has been acknowledged or proven misappropriation of funds, whether action is taken beyond a reprimand.

An hon. member: It is up to the client.

Mr. MacDonald: You say it is up to the client concerned to charge them and bring it before the court. But to get back to the disciplinary action—I am referring to a case which is out in the open so I am not reviving something that is not known—the case of a former bencher with the law society, E. F. S. Sanders, QC, of St. Thomas. In the December 31, 1964 issue of the law society's publication there was a report of the disciplinary committee which read as follows:

The committee reported that after due inquiry it found the solicitor guilty of professional misconduct and conduct unbecoming a barrister and solicitor in that he procured a sum of money for himself or his firm by misrepresentation made to the solicitor for the purchaser in a real estate transaction, and recommends that the solicitor be reprimanded in convocation and the fact of his having been reprimanded be published in the Ontario report.

It seems to me that if there is this problem within the profession, it may be an invitation to it continuing or even getting worse if, in some instances—particularly if it happens to be a very well-established person; a former bencher—there is only a reprimand even after an acknowledged misappropriation of funds. What is the hon. Attorney General's comment?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would say to the hon. member that I do not know if there was actually misappropriation there; there may have been, but I doubt it. He secured funds, I think—if the hon. member has read it—by misrepresentation to a purchaser of property. He got it for his firm and I do not know how he would go about that except by suggesting that the price was more than it was, or something of that sort, or he got a larger commission or some share of it by directing the deal in a certain direction.

I would say only this, that the benchers, who are elected to govern the law society, I think, are men who are without exception—I am sorry to hear of this exception—so far as I have ever known them, they are men of the highest probity and character. They are the people who bring before them anyone on any complaint made by a member of the public or by a client or by a fellow lawyer, of another solicitor's or lawyer's misconduct, and I would say that I would go before them in fear and trembling, even if the complaint had nothing behind it, because it is an extremely severe body to face in the matter of discipline.

How serious this was it is hard to say from what the hon. member has given me, but I think it is generally recognized that if there is any suggestion of misappropriation or theft, that lawyer does not stand one chance of not being disbarred, at least for some considerable time.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Chairman, I would like to mention this, because while I have not been in active practice I have kept up my Bar fees, but I must say that when this reached the point of $100, along with the Bar fees, I began to wonder just why I should be paying that amount of money every year for people who are certainly not particularly deserving of my support for getting away with other people's money, and in—

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister is a bencher.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Yes, ex officio, but I may say that I do not meddle with their affairs as long as I am in public life, as I am at the present time. I occasionally eat a meal there. But I must say that I got disturbed about this to a point where over the last six or eight months, I have had communications with—or on my behalf communications have been made with—comparable bodies to the benchers in the various states of the Union, in various Commonwealth countries and in Great Britain itself.

I find that the question of bonding has not been developed to a point where it is in practice anywhere else in the whole world, with the exception of two places. One of them is, I think, the state of Vermont, where they put a small limitation, as I recall it, on the amount involved in the case of loss. It has not been regarded by the governing body there as a satisfactory method.

In Great Britain they now charge about £20 for solicitors, and they have a fund that, I think, is meeting the situation, but the charge is lower than in Ontario.

Alberta has recently started a fund, something like our own here. There are some places where there is no fund at all, and at the moment, so far as contributions are concerned by individual members, the rate as far as I can find out in Ontario, $100 is the highest anywhere that I have been able to determine.

One of the problems with regard to bonding—apart from the fact that it would be apparently impractical or impossible to get a bond to cover everybody for any amount—is that the best you could hope for would be to get something like the old unsatisfied judgment type of fund which had a very definite limitation on it. The trouble is that when this fund gets insolvent in the way that the hon. member for Bruce mentioned, it is because some very large defalcations take place in respect to certain individuals. The amounts are way out of line, with top figures of $5,000 or $10,000 or something of that sort, which is the normal top amount in ordinary bonding.

Another disadvantage of bonding, as seen by governing bodies, is the fact that if you were to put lawyers generally in the position that they have to get a bond before they can practice, there could be discrimination in the sense that the insurance companies—the bonding companies—could rule out people from practice who otherwise would be entitled to do so.

What the real solution is I do not know, but I do not like this $100, I can tell you that. I hope that by probing and by inquiry, perhaps some better system will be found. But in the meantime, at least, I would like to defend this province by saying that we have, as far as the contributors to the fund are concerned, the highest assessment that I can find anywhere in the whole world.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, it does not follow from that that the system is satisfactory from the point of view of the people who suffer loss of their moneys. The legal profession is a closed corporation, which for all practical purposes is a law unto itself. It encourages people to put their trust in lawyers; they put their trust in lawyers and in some cases—not very many but they are very serious when they happen—the people find that their trust has been misplaced.

In my opinion, it is the responsibility of the profession to do something about it, and I do not think that they are doing an adequate job at all. For one thing, I do not think that they are doing any sort of a job at all in auditing the books—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bryden: Well, how can these fellows make off with $100,000, $200,000 and $300,000 without an auditor catching it? Obviously the books have not been audited—

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): It is also up to the directors.

Mr. Bryden: Pardon? Well, you get 100 clients at $1,000 apiece and that is $100,000. It certainly is and this sort of thing happens and I do not think it is a joke.

The hon. Attorney General said that the law society reported that every claim was honoured where it was proved that the loss arose out of a solicitor-client relationship. Well, they are the people who decide whether or not it is proved. Naturally, they would say they were all honoured. They are, for all practical purposes, the defendant and the judge in the action. They decide whether or not it is proved.

Furthermore, they take an unconscionable length of time deciding. I know of one case where they have been at it for two years, and still have not made up their minds, and during all of that period, no interest is paid on the money, if it should subsequently be found to be due. They take their own sweet time. They make no allowance for interest, and they cut down the amount owing in every conceivable pettifogging way.

Mr. Chairman, I would agree that the compensation fund is an improvement over what there was before, because what there was before was nothing, but it certainly is far from satisfactory. It falls far short of providing adequate protection to people who are unfortunate enough to be taken to the cleaners by dishonest lawyers.

Maybe the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests and his colleagues object to the $100 they have to pay. I am not saying that they should have to pay it, but something should be done to provide better protection than is now available in situations like this. This business of solicitor-client relationship is a very tricky thing. The average man does not understand the niceties of it. He can lose his money because he was led astray by a man in whom the legal profession encouraged him to put trust only to find that technically he was not involved in a solicitor-client relationship, when the defalcation took place. So he gets nothing. Now that sort of thing is never going to convince the public, or more particularly those who lose from this sort of thing, that there is a fair and reasonable system in operation.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make some remarks under this vote. I hasten to assure the hon. Attorney General that I do not, in the slightest way, feel in a contumacious or quarrelsome mood tonight. In my opinion the hon. Attorney General is the very soul of sweet reasonableness; I recoil from the thought of quarrelling with him. I had hoped not to have to start off by replying to the hon. member for Bruce and the hon. member for Woodbine, the latter of which can preach a great sermon at a moment's notice. Continuing in the same vein, I say to him—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. The gentlemen on the left should not get the impression that because they are noisy they are right. It does not follow.

In the same vein as the Pharisaical way that my friend the hon. member for Woodbine speaks, we in the legal profession are our brother's keeper: by paying the $100 we at least are living up to our responsibilities to compensate the victims of those who come within the web of the dishonest member of the profession.

Mr. MacDonald: Partially compensate.

Mr. Sopha: As my friend the hon. member for Bruce points out, fortunately they are a very small minority.

I have felt for a number of years that one of the main reasons for the numerous dishonest lawyers we have seen in this province in the past 15 years has been a direct correlative of the large numbers of students at Osgoode Hall, where they had 200, 300, 400, or 600 students crowded in. It became a virtual impossibility for the staff and the faculty to be able to exercise the capacity to pick out the individual who was unfit to practice law because they sat there in a faceless mass, several hundred of them, in a sea of anonymity, unknown to the staff and the faculty. With pride I say that I attended a small law school where we could barely muster a corporal's guard of 50 students in the whole school because we were discriminated against by the great law society of Upper Canada that has not, even in the year 1965, discovered that the name of this province is Ontario.

In the small law school, which is now becoming the norm in the province, the faculty, with the smaller number of students, is able to pick out the individual with the personality defect and weed him out as being an unfit candidate to practise law. Now, I leave that point.

An hon. member: Where did you go?

Mr. Sopha: I went to the University of Toronto law school; not that it matters.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sopha: There are other equally good law schools in the province. There is a good one at Queen's at Kingston, and a good one at the University of Western Ontario.

The next point is that we, in northeastern Ontario, have always objected to the fact that about 200 lawyers in northeastern Ontario—Sault Ste. Marie, the home of the hon. Attorney General, Sudbury, North Bay, Timmins, and Kirkland Lake—have found it impossible to get a person elected to the benchers of the law society. We got one elected through death one time; we could not get him elected by the democratic process to the benchers, the governing body of the society, but we got one there through the death of the person above him, who had had the next highest number of votes. He was on the benchers a short time and was appointed to the Supreme Court. So now we stand where we have always stood, over the years, with no representation on that body. It is a strange and even amusing thing that the lawyers, the law officers of the Crown, the legislative counsel—themselves lawyers—write or review the legislation for the governance of the dental and the medical professions. In The Dental Act and The Medical Act, the lawyers provide that there shall be regional representation on the governing body. The lawyers say, from the plateau of Olympian superiority of knowledge that is fine for the medical and the dental professions; but when they write The Law Society Act, the principle that is good enough for dentists and doctors is not good enough for lawyers and there is no regional representation.

I am told on the grapevine that the law society is in the process of rewriting The Law Society Act that stands in The Revised Statutes. I hope the hon. Attorney General, if he would give me his attention for a moment, will take a sharp look at any statute that the law society of Upper Canada comes forward with and puts in his hands and asks to pass through this House. He should take a sharp look at it from the point of view of making it mandatory that there be regional representation for we in the legal profession in northern Ontario, as well as our brothers in the profession in eastern and western Ontario, are governed from the city of Toronto.

We are ruled by the lawyers in Toronto; some 2,500 of them dominate us, and in many ways that I could elaborate on and document, we are under the aegis of the Gemini of the profession in Toronto.

To get back to the complaint of my friend the hon. member for Bruce. I have felt that there is a gross inequity, and I agree completely with the former Attorney General, the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, that it is unfair that every lawyer should be required to pay the $100. Why, for example, should the lawyers in the department of the Attorney General pay the $100? They handle no trust funds; they have no trust account; they have no clients' money. There is no possibility of defalcation of funds. If they took government money, that is a matter strictly between the provincial auditor, the Provincial Treasurer and The Department of the Attorney General.

To look at it another way, I have felt it unfair to make a blanket assessment of $100 for every lawyer. There are law firms in the city of Toronto that have $300,000 or $500,000 or $1 million in their trust account at times. There are lawyers in the boondocks that would not have enough money in their trust account at times to get them from Sudbury for a weekend in Hagar—they would not be able to make it there and back if they used all the money in their trust account. Yet all of us, in blanket fashion, are required to pay $100. I hope the Clerk of the Legislative Assembly will not consider it a discourtesy in the House to mention that even he pays the $100, because he is one of Her Majesty's counsel and a member of the law society of Upper Canada. So they assess us all the same.

Perhaps, after all, this Legislature is the most supreme body within its constitutional sphere in the province and perhaps some day. The Department of the Attorney General will come to the realization that the department is superior even to the law society of Upper Canada. Some day it will take a close look at what that body does with a view to improving it.

Lawyers, in their fierce love for democracy, are the protectors of liberty, the preachers of freedom and the harbingers of hard-fought and hard-won rights—yet they run a society beyond which one could not imagine a more undemocratic body. The body that governs the legal profession never has a public meeting of those who are governed and taxed in the way of the American colonists so that the members may voice their complaints to those who rule them. The hon. Attorney General mentioned the only public meeting there is. Every year at the mid-winter meeting of the Ontario section of the Canadian Bar association, the law society of Upper Canada tenders us all a free lunch for $170. We get a free lunch, and we get a speech from the treasurer of the society, he always a Toronto lawyer. I do not think that in the history of the society there has ever been a treasurer who has not been from Toronto. I may be mistaken because maybe the fellow from Sarnia was treasurer at one time. I am not sure, but I do not think so. I forget his name.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Jamieson from Woodstock!

Mr. Sopha: Park Jamieson, was he treasurer?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Well, the treasurer makes a speech and his report every year. Perhaps the words should lie ill in my mouth when I criticize my own profession, but I have my own responsibilities and I use the time of the House to repeat the complaints that I have heard from lawyers about it. Maybe the time has come to call a spade a spade, and we in the Legislature, through the leadership of the hon. Attorney General should say to the law society of Upper Canada, enough is enough. We will get a little democracy into the profession. Perhaps we will look and assess the compensation fund levy from the point of view of escalating it—that is a good word in the modern day—in correlation to the amount of money, the average amount of money, that is to be found in the trust accounts, so that a big firm with 30 lawyers downtown that has a million dollars in the trust account will pay a great deal more into the fund than the poor chap in Geraldton who has $177.52 in the trust account.

Mr. MacDonald: You have millionaires as clients up there, too.

Mr. Sopha: I doubt it. It is a funny thing about practising law outside Toronto, the bigger the client, the more wealthy the client, the more likely he is to hire a Toronto firm of lawyers.

Now, I am going to leave that. I have said things that I did not intend to utter tonight, but I got provoked into them by my good friend, the hon. member for Bruce, and the further comments of my friend, the hon. member for Woodbine.

I listened with great interest to my friend, the hon. member for Riverdale, and his remarks on the administrative procedure code. Over the years, I have spoken in this House about the necessity of "civilizing" the civil service. "Civilizing" is a word I put in quotes. With the increase in government functions—I have said and I repeat—it is absolutely necessary that if we are to protect democratic traditions an administrative procedure code must be adopted in this province for the purpose of laying down the limits within which administrative tribunals can act. It must be a set of standards that will apply to all administrative tribunals.

I was aware shortly after I came into the House that this Legislature in 1952 passed a Proceedings Against the Crown Act, but it had never been proclaimed. It has never been proclaimed. In the 1962-63 session, I put a resolution on the order paper: "Be it resolved that in the opinion of this House the Lieutenant Governor be asked to proclaim The Proceedings Against the Crown Act." The ink was hardly dry on the resolution when the Attorney General of the day marched in with the new Proceedings Against the Crown Act, and it was passed and proclaimed and came into effect on September 1, 1963. So at least that was an achievement.

And let it be said that in the passing of that Act we were just about 20 years behind Great Britain, which had given to the citizens the right to bring action for damage suffered from a growing and more intrusive and more complex state that was interfering more and more in the daily lives of the citizens within the realm.

But in this session, I have come to the conclusion—as I said in the estimates of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner)—that we are living in an era of suspended animation here, and almost every time that one feels the urge and the stimulation to get up and ask the government to do something, one is met by the spectre of some form of committee or commission that is sitting, and one has to wait for that committee or commission to report before the remedy that one seeks can be acted upon.

If we got a cemetery to bury all the committees and commissions this government has appointed since it came to office in 1943, we would need a piece of land bigger than the Mount Pleasant cemetery to put them all in.

An hon. member: They have done a good job.

Mr. Sopha: Not necessarily, and that does not apply to the Hagey commission. We will perhaps get into that later.

So in my keen and fierce desire for the promotion of an administrative procedure code, I have decided on my own to bypass the Legislature, and on Monday, May 17, I am going to present my own brief to the McRuer commission. That brief—some 35 pages—sets out a very detailed skeleton administrative procedure code, and I hope to be able to persuade his lordship, the former chief justice of the high court, to adopt some of my thinking and incorporate it in his report, recommend it to the government, and that is the best chance to move speedily in the direction that we must move in if we are to preserve democracy within this province. That is, the adoption of a set of controls over the some 95 administrative boards and tribunals that are operating within the province. There may be more than 100 now. When the former Attorney General—

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Sopha: Certainly!

Mr. Cowling: Would the hon. member tell me why he thinks he is going to get more action by presenting his brief to the McRuer Royal commission than he is by presenting the same suggestion to the legislative assembly?

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member is leading with his chin.

Mr. Sopha: The answer I have already given is that we have seen, through experience, that recommendations we have made have been met by answers from the Treasury bench so that we cannot consider them until a certain commission reports. The Smith commission is a virtual crutch of the government. Nothing, apparently, can be done in the realm of financial affairs of this government at all until the Smith commission reports. So it is with medicare, the Goldenberg commission on Metropolitan Toronto—

Mr. Singer: The law reform commission—

Mr. Sopha: Yes, the hon. member for Downsview says the law reform commission.

Mr. Cowling: All doing good work.

Mr. Sopha: Not necessarily, there is no proof of that; there is a general categorical statement—

Mr. Cowling: I think the hon. member is going about it in a very round about way, a very round about way.

Mr. Sopha: I want to leave that and will try my luck with Mr. Justice McRuer. On May 17, at Sudbury, when I present my brief with its embodiment of an administration—

Mr. Cowling: It is in Sudbury?

Mr. Sopha: Yes, in Sudbury.

Mr. Cowling: That makes a difference then. I can understand it now.

Mr. Sopha: Let me ask the hon. member, is he downgrading Mr. Justice McRuer's commission?

Mr. Cowling: No.

Mr. Sopha: The inferences from his comments leads one to the conclusion that he is.

Mr. Cowling: No; I am talking about the hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Justice McRuer, I might point out to the hon. member, as an insurance agent, is a man who has had a distinguished career in the judicial life of this province—

Mr. Cowling: The hon. member does not have to tell me.

Mr. Sopha: —and his contribution has been—

Mr. Cowling: The hon. member does not have to tell me; I know it. I am talking about you.

Mr. Sopha: And having contributed to the hon. member's education, I am going to leave him and pay no further attention to him tonight.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sopha: I take issue with the hon. Attorney General on one final subject. When, in the opening of his estimates, he says he pays a minimum salary of $5,500 for a starting solicitor within the department, and he is satisfied that the salary raise, in contradiction to that of the allegations of the hon. member for Downsview, is good enough to attract capable men to the hon. Attorney General's department, my answer is that over the six years that I have known these young men, I have seen them come and go as nomadic Arabs. I am not saying that they are Arabs but that is the way they have come and gone within The Department of the Attorney General. I have seen so many of them that have hung their hats for only a short time within the department. When they have a little respite and a little bit of security that was given to them, they have gone to greener pastures. I say to the hon. Attorney General that it is a virtual impossibility to expect a young man coming out of law school to subsist and take his proper place in society as a professional person on $400 a month. If he has any children, he simply cannot do it.

Does the hon. Attorney General pay the $170 to the law society to enable these people to continue to practise, or are they expected to extract $170 from the $5,500 pickings that they get, and attempt to live on the rest?

I do not want to make any comparisons, and especially I do not want to make any personal comparisons, but I challenge the hon. Attorney General by saying that he is not competitive with private law firms. I venture to say that the minimum starting salary of the graduate of a law school with a private law firm is something of the order of $150, which makes a starting salary of $7,800 annually.

My friend, the hon. member for Downsview and I, attended the public accounts committee this year. We made searching inquiries about the amount of money that is spent by the various government departments in the hiring of outside legal services. We discovered that, as a minimum, the government pays some $500,000 annually to outside legal firms, and we, over the years, have urged upon this department the proposition that, when the government of Ontario is involved in litigation, The Department of the Attorney General ought to be in the court representing the government, not some private individual hired from splendiferous chambers on Bay Street or Richmond Street, who walks into court and is representing the Queen in the right of Ontario.

One who is cognizant of the historical nature of the office of the Attorney General—attornatus regis—knows that the person who represented the government and the Queen in court was none other than the Attorney General himself; so it still is in Great Britain. The Attorney General goes into the court to act on behalf of the government. If he does not, he is represented in the court by Treasury counsel. Many of the Treasury counsel eventually wind up on the bench; they become justices of the high court. But the only example in Ontario in recent years that I know of the Attorney General going into court was one occasion when the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests appeared in the court of appeal. He appeared for the government to try to persuade the court of appeal into the adoption of a proposition that was absolutely indefensible. He had to go there because he could not get anybody else to propound that proposition. And he was shot down in flames by the court of appeal.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: My average in the court of appeal both here and in Ottawa is considerably better than the average of my hon. friend in the Sudbury courts.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sopha: That was the only occasion, so the hon. Minister is batting nothing for one, which is zero. I add that when they took The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act to the Supreme Court of Canada—I want to pay the hon. Minister a compliment—he was the only person within The Department of the Attorney General that felt that the Act was intra vires of this Legislature. He was—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The hon. member might as well finish—I did not argue that one.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister did not argue it and he was proved to be right. A good man, a good lawyer, Elliot R. Pepper, QC, who argued that case, had by that time left The Department of the Attorney General.

I want to say, lest I forget, that within The Department of the Attorney General are very able lawyers, very able men. There is no finer lawyer—I blush, in case he thinks that I indulge myself in flattery—than Mr. William Bowman, QC, the director of public prosecutions of this province. It is a wonder that a man of Mr. Bowman's calibre has withstood the penury of near poverty over the years and stayed with the government. It is incredible. And there are several others that have stayed around; Mr. Frank Wilson and Mr. John Austin. The rest, like the nomadic Arabs, have packed up their tents and disappeared into the gathering sandstorm, and so they continue. Sir, you will not be able to build up a corps of competent legal talent until you make your prices competitive with that of private industry within our profession.

Vote 201 agreed to.

On vote 202:

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I do not know how long the House intends to go on tonight, but I have some extensive remarks I want to make in connection with vote 202, the Ontario police commission. If it is the desire of the government that we go on—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Go ahead, I have no place to go. I just came.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, vote 202 deals with the Ontario police commission and with the police forces in the province of Ontario. I think that the comments set out in the report of the police commission are as good an example of the type of criticism that I have to offer tonight as are available. I suspect, and probably this will not be readily admitted, I would suspect that perhaps the police commission might want to give me a very quiet vote of thanks for asking some of the questions I did and producing the answers, because I note that a great amount of the statistics included in this report, contrary to other reports we have seen from the commission, are those that were produced in answer to my questions. At least to that extent, Mr. Chairman, my questions perhaps started the police commission along a certain line of thinking.

I think it is of some very substantial significance, that the police commission advises us, and I will not refer to the answers to the questions as I put them down because some of the statistics there are at slight variance—I presume these are later figures and later statistics—but they advise us that we have some 280 police forces in the province of Ontario, and of these some 202 consist of nine men or less, and that of this number, 63 had a strength of only one man. As I read page four—and this is at the beginning of their report—I noted the comment where they say it is interesting to note. I hoped that that was not going to be the extent of their comments, and my hope was borne out because later on they do much more than saying that it is interesting to note.

But they go on to say, and they say very vividly, that a force of under ten men cannot be expected to function properly or efficiently. I will come to that just a little later in my remarks. But along the way I think the goals that they set out on page seven of their report should be noted. They suggest as a goal that every police officer in Ontario should be provided with training at the Ontario police college; that every recruit shall be required to complete successfully the recruit training course at the Ontario police college before his appointment to a police force is made permanent; that all promotions be made within a force only after the candidates for promotion have been qualified by training, written examination and appearance before a selection board; and that all candidates for chief constable be required to complete successfully an approved course for such a position.

While I do not want to claim any pride of authorship of some of these suggestions, I agree with these goals. I think they are most worthy. But I am disappointed, Mr. Chairman, and I think we must all be disappointed, when we recognize that the police commission at this stage can go no further than to say these are goals that might be reached some time in the vague and distant future. There is not even a schedule of hope as to when and if we might be able to begin to realize this sort of goal. If you will look at the detailed answers to my questions you will realize that our police college has not the capacity to begin to take on this job at the present time, and it is not anticipated, as I read these estimates, or as I have listened to the hon. Attorney General's remarks, that the capacity is going to be increased to any measurable extent in the immediate future. So how can goal number one, as worthy and important a goal as it is, expect to be carried out? And if goal number one is not carried out, then how are we going to upgrade our police forces, as we all agree that we should and as the police commission recommends should be done? And that every recruit shall be required to complete successfully the recruit training course at the police college before his appointment to a police force is made permanent—the same comments apply there.

I went further in my questions. I asked about how many in-training courses there are. The number of them in comparison with our police forces is minimal, so there is not capacity; there is not available space; there is not available staff at the police college to provide this recruit training. Again, there is no real suggestion in the estimates, as I understand them, that the capacity is going to be so increased or that this goal is going to be obtainable in the immediate future. My friend perhaps can enlighten me on some of this.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. member would permit me to say that on page 16, first of all, of the report, there is a recommendation that serious and immediate consideration be given to the replacement of the present temporary accommodation with permanent buildings, that is a police college. Might I say this further, that the replacement and extension of the police college is on the capital programme of The Department of Public Works. I will not, of course, say that it is in the estimates for this year, but we are moving.

Mr. Singer: Well, I suppose it is a sign of progress that we are moving, but to get to the stage that we have got to, where 202 of our 280 police forces consist of nine or less men, and to repeat again the comments the commission made—I need quote no better authority than the hon. Attorney General's own commission—these forces just do not work, they cannot work properly and efficiently and something has got to be done. We have got to engage on a crash programme. Perhaps you could use the schools in the summertime and run extra courses. But you have got such a fantastic backlog of training that is necessary for present police officers and for recruit officers, that it is going to take years and years to catch up, even if the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) starts building his building tomorrow, and he is not likely to do that, because it is not even in the estimate for this year.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: They are not necessarily all untrained.

Mr. Singer: Well, do you want to look at the figures again—280 forces, 202 with nine or less officers which are inefficient. Then let us look at some of the details here in the questions and answers. The substantial number of them are not trained, and I think that as you read this police commission report—

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: They are not all untrained.

Mr. Singer: I did not say they were all untrained. This is, of course, not true. There is a training system here within Metropolitan Toronto. Our Metropolitan Toronto police have their own college, but by and large there is no adequate system of training police for the province of Ontario, and the present programme as it is planned, or as it is expected to be planned, is going to take years and years until it catches up with this need for training.

My suggestion is that it follows as clearly as night follows day from what is in this report and from the statistics that we have available, that the hon. Attorney General should be able to announce that his department is going to embark on a crash programme for training police officers, and we have heard nothing like that at all. I think we should hear something like that.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Read pages 14 and 15.

Mr. Singer: I will come to that, be patient. It is a long night.

The question of promotions and so on. There were some questions about the system of promotions, and I think the answer was that the survey is not complete and it is difficult to tell, but by and large there is no real knowledge that there is any qualifying system of examination for producing promotions and special training for chief police constables. That was one that I did not approach, but this is a good addition, and certainly there should be an extra special qualifying system for chief constables.

On page eight are the remarks that I referred to just a moment ago. And this is what the commission says:

Whereas it would be unwise for your commission to propound or formulate any general policy for policing in this province until the completion of the survey, nevertheless, there is an emerging picture of the province in large part policed by small forces dotted across the province which, because of their size and consequent limitations of budget, cannot possibly hope to have efficient, well-trained or adequate police forces. It is the considered opinion of your commission that no police force under ten men can possibly hope to have a properly organized, well-trained and efficient force capable of serving their area of responsibility.

Again, out of the mouths of his own officials, the hon. Attorney General's present system of operating police forces is damned in far better language than perhaps any one of us could do here. This is an emergency situation. We need emergency measures to deal with it. And what is going to be done? Well, there are some suggestions here.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Supposing I agree with my police commission, do I suddenly pass legislation saying to the municipalities in this province who have forces of ten men or under: "You must amalgamate, you must abandon those forces or you must allow us to police you with the provincial police"; or do you believe in any local autonomy at all?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the hon. Attorney General brought that up, because this was the point I am coming to. This is a disease that pervades across the whole of the front bench. When we dealt with the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs he said: "What do we do? We have 970 municipalities. Do we suddenly say: 'Local autonomy goes out the window and we don't have 970, tomorrow morning we have 320?'"

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let me make it clear. I am not asking the hon. member what to do. I am asking him if he believes in that kind of compulsion?

Mr. Singer: I will come to that in a moment—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let me make it clear. I am not asking him what to do; I know what to do. But I do not agree with what the hon. member apparently is about to suggest.

Mr. Singer: Why does the hon. Attorney General not wait until I have suggested it and then let us hear why he will not do it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is what I want to know.

Mr. Singer: All right. Just be patient!

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs is faced with the same problem. The select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts sat and wrestled with this problem for four years. I do not know if the hon. Attorney General has had an opportunity of reading that report, but in essence the recommendation is that action has to come from the top down to clear up this situation. His colleague, the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall), with all the fanfare, rolling of drums and the blowing of bugles, had this great regional government conference. He believes regional government is the coming thing and it has to be done. His leader, the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) speaking last night to a gathering where 13 Cabinet Ministers were, said there is going to be regional government in this province. Seven hundred people cheered him to the echo. His colleague, the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions painfully told us his troubles in trying to get the regions together and produce jails. He asked us: "Please do not rock the boat, fellows, because I am moving to the stage where maybe we will convince some people to get together and build jails—”

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I never said that at all. I said we were doing very well.

Mr. Singer: But you were not able to tell us one regional jail that you had produced. You were hoping, because of the tone of the meetings—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You want it done overnight.

Mr. Singer: No, not overnight. You and your colleagues have had 23 years—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, if I had all the power in the world—

Mr. Singer: In your department, in The Department of Economics and Development, in The Department of Municipal Affairs, in The Department of the Attorney General, in The Department of Health, where the same problem exists, and The Department of Public Welfare, this problem continues and gets worse, because every Minister asks, what are they going to do about local autonomy? The only brave man at all in the front benches is the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), who stood up one day and said: “As of tomorrow, or as of the day the Act is passed, a third of the boards of education are gone.” He realized that he had an emergent problem and he did it with, apparently, the blessings of the rest of you. If you believe the words of your own police commission, Mr. Attorney General, if the situation is as bad as they say it is—I think it is, they think it is and you think it is—then for goodness sake let us have some action. Let us get these forces amalgamated; let us put them together.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We got the report only a week ago.

Mr. Singer: Yes, you only got the report. These facts have been obvious. The only thing that is different this year is that we have a government-appointed body, your body, that puts it down on paper so I can quote their words instead of using my own words. That is the only thing that is different.

Mr. Kerr: What about the Act just introduced?

Mr. Singer: Yes, the Act makes it permissible.

All right, let us look at the three ways you are going to get your police forces together.

The first was a voluntary or permissive system, and the Act was changed. As I say, the other night I commended the hon. Attorney General on being so quick and alert in having just received this report; he was able to quickly pass the statute and bring it in the day after. That is pretty good.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let us get that clear right now. I did not wait for the report to start the legislation.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Why did you wait in this case?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I knew something of the thinking of my commission. We do not wait once a year to get a report. We have some liaison, some co-operation, and some conferences with my commission.

Mr. Singer: No, I am sure you do not. But if I recall your words correctly, you said: “This statute reflects many of the recommendations in the report.”

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is right. But I did not say I waited for the report.

Mr. Thompson: You were just saying that you just got the report, that is why you cannot amalgamate.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well—

Mr. Singer: How many ways can you have the same argument?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member for Downsview thinks I must have Aladdin’s lamp in my hand to suddenly create all the buildings and equipment and colleges that he wants to arrive tonight.

Mr. Singer: If you want to go back to that one, and I thought I had left it, let us go back. I am not saying that you have an Aladdin’s lamp, and I am not saying that you have the ability to corral for this purpose millions of dollars of government money just by snapping your fingers and saying there will be 91 police colleges tomorrow. But I am suggesting that the situation is so emergent and, since we now have apparently an Attorney General who admits it is a situation of grave emergency, that a real investigation could be made of launching a crash programme. Let us start off with using some of the schools that we have during the summer months. There are all sorts of buildings all over the province. Let us second, from some of our senior forces, inspectors or sergeants who are trained men with substantial experience and put them in these schools for the officers who need the training. There was an emergency a few years ago in producing school teachers. Eventually the public clamour for having teachers in schools to man the classrooms grew so great that eventually there was a crash programme for producing teachers. It was not the best programme, but it certainly was better than nothing. If there is anything more important than the administration of law, what can it be other than having well-trained police officers? Let us see some imagination and some initiative, and let us get into a crash programme for training police officers until you have enough buildings in the course of time that will act as permanent schools and permanent training offices.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Did the hon. member read the report of the provincial police commissioner?

Mr. Singer: Yes, I have read that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Did he note the remarks about trying to train policemen in the summer months?

Mr. Singer: I would suggest to the hon. Attorney General that if there is a will, there is a way. If you want to produce trained police officers, if you want to embark on a crash programme of training, if the remarks of the police commission have any merit, I think you would find a way to start training them at a far greater rate than you are doing now.

Mr. Thompson: They did it for veterans after the last war. They put on programmes; they did not wait around for big buildings.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I could give you quite a discussion on the matter, but there is quite a difference between this and training veterans for certain purposes. As the commissioner of the OPP pointed out, we do most of the training of the policemen in the winter months. In the summer our population is increased in many places 10 to one—in some places 20 to one—and a traffic problem arises. There is a tremendous demand on police services, not only OPP but all across this province. This is not the time when you can afford to take away from your small police forces. Most of our municipalities are burdened now with providing policing. I am sure that the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Bukator) will be telling me that I should find another 10 or 12 policemen for his villages over there in the summer months. But this is not a feasible time to train them; that is the point.

Mr. Thompson: I am not talking, Mr. Chairman, in connection with the time, summer or winter. What I was mentioning is that the hon. Attorney General had referred to the suggestion of my friend, the hon. member for Downsview. He said to look at page 14 and, with some pride, said that he was hoping to get a building. It was not in the estimates, and we were to wait patiently until this building was produced—at least, that is what I inferred from his remarks—before any training is done.

I suggest that this does not mean a great deal. But I am a product of a university training after the war, and if the president of the university had waited for a building, many of us would never have gone through. He took, for the University of British Columbia, a number of Quonset huts from an air force base and got on with the job. If he had waited around for some fancy buildings, many of us would not be where we are today. Whether that is good or bad I do not know; all I say is not to wait for bricks and mortar, because with imagination the training can be started.

Mr. Singer: Now to get back to amalgamation. The report suggests that there might be three kinds of amalgamation: permissive, persuasive, and mandatory amalgamation. What I am going to suggest, Mr. Chairman, is that the only way this is going to come about, if it is worthwhile at all, is by mandatory amalgamation, the same as the select committee on municipal affairs suggested in its report. If you are going to get the type of regional government that the committee believed in unanimously—there was some disagreement about how it would come about—unanimously believed was needed, then the impetus and the direction has to come from the top down.

It is the same as the hon. Prime Minister appeared to be talking about at his political meeting last night. If you are going to get the kind of government that you want, it cannot come voluntarily and it is not going to come voluntarily. All these years we have been talking about it and it has not been happening.

The answer to one of these questions indicates that there are the same number of police forces as we had last year. It was necessary in the amendments to The Police Act to allow amalgamation, but I am predicting to you, sir, that if there are only permissive qualifications for amalgamation, or even persuasive qualifications, there will be no more success in the hon. Attorney General's attempts than in those of his colleagues in other departments. If amalgamation is worthwhile and it is important, then someone—the hon. Attorney General or the commission, but someone with the power—must say that in such and such a situation, we have investigated and we have listened to the hon. Attorney General's thoughts on it, but we have come to the conclusion that instead of ten little forces there will be one big force, and these will be the boundaries of it.

I am not suggesting that the hon. Attorney General sit down tonight and look at the size of the force and draw circles on the map, and I do not think that anybody would suggest that. But I am saying that these amalgamations have to come about; they have to come about after proper study so that that importance of local autonomy will be preserved, or at least local ideas, like calling into consultation the local people. But the decision has to lie either with the hon. Attorney General or with his officials, and unless he or they are prepared to do this then he is not going to get the sort of police system that I believe this province needs, and apparently the police commission believes this province needs.

Now I want to talk about another facet of the police commission report. The police commission has made a very substantial number of investigations—I think 182, in answer to my question 93—in the year 1964. Two of those were at the request of boards of commissioners of police; two at the request of chief constables; 19 at the request of the municipal authorities; 150 on their own initiative. As a result of these investigations, many recommendations were made as a result of the surveys conducted. Among the major recommendations they list additional personnel; revision of duty schedules; permission for the chief constable to attend the college at Aylmer and on and on. They are not able to tell me at this point how many of these recommendations that they made were accepted, adopted and carried out and if they are going to carry on discussions with municipal officials with a view to implementing their recommendations that have not been carried out.

I say this is another serious fault in our police administration. If the police commission is going to be charged with the responsibility of making these sort of evaluations and investigations, and if the government has faith in them—and apparently the hon. Attorney General does because he is increasing their budget and they are being given more personnel, good personnel—and if they are going to go around the province and examine and study and report, then I say, sir, there will have to be some teeth put into the recommendations that they make. There has to be power somewhere to carry out these recommendations.

With this in mind, I want to refer to one particular situation. Just let me read these preliminary remarks here:

The police commission has a tremendous opportunity to affect uniformity and cohesion of local police forces in Ontario, something that is badly needed at present. The problem is that the police commission lacks any practical power to implement its recommendations in these fields. It can only make suggestions which may be vetoed or ignored by local authorities having local control over the local forces.

Some measure of local control over local forces is, of course, necessary. However, the police commission must be given wide powers of supervision over its local control, or if not the police commission, then the Attorney General must be given this power. Its decisions must prevail in cases of conflict—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Are these the hon. member's remarks, or is this something that he is reading?

Mr. Singer: Oh, no. These are remarks I have in written form rather than in verbal form; these are my remarks. For instance, the Ontario police commission should be empowered to order amalgamation—and these remarks were prepared before I had an opportunity to examine the report—of small and ineffectual local police forces where necessary—I have already covered that in the written remarks—should also be empowered to order the creation of local police commissions in municipalities where control of the police force is still in the hands, on occasion, of a council that is not properly controlling their affairs. And there is something—the hon. Attorney General approached this in his amendments to the Act.

Police control should be taken—an interesting case—

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member should rewrite those remarks.

Mr. Singer: It is pretty hard to rewrite remarks which were prepared in advance when suddenly you get additional information of a report and a new statute—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Why do we not take those as read?

Mr. Singer: Because there is some very substantial merit in what is coming now.

An interesting case in point is that of Peel county and the Brampton police force. The Ontario police commission had made recommendations which, it would appear to me, would greatly improve policing in this region. These seem to have been completely rejected by the local government. Until the fall of 1962 control of the town of Brampton police force was vested in the town council. They attempted to direct policing through a police committee. This committee made few, if any, recommendations to the police department, and received few, if any, communications in return.

In the fall of 1962 the council decided to create a board of commissioners of police, consisting of Mayor R. Prowse, Magistrate H. T. G. Andrews and Judge E. W. Grant. The mayor was the spark plug, I am advised, in getting this police commission set up. Magistrate Andrews is highly regarded, a former practising lawyer in Brampton who has always been cognizant of policing problems in the town, and Judge Grant holds similar views. It would seem on the surface that this was a very good police commission.

From the outset, the lack of communication between the commission and the town council was obvious. The council was not too happy to see the commission, even though the commission had been set up. The commission was trying to bring the police force up to a point adequate to meet the needs, and an obvious conflict developed almost immediately. The council believed there was really nothing wrong with the police force as it stood.

In 1964, in order to facilitate the streamlining of the Brampton force, the Brampton police commission asked the Ontario police commission to evaluate the force and to make recommendations for its improvement. When this request was made known to the town council, that body declared that such an investigation was unnecessary and dissociated itself with the request entirely. The Ontario police commission, nevertheless, went ahead with the evaluation as requested, and produced the attached report, which I am going to read. The report confirmed what many citizens believed was the case for some time. The report indicates quite clearly that the force was not efficient, and that it was inadequate. It was indeed adequate to the needs of the town some 14 years previously, but the commission's report indicates that it certainly was far from adequate for the year 1964. Accordingly, the commission's investigator, former Deputy Chief Kerr of the metropolitan police, a man whom I have known for some years and had great respect for, he went; it was his responsibility that the majority of these recommendations were put forward. But this was as far as the police commission can go. They table the recommendation. The problem has now returned to Brampton town council and the police commission for ultimate solution.

The Ontario police commission, having made what I think was an excellent report, was now—well they were out, finished. They had made their recommendations and that is about the end. There was no means given to them to ensure that these recommendations would be carried out. The problems created by leaving the solution of the dilemma to the local authorities were great. At first, there would appear to be two solutions. Either the chief constable could have been given a certain period of time in which to bring the force up to par, or else arrangements could have been made to find a new chief of police. In a normal course of events, either solution would have accomplished the objective, but this was not the case. The report was presented to the town council, since the support of that body was necessary to its implementation, and as the council still exercised control over the police force and the commission in some respects, notably in budget.

You cannot carry out the sort of reform recommended unless the money is made available. The second came to the extraordinary decision that the whole evaluation was a mistake from the beginning. The comments of some of the councillors in the various press reports are indicative of the council's feeling. They saw the report as a personal affront to the chief constable and to the honour and glory of the town of Brampton. They viewed its criticisms as destructive rather than as constructive. Consequently, they refused to take any action on the report. They decided to leave the force as it was and to ignore the work and the recommendations of the Ontario police commission.

However, even that was not enough; the council did not stop there. They saw the situation as a result of a personal feud between the Brampton police commission—I have already told you the personnel on it—and the chief constable as an indication of the Brampton commission's unwillingness to co-operate. Co-operate is an interesting word; perhaps be guided by or accept the direction of council, even though they were sitting as a police commission. It is doubtful whether there is any truth whatsoever in these assumptions. In fact, I think the burden goes the other way.

However, the incensed council, in the heat of the moment, took the extraordinary and fantastic action of passing a bylaw dissolving the Brampton police commission, which had been created just two years before and whose first substantial action had been to say that it did not think that the police force was up to what it should be. Mr. Chairman, can you imagine a situation more ludicrous than this?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, could I say that the Act I brought in the other day adds to the power of the police commission the determination, if need be, after a dispute between a board or a police committee, not only the personnel, but arms, equipment, clothing and other training. I think that is the language, speaking from memory, so that now not only are all the requirements of the force in there, but also the power to say obtain it and carry it out; establish a proper force.

Mr. MacDonald: Is this retroactive?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, it is not retroactive, of course. Furthermore, if the hon. member has talked with the mayor of Brampton since our conferences, since the study made by the commission, since the recommendations, and since the change in the personnel of the board of police commissioners, he will, I am sure, have been told that police matters are in excellent condition in that town.

Mr. Singer: They may be in excellent condition now. I have not had as recent conversations as the hon. Attorney General, but I think this case is still well worth detailing here because it is indicative—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: A little old straw.

Mr. Singer: It is not a little old straw. This report is a 1964 one.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But the situation—

Mr. Singer: All right. November 4, 1964, was the date this was published in the Brampton Times and Conservator.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is 1965.

Mr. Singer: I suggest that is not old at all. I suggest it is very recent.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It has all been taken care of.

Mr. Singer: I am not too sure that it has all been taken care of, at all. In any event, sir, this is all going to go in the record because it is an important part of the determinations that have to be made. The hon. Attorney General is more familiar with the paragraph-by-paragraph wording of the amendments to The Police Act. I did not spot the reference that he made, but, if I understand him correctly, the words and other things are supposed to be allowed to apply to the general type of improvement that the Ontario police commission recommends. It would be my opinion that the words and other things, perhaps following ejusdem generis rule, would be somewhat related to physical equipment rather than the real organizational changes—somewhat more closely related to equipment, rather than the sort of major changes suggested in this report.

It has been suggested to me that perhaps it would be appropriate to adjourn at this time, because I want to go on at some length yet on this. If it is agreeable, Mr. Chairman, I will move the adjournment of the debate at this point.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to a certain resolution and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report a certain resolution and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will turn to what is order two on today's bill and have a debate on the report of the select committee on The Municipal Act. In addition to that there will be Budget debate.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.10 o'clock, p.m.

THE MILK ACT, 1965

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves first reading of bill intituled, The Milk Act, 1965.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments with reference to this bill, The Milk Act, 1965. This is a completely new Act which will replace the present Milk Industry Act, and will encompass all aspects of the responsibilities of The Ontario Department of Agriculture insofar as the dairy industry is concerned.

The present Act, namely, The Milk Industry Act, was developed over a period of several years and has been amended from time to time. It was felt that since some rather major revisions were being presented, it was better to draft an entirely new Act, and to make provisions for the repeal of the Act which is presently in force.

The new bill will become effective upon proclamation. It is anticipated that it will be necessary to have a transition period during which the administrative responsibilities of the milk industry board, which at the present time supervises the dairy industry in Ontario, are withdrawn, and a new milk commission establishes a new administrative procedure.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. members of this House all appreciate the importance of the dairy industry to the economy of this province. They produce one-third of all the milk produced in Canada. Because of the importance of this industry, any changes and adjustments in administrative and marketing methods must be brought about in an orderly and gradual manner.

On May 30, 1963, the government established a milk industry inquiry committee under the chairmanship of Professor S. G. Hennessey, with members Mr. J. E. McArthur, and Mr. F. E. Wood. This committee carried out an exhaustive study into all aspects of the dairy industry, and submitted their report to me on March 5, 1965. I believe the committee conscientiously carried out the task assigned to them and submitted a report based upon their analysis of the briefs presented to them, special research studies which they instituted, and their general assessment of the dairy situation.

There is no doubt that this report indicated very strongly that changes are needed in milk marketing in Ontario in order to avoid serious deterioration in the industry, and to enable it to strengthen and continue its position of importance in the provincial and Canadian economy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill makes provision for the appointment of a milk commission of Ontario, appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council which will be responsible to the Minister. The commission is empowered to supervise all aspects of the dairy industry in Ontario. The bill allows the continuance of the cream producers' marketing plan, and the cheese producers' marketing plan. Provision is also made for the establishment of the milk producers' marketing board which will be responsible for the marketing of all milk produced in Ontario. It is the intention of the legislation that when the new producers' board becomes operative that it will replace the present responsibilities of the Ontario whole milk producers' league, and the Ontario concentrated milk producers' marketing board. There will be one producers' marketing board, with the responsibility of marketing all milk within Ontario.

The bill makes provision for establishment of conciliation procedures which would endeavour to effect agreement, where necessary, between various negotiating sections of the industry. This is being done in an attempt to avoid needless arbitrations.

The bill also makes provision for the appointment of advisory committees which will function in connection with the milk producers' marketing board, the cheese producers' marketing board and the cream producers' marketing board. These advisory committees would provide a common meeting ground for processors, distributors, producers and truckers for the purpose of solving mutual problems and avoiding misunderstanding. Agreements reached by such advisory committees will not be binding on either party without official ratification by the organization or marketing board concerned.

Mr. Speaker, the bill further provides for the complete co-ordination of milk and cream quality standards and milk and cream testing within Ontario. I would like to say that this bill has been drafted in close consultation with Quebec and with the Minister of Agriculture for that province, the hon. Mr. Alcide Courcy, and with the federal Minister of Agriculture, the hon. Mr. Harry Hayes. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the most recent joint meeting was held last Monday, May 3, in Ottawa.

Ontario and Quebec produce over two-thirds of the Canadian milk production and the federal government at Ottawa is responsible for Canadian dairy policy and, in particular, price support under The Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act. It is, therefore, most important—indeed, it is essential that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the federal government co-operate as closely as possible in the development of long-term dairy policy.

I would like to publicly express my appreciation to the hon. Mr. Harry Hayes for the time he has given to us in these matters and, as well, say that there has been the closest co-operation and understanding between my office and that of the hon. Mr. Courcy of Quebec. I publicly express my appreciation to him as well.

Mr. Speaker, this bill, through the normal procedures of the House, will go to the committee on agriculture. Thank you very much.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the hon. Minister a question? Recognizing, of course, the fact that there will have to be a transition period before this can take effect, would the hon.

Minister care to hazard a guess as to when it might be proclaimed? In six months?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The intention, Mr. Speaker, to bring this bill into effect is to bring it in on proclamation. I would propose that if the bill meets with the approval of the House and receives Royal assent, it will be proclaimed at the various stages of the implementation of the principles in the bill. The first thing that would be done, I would suggest, would be the appointment of the milk commission and gradually work from there on. The present steps, so far as the dairy industry is concerned, will remain in effect until this bill becomes operative to avoid any great confusion in the industry.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House the following reports:

1. The 40th annual report of The Department of Health for the year 1964.
2. The annual report for 1964 of the Ontario cancer institute incorporating the Princess Margaret hospital.
3. The annual report for 1963 of the Ontario cancer treatment and research foundation.
4. The annual report of the Ontario mental health foundation, March 31, 1964.

The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) tabled answers to questions on the order paper as follows:

56. Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Inquiry of the Ministry: 1. Will the Attorney General advise: (a) how many new police officers were hired by all police forces in Ontario including Ontario provincial police in the years 1963 and 1964; and (b) identify the municipalities hiring new police officers and the number hired by each? 2. Will the Attorney General also advise the number of new police officers, hired in Ontario in 1963 and 1964, who took courses at the Ontario police college.

Answer by the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart):

1. (a) 1963, 940; 1964, 1,043.

1. (a) death, (b) personal injury, (c) damage to personal property, as a result of such crimes committed by persons other than themselves?

72. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry: Since the province of Ontario is by statute entitled to a lien against real estate, if a person holding a beneficial interest in that real estate is in arrears in payment of sales tax or assessments made under The Workmen's Compensation Act, will the Attorney General advise how persons interested in searching titles to such real estate can inform themselves in each particular instance whether or not the province of Ontario claims such a lien?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

Re: Statutory lien under section 16(2) of The Retail Sales Tax Act, 1960-1961, inquiries should be directed to: The Director, Retail Sales Tax Branch, Treasury Department, 500 University Avenue, Toronto, Ontario.

Re: Statutory lien under section 114(3) of The Workmen's Compensation Act, inquiries should be made to: The sheriff of the county or provisional district in which such real estate is situated.

Note: The statutory lien created by subsection 3 of section 114 of The Workmen's Compensation Act is not relied upon in practice by the board unless a judgment has been obtained and a writ fieri facias has been filed with the sheriff. A proposed amendment to section 114 of The Workmen's Compensation Act has been tabled in the Legislature as Bill No. 31.

100. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry: Will the Attorney General advise: (a) If any complaints have been received by this department concerning the length of time required to obtain transcripts of proceedings in courts of Ontario; (b) If so, are any steps being considered to reduce the time taken in preparing such transcripts of evidence?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) Yes.

(b) (1) On August 6, 1963, the deputy Attorney General issued a directive to all court reporters of the province of Ontario requesting that the court reporters' certificates contain the following information: The date upon which the evidence was ordered; the date upon which the transcript was completed; the date upon which the transcript was delivered.

This data now appears on all transcripts.

(2) The remuneration of court reporters has recently been revised upwards by both the province and the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto and a further upward revision is now under consideration with regard to Supreme Court reporters in order to attract additional good quality court reporters and to retain existing reporters in provincial and metropolitan service.

101. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry: Will the Attorney General advise the number of instances during the past five years that Crown attorneys have taken cases before a grand jury after such cases had been dismissed by a magistrate at preliminary hearing?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

None.

113. Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Inquiry of the Ministry: What has been the increased debenture debt of all Ontario towns under 5,000 population in the past ten years:

(a) as related to per capita; (b) as related to percentage growth of the province's debt?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner):

114. Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Inquiry of the Ministry: How many units has the Ontario housing corporation acquired thus far in: (a) Metropolitan Toronto; and (b) the city of Toronto?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall):

1. On February 27, 1965, in response to a request of the council of the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto dated February 9, 1965, Ontario housing corporation advertised for a minimum of 1,250 dwelling units either existing or to be constructed. The proposal invitation was divided into two parts:

(a) Existing accommodation, to be submitted by March 18, 1965; and (b) New construction, to be submitted by April 8, 1965.

As it was anticipated there would be a substantial response, proponents were requested to restrict proposals for existing units to properties constructed within the last five years which complied with National Housing Act standards in force at the time of construction. I would emphasize, however, that immediately the current proposals have been dealt with, a further invitation in respect to older properties will be advertised.

Over 1,600 existing units were offered to Ontario housing corporation, and of these approximately 1,200 appear to meet the requirements of the Metropolitan corporation as set out in its request and also the requirements of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for lending purposes. Appraisals and inspections of the properties have since been carried out jointly by Ontario housing corporation and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is currently processing Ontario housing corporation's application for financial assistance in respect of these properties.

Commitments with the successful proponents must under the terms of the proposal call be entered into before May 18. It is expected that the first units will become available for occupancy early in June.

The distribution of the units is as follows: (a) Metropolitan Toronto, 1,120 units; (b) the city of Toronto, 80 units.

In response to the invitation for new construction proposals, approximately 1,700 were offered. Of these, some 1,000 are to be located on sites within the city of Toronto. It is not possible at this time, however, to say how many of the proposals will prove acceptable as the plans and specifications must be thoroughly reviewed for conformity with National Housing Act standards. In addition, there will be consultation with officials of Metropolitan Toronto and the city of Toronto to ensure that the proposals are acceptable from a planning standpoint.

Under the terms of the proposal call, commitments with the successful proponents must be entered into before June 7. It is expected that a considerable number of these units will be under construction during the current fiscal year.

Mr. A. W. Downer (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I regret to inform the House of the death of Julian Harcourt Ferguson, one of Ontario's outstanding sons. Born in Barrie, son of John Ferguson who later became chief justice of Manitoba, he attended Upper Canada College, served in World War I, was awarded the Military Cross and was wounded in 1918. He was a member of the House of Commons for North Simcoe from 1945 to 1957, mayor of the town of Collingwood in 1958, an outstanding citizen, a member of the House of Commons, successful business man and a loyal and true friend.

To his widow, son, and sister, we extend our heartfelt sympathy in their great loss. This province is much poorer because of his passing.

I make this announcement this morning because Mr. Ferguson was a nephew of a former Prime Minister of this province, the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson. He was also a great grandson of Ogle R. Gowan, who was a member of the Legislature of Upper Canada in 1834. So his roots go far back into the history of this province.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The second order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the fourth and final report of the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts.

ON THE MUNICIPAL ACT AND RELATED ACTS (continued)

Mr. A. E. Reuter (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts, I should like to express my views in connection with some of the recommendations in the committee's final report, particularly in connection with the recommendations concerning local and regional government.

May I first say that I do not think that the concept of regional government as expressed in part two of the report is by any means a cure-all to the many problems now existing in local government. I think I can safely say, sir, that none of the members of the committee feels that it is such a cure-all.

During the lengthy deliberations of the committee, we had an opportunity to meet with, and to listen to, a great number of persons and groups of people, who were deeply concerned either with specific problems of local government, or with the problems of municipalities generally. Many of these people, sir, were experts, and their opinions were a valuable guide to our committee in formulating the final recommendations.

The first three interim reports of the committee dealt to a great extent with the existing statute as they affected municipal government, and there were many recommendations in those first three reports for changes in the existing statute. Many of the recommendations, also, were aimed at consolidation and simplification of bits and pieces of legislation resulting from amendments made over a period of many years. There were other suggestions, of course, Mr. Speaker, that were not quite so minor, and indeed there were some ideas that met with considerable opposition, particularly those that recommended the abolition of certain local boards and commissions, such as planning boards and public utilities commissions.

Local self-government, Mr. Speaker, is a feature of our Canadian democratic system. This is truly government of the people, by the people and for the people, and it is something to be preserved. I do not think for one moment that this right should be removed. However, neither do I think that self-government should become something so unwieldy and uncontrolled that the social and economic well-being of our people is in jeopardy. A progressive nation must have leaders who will face up to the task of promoting the general welfare of its citizens, and I suggest, sir, that the chain of responsibility for this task is clearly indicated in our Constitution. Certain jurisdictional rights and responsibilities have rested with our provinces, and they in turn have been properly exercising the right and fulfilling the responsibility of delegating to our municipalities those duties that must rest with local administration.

Ontario is the greatest province in our nation, and we are leaders in progress. Our towns and our cities have experienced vast growth, brought about by prosperity and advances in technology. Through it all, local autonomy has indeed been preserved, and I think it is little wonder, Mr. Speaker, that problems have arisen during this period. Leaders in local government have been and are doing an excellent job of administration in spite of those problems, and their efforts to keep abreast of the times are highly commendable.

One of the problems pointed out in the committee's report concerned the vast number of local boards and commissions now functioning in connection with municipal matters. I cannot emphasize too strongly, sir, the obvious result of the attempt to relieve the burden of municipal councils by the creation of these ad hoc bodies. What a great conglomeration we have of these boards and commissions, mostly formed by permissive legislation in a mistaken attempt, in my view, to strengthen local government. The result, of course, as pointed out in the committee's report has been the reverse, and it is necessary sometimes to look at the statutes to determine just where the authority of the elected council ends and the power of the casually appointed committee takes over. Those who have reviewed the committee's final report will note that there are no less than 40 different versions of a public utilities commission. There are four different types of committees dealing with parking problems; nine different ideas of a matter that should be dealt with by community centre boards; 18 concepts of park boards and four different types of health groups, all these in addition to, of course, public library boards, planning boards and, of course, our boards of education.

What has happened to the elected municipal council? In my view it has been degenerated. It has lost all semblance of the highly respected body of authority to whom our citizens should look for responsible and efficient local government. In my view, it has been weakened badly. In some respects, it has lost its respected place in the eyes of our citizens.

I believe there are two main factors responsible for this situation, and I think I have placed them before you—the desperate fight to preserve local autonomy, and the multiplicity of local boards and commissions, functioning beyond the direct control of the elected council.

The basic remedy is simple.

First, we must educate our councils to bring them to the realization that preservation of their autonomy within the confines of their imaginary boundaries is not an inherent right or duty when it interferes with the social and economic well being of the community. Show them that larger units of government will help to solve the overall problem.

Second, restore the local council to its proper position as the body responsible for the affairs of its people; dispense with the superfluity of local boards and commissions and return these functions to the council.

The report of the committee recommends these measures, and as a member of that committee, I concur wholeheartedly.

In spite of the confusion that exists, there are some areas of our province that have taken the initiative in an attempt to restore order. The province, too, has been trying to help by showing an interest in a promotion of regional or area planning, and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) has announced certain studies to be undertaken by his department. I was very pleased to hear the hon. Minister's remarks, and I am sure the municipal leaders in the areas mentioned by the hon. Minister were equally impressed.

Throughout the deliberations of the committee, I sensed, and I am sure other members did, that there was a desire on the part of our municipal officials to have the province take a greater part, take a greater role of leadership in connection with municipal affairs. This, I think, is a responsibility of The Department of Municipal Affairs. And while that department has been responsible for the passing of some legislation that has not been utilized by the municipalities, surely we must determine why it has not so been used. In my opinion the answer is that the municipalities have not been made aware that the existing statutes will provide at least partial solution to some of the difficulties.

Leadership then is essential, and the department can provide this by developing a programme of education. Our councils change from year to year, and in many instances the appointed officials are employed on a part-time basis and they lack the required knowledge to properly advise their councils. A very desirable statute may be enacted today and will be given normal publicity at time of passing, but in a year or two it is completely forgotten.

The recommendation of the select committee regarding the formation of a continuing advisory body to co-ordinate and update the legislation affecting municipalities is, in my opinion, highly desirable.

The committee recommendations pertaining to regional government are summarized in nine points, appearing at page 185 of the final report. They are opinions reached after a great deal of thought, extensive review of present circumstances and consideration of many varied opinions of persons concerned with municipal problems and possible solutions to those problems.

The members of the committee were not always unanimous in their final decisions, but generally speaking there was at least a majority opinion on the broader aspect of the whole matter of local government reform. That is the reason why all members of the committee were agreeable to affix their signatures to the final report. There were, of course, certain reservations on the part of some of the members, and while I concurred generally with the broad presentation, I would like to record my personal viewpoints, and perhaps clarify some of the recommendations as I see them.

The term "regional government" may be interpreted in numerous ways. I would suggest that the very separation of Canada into the 10 provinces is in some ways a regional concept. Certainly there are distinct differences in main governmental influences as between the highly industrialized sections of Ontario and the predominantly grain-growing rural regions of the western provinces. The lumbering and related forest products nature of British Columbia industry has very little similarity to those regions on the east coast of our country where fishing, perhaps, is the main pursuit. Ontario itself is now divided into regions for purposes of such things as conservation. By the same token, we can extend our thinking to realize that the needs of local government in the territorial districts of northern Ontario are vastly different from the requirements in central Ontario.

The point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that there are sections of our province where our present structure of local government is functioning quite well. There is little, if any, need in those regions for this thing called regional government. I believe firmly that our present structure in this respect is quite adequate. Our county councils in those areas continue to do the job basically for which they were created and, as I said, they still function very well. And the towns and villages within the confines of those counties have no need for any major change.

I would hasten to add that I do not think any member of our committee had any intention of imposing drastic changes where they were not needed. In any event, I wish to clarify my own view, that regional government is essential only in those areas of the province where population density and industrial concentration have created local government problems.

The definition of a region for local government purposes is something that defies any standardization. What is needed here is not needed there. And the varying circumstances will alter the need. Our present counties are themselves geographical divisions, and while they may lend themselves to certain boundary adjustments, I am one who believes there should be little, if any, change, at least for the present. Perhaps at a later date, after we have seen that regional units will be successful, it will be found desirable to combine the administrative functions to include two or more counties or parts thereof. Any attempt at disruption of existing county boundaries at the present time would, in my view, create a situation that would produce more problems of a complex nature before we could even get the show on the road toward implementation of regional concepts.

One of the present difficulties encountered in our present system of local government lies with the exclusion of cities and separated towns from the county structure. This presents a real problem in those areas such as Waterloo county, where there are three cities comprising nearly 75 per cent of the total county population. The remaining 25 per cent must foot the bill for most county functions. In the case of the town of Preston with a population of 12,500, the contribution to county government represents about 25 per cent of the total county costs, with only seven per cent of the population. This is a gross inequity, and is one of the reasons why smaller centres seek city status to escape the unfair anomaly.

The answer, Mr. Speaker, must surely be to remove this inequity by bringing the cities back into the county system or this new regional concept. However, there are certain difficulties that must be faced, such as the fear on the part of the smaller units that the city will dominate at the expense of the villages and towns. Even with representation by population this danger will continue, and it will only be the co-operative efforts of all concerned that will alleviate the fears of the suburban and the rural people. The advantages of including the cities and the separated towns will, I believe, become evident in the adjustment that will be necessarily taking place in provincial grants and the general improvement in the financial strength of the larger units.

The duties of the new regional unit will vary, I think, according to the needs of the individual region. There are certain basic functions, however, that should definitely be a regional responsibility.

Assessment presents one of the major areas of inequity. In my view this should be a must for the regional governments. In this respect, I believe the use of a standard assessment manual should be mandatory.

Planning, of course, is one function that is already gaining widespread acceptance on an area basis, and this too should be a first with the regional unit.

Health, welfare, policing, suburban or arterial roads should also be included. And the varying circumstances from one region to another will determine those things that are actually regional in nature. The implementation of any new regional government is a matter for study by civic leaders in the municipalities concerned.

I do not believe there should be any general legislation of a type that spells out exactly what may or may not be done. I do believe that there should be enabling legislation that permits any county, upon certain conditions such as a majority expression of opinion, to incorporate themselves into a unit of regional government. Within the terms of reference, and incorporated into the enabling provincial statutes, certain functions should be mandatory. Perhaps this could be accomplished by the passing of an Act similar to the Act that was passed and known as The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act, 1953.

Page 166 of the committee's report includes a recommendation that greater use be made of permissive, rather than mandatory legislation. It would be highly desirable to see the municipalities take advantage of permissive legislation, and indeed the provincial authorities have avoided mandatory legislation wherever possible. Sometimes the narrow thinking of some municipal officials acts as a deterrent to progressive action in the municipal function. It is to be hoped that such narrowmindedness may be overcome by the recommended programme of study by The Department of Municipal Affairs, and by greater participation in the direction of local government reform by various municipal organizations and officials.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note the public reaction to the committee's report since it was tabled on March 30th. Dr. E. G. Rivard Pleva, head of the University of Western Ontario geography department, called our report a logical evolution of what is going on. Those were his words. He further feels that the recommendations will not destroy local government, but that the scale of operation just has to be larger in recognition of technological changes.

The planning director of the city of Galt labels the report as one of the finest he has ever seen and he expressed the hope that the Legislature would adopt it. The warden of Waterloo county and the reeve of Waterloo township both hail the report as a fine one and something for which they have been waiting a long time.

Certainly there have been some criticisms—some severe, some very mild. But the general reaction has been good. I believe the report is a valuable indication of the present thinking and trend regarding local government and I earnestly commend it to the Legislature for further consideration.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this discussion on the report of the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts. I assure you that I am not going to get into the detail of this particular document, simply because your committee has done a lot of work in four years. After completing that work they have put it into this group of recommendations, so we have still not come to what we thought we would get when this report came in. I felt that they would take it a step further, and the last speaker just confirmed what I was thinking. He claimed that you do not want to make anything mandatory; you should let the people choose for themselves through the enterprise system. I think that is good.

If the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) had looked at the problem in the same way, he would not have eliminated a lot of the school boards and put it into a system that even we in the Opposition believe is a step in the right direction.

I would like to comment on two or three items of the report that I am quite well acquainted with—on page 185, summary of recommendations pertaining to regional government, and section 8, that the regional council be given the power to assessment, taxation, planning, arterial roads, public health, hospitals, welfare and policing. If one was to take only 15 minutes on each item it would keep you here for a couple of days. I would not want to do that, but I would like to touch on the assessment portion of this that I am acquainted with.

I can recall, in my early experience in municipal affairs, that we felt that we should have a county assessor. We discussed it in county council; always, no matter what you bring into a county council, you will find opposition, and we were defeated that year by one vote. The old timers on the county council did not feel that we were ready for or should have county assessors. In the following year we persuaded some of the older men with more experience to go along with us and try it for a period of time. We hired Ralph Wilson, who said it would take him five years to put county assessment into being. He not only did a good job—I am speaking now for the whole county of Welland—he finally upgraded the methods that were used before; I would like to relate to you how they did assessments in those days. They would pick an assessment committee from the county council—three men, possibly five—and they would go about with a pad of paper, visiting each municipality. By looking at the building they would determine the value and put it down in their own way. Then they would come back to their county council and they would tabulate and add up the amounts. Then they would agree among themselves, after a couple of days of argument, and come into the county council and have their session on assessment for about four days, trying to saw off and to keep their assessment down in their own individual municipality, because they contributed to the county system by that method. After they were tired of the debate they would give in and finally agree on a certain set of figures for that particular year. This would go on from year to year.

I recall in my term of office as warden of the county that we felt we should meet monthly. We revised the method; we would not let this particular thing continue. We appointed a county assessor. He took it according to the provincial manual at that time. I hear a lot of argument, and I would like to be put straight if this is true, that there is not a provincial manual. I thought for many years we were working according to a provincial manual that is not quite what it ought to be, and there is a new one coming in. If my information is right I could take it from there, but I believe we will find that that is so.

Finally, last Saturday, for the benefit of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, who was in our area last Wednesday or the Wednesday before that, there was a meeting in the county building called the Niagara regional workshop, put on by the Ontario municipal association. The Ralph Wilson I speak of, who was assessor of the county of Welland, made a speech in that session; he has been invited to be the assessment commissioner in another county. I find that the government did not give leadership when it came to assessment commissioners or county assessors. They left it entirely to the municipalities. I believe that one of the most serious mistakes that the province ever made was the fact that it did not pursue this further. Let us not make it mandatory, but have a little more leadership to persuade the people to come to that type of assessment because it is the nearest thing to right that we have in the Dominion of Canada.

So I believe, as a member of the Opposition, that not enough time is given by the different departments of government to the municipalities that would be persuaded to go along with the new kind of thinking in the different departments. I say to you that assessment, at least on a county basis, is good business. We find that in my neighbourhood, and I am happy to say that Welland and Lincoln are going along nicely towards the possibility of regional government, whether it be mandatory or whether it be by free enterprise, by the fact that they have decided to get together.

The hon. Minister has taken a step forward and I want to compliment him at this time. I attended this meeting with the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs. The people sat there and discussed this problem. I see that according to the paper the other day the city of Niagara Falls has decided to go on with more of the investigation and continue on with more research to see whether something can come of this. The way it was put to those people was that it may not happen; you may not get anything out of this at all; you may not change a thing, and then again you may decide among yourselves to do something that would make this a regional form of government. I think that is about it in a nutshell.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the government would have taken these steps many years ago, these people could have been persuaded, because they realize that with the county type of government that we have at the moment, the group of capable people have nothing more to do than to meet and discuss some of the problems that come under their jurisdiction. They do not have enough of the problems of that particular county in their offices where they can do a better job for you.

I was thinking of planning, as I see it here in item 8. In 1947, when I was elected to council, we attended a meeting in Niagara Falls with some of the people of that area. Mr. Nash came and spoke to our people, and we finally put the wheels in motion. There was no financial assistance at that time from the province for the planning board. They were just persuaded to go—at least, they were talked to by your department people and they finally decided to bring about a planning board. Immediately the planning board had a certain area in which to work; it was three municipalities at that time which decided to have a town planner—Niagara Falls, Stamford township and the village of Chippawa.

A problem would crop up which was out of the jurisdiction of the planning board. We had a fringe area that was being built on that certainly was not becoming to the rest of that particular community. You could see the difference immediately as you drove into these towns.

So we have a planning board in—I am sorry the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Morningstar) is not here—but we have a planning board in Thorold which takes care of that area. We have had joint meetings with them from time to time, and we were talking of some kind of regional government for a larger area that a planning board could take care of. Nothing came of it, but finally we are talking about doing things now. Better now than never, I suppose, but it could have been done many years ago if your people had had their ears to the ground and realized that these people want to co-operate and want better planning boards.

I see you have a problem here with arterial roads, and that the new regional council will be given the power to take care of arterial roads. This is a problem we have had with us for many years. We have had the provincial highways, the county roads, the suburban road commission and, I think it applies here as it does everywhere else, the city pays 50 per cent of the cost of suburban roads that are governed by a group of people. So if those on the outskirts want to build certain roads in certain areas, the suburban roads commission does this and 50 per cent of the cost is borne by the city itself.

This is an obsolete way of doing business. Many years ago, the reason was that where an individual coming into, let us say, the grist mill with his wagon, found out that the man who had the mill had to help him out of the mud with his wagon and horses to get his wheat in to have it ground into flour. So the little village thought, why should we do this, we can settle this by fixing the roads a little bit because they are coming to us to do business with us. That is the purpose of the suburban road commission, to pave those roads so people can come into town and do business with you. That is a thing of the past yet it still exists in the records of this particular province and I think it is not at all good.

I believe that suburban roads in many areas where they connect between two highways should be taken into the highway system, then you immediately eliminate one particular body that does nothing more than administer, let us say, half a million or a million dollars in any of the rural areas. You have a five-man commission under the county engineer who also takes care of the county roads, and he, being the engineer for both, tells you where he believes you should pave these particular roads. I think the province has enough experience now to take suburban roads completely out of the picture and put them in the hands of The Department of Highways.

We were discussing welfare on occasion here, and the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) informed me last year that the county of Welland would have a welfare administrator. Since that time they have hired a man by the name of Don Cowan from Thorold, I believe. They gave him a new title, I see but he is the welfare commissioner in the county of Welland.

He was telling us at this particular meeting, Mr. Speaker, that by the very fact that he visits with the people who are asking for welfare and can devote full time to it with an office to himself—working through the municipal clerk—he can find the people who are entitled to welfare and should have it. Or he can find out that there are some who have been going to the municipal clerk for many years immediately they are laid off their summer work. They go to the municipal clerk and say, “I want my welfare.” The clerk thinks, well, why not? It only costs us in the municipality 20 per cent. We will give him his welfare through the winter months.

I can think of one village in my riding—and this must happen elsewhere—where it all depends on the clerk. They were giving 1,800 people welfare to the tune of $32,000 or $33,000 a year, simply because the province pays 80 per cent. This is what the clerk thought. It does not cost us too much. These people need it.

Yet, the same village that I come from, and I do not think we are a hard-hearted lot, I think there are three or four people not collecting welfare because the clerk did not feel they were entitled to it. He felt they should go to work.

The county assessor can investigate and find the ones who are entitled to it. It takes the burden off the municipal clerk and Lord knows what it costs that municipality to administer those books.

I see in the budget of Crystal Beach that last year they have put down a figure of $500 for welfare, compared to $30,000-odd for this year. Mind you, they pay it from the county level, and the same portion of the money no doubt comes from the province, but we have now a county welfare officer. I do believe that—and I think I should make a prediction at this time—from what I gathered at that meeting, and what I gathered at the following meeting on Saturday night, that you could have more of this regional government than you might believe, and get it much quicker in those two counties simply because those people are willing to cooperate.

I heard the mayor of St. Catharines speak. Now that is a large city. I heard the mayor of St. Catharines speak the following Saturday, and he spoke of the many problems they had because there were areas that no one wanted to touch. The township had an area that they were not very interested in, so the city, thinking for themselves and for their own people, took in this larger area. Naturally, he said, it makes for much better administration and much better government and much better for the people of that particular city.

I think experience has taught the government that it is about time they put the wheels in motion, and moved them a lot quicker than they have done. If they have got the wheels in motion, let us grease them and get them on their way.

I feel very strongly about this. I was amused at the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) veering off in another direction last night when he pointed in my direction and he said the member for Niagara Falls, no doubt, will be wanting six or eight or 10 men, I think he said, in Crystal Beach. I can say to the hon. Attorney General, through Mr. Speaker, that they are entitled to them, and they should have them. They not only should have them, but you should pay for them.

By the same argument I will tell the government that it has in the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General, $35,000 or $30,000 for the city of Niagara Falls for policing the area of the Rainbow bridge and the front, simply because the influx of population comes into that city and you felt, or at least somebody felt a few years ago, that they should contribute towards those costs. So you have in your estimates this year, $30,000 for the city of Niagara Falls.

By the same token, does the government not believe that a summer resort area should get the same treatment as the people that come into an area of 2,000 population under ordinary circumstances?

The government say that seven or 10 more police are needed, and I say to them that if those police are out on the highway, they are paying for them. Immediately they come into the municipality to police people from the rest of the province, the people from the rest of the province have to pay and this is not fair and just. The government can take that for what it is worth.

I find that the people of a small summer resort area are pleased when Labour Day rolls around. I am talking about a man who lives in a home in a summer resort area that is not interested in an influx of population at all. After Labour Day and the weather is good, they live like normal human beings again, the police go away and their taxes come down a bit and why should they not be happy?

But I think the pendulum swings one way for one area, and I am not arguing about that $30,000 you are giving Niagara Falls. I do not think you are giving them enough.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): I will answer this later in the estimates, but I would just ask the hon. member now, who makes the money from all these tourists who pour into Niagara Falls?

Mr. Bukator: I can assure the hon. Attorney General that the man who has a residential home in Niagara Falls is not making anything out of it. A man who is working, let us say at the Hydro, where the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Boyer) comes from, works at the Hydro. He goes and carries his pail to the job, he comes back home again, cuts his grass, and how pleased he is when the flock has gone away. He is not interested in the tourist industry.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (Parkdale): Let us stay on the report.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Just close the bridges and keep the people out of Niagara Falls, if that is what the hon. member wants.

Mr. Bukator: The hon. member, as a preacher, should not misconstrue things like that. He is a man of God, he should know better than that. He knows I did not mean it that way. I will get back to the insurance man a little later.

We are interested in the tourists, and I will get back to the report when I feel like it. I think I have a right to deviate a little bit. Everybody else does in this House, I notice.

Mr. Bukator: Well, as they just said it was a good speech I had better quit now.

Mr. Speaker, I understand we are going to stay here until one o'clock anyway. However, there are three more speakers who were on this particular committee. I would be interested in knowing what they have to say. I have touched on planning, arterial roads, Crystal Beach—

Mr. Cowling: Hydro!

Mr. Bukator: Hydro. The hon. member will have his turn up to bat, I promise him.

An hon. member: Police!

Mr. Bukator: The police problem is a serious one. It may not be for some of you people from rural areas where you plough your field in the summer and you have the winter months to come down here and enjoy yourselves, but we have problems where people come in to visit with us. We want to treat them right, but when we find some of the things in this report, when and if they come to pass, I would say the government would have done its job and done it well. Up to the moment, I find nothing more than report after report being called for; when these things come to pass, I will be the first to congratulate the government.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, as one of those who sat on this committee for some period of time, I am interested in this report and in its implementation.

As the hon. member for Waterloo South said a few moments ago, this report is not a cure-all. It is not intended to be that, but it is, I think, one of the most significant documents that has appeared in this field before this Legislature for many decades. It should be treated and considered as such.

The other night the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), according to yesterday's paper, made a speech; I quote:

The war against poverty may require a complete overhaul of Ontario's municipal structure and development of regional governments, Premier Robarts said last night. "The proposal is receiving intensive study at present," he told 700 cheering supporters. "This is one of the areas of action which I foresee in the next ten years."

Mr. Speaker, in a matter of this great importance, I would have thought that the hon. Prime Minister, or at least the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs would have led off this debate with a positive statement in the House about this report and about government intention in regard to the report. Any executive of any organization is looked to for leadership. Generally, in a matter of great importance, an executive makes a recommendation. So here, this morning, I had looked for the hon. Prime Minister or the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs to rise and initiate this debate, stressing the importance of this document, stressing government policy in relation to it and giving recommendations in regard to its implementation should this Legislature adopt it, which I believe it will.

This House faces, I think, one of the great decisions of its career in this field of municipal jurisdiction. Over the past few years we have seen a jungle of jurisdictions developing, set up by the various Ministers of the Crown because they have found, invariably and inevitably, that present municipal boundaries are inadequate for the administration of their departments. Only in one or two cases have we stuck to the municipal boundaries for any major administrative procedures. I do not have all the figures, but I jotted down one or two. The hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) has about 18 administrative districts. The numbers are not important, but this is an illustration. The hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) lists 22, with another 41 sub-districts, or something like that. The hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) has ten; Tourism and Information has divided the province into 32 regions for its own purposes. Mines has 14 divisions. The police commission, just the other day, made certain recommendations which were mentioned last night by the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) and by other hon. members in this House. In order to assess the policy needs, a survey has been undertaken. It was hoped this survey would be completed by June of 1965. However, due to the response by this commission to the many requests by municipalities for aid and assistance, it will take somewhat longer to complete the survey. Because of their size and consequent limitation of budget, it says, the small municipalities cannot possibly have efficient, well-trained adequate police forces. No police force under ten men can possibly hope to be properly organized, well-trained and efficient, capable of serving their area of responsibility. So the recommendation is that amalgamation of police forces take place and this study is undertaken to decide what sort of amalgamation, and what police forces, should be brought together, and what territories should be unified for this particular purpose.

The report also tells us that we have about 202 municipalities with police forces under the efficient number they give, and another 36 under 20 men for police forces on three shifts. We have 42 listed as efficient. So the pressure is on here for this kind of amalgamation and regional grouping.

The other day the hon. Minister of Highways pointed out that he is conducting surveys and studies of traffic movement and making plans for the kind of highways that should be built over the next few years. This is being done without definite and detailed reference to what new regional municipal government ought to be; I think the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs should sit down with the hon. Minister of Highways—perhaps he has; I hope he has—look at this outline and study it carefully, because the direction and development of highways has an important bearing upon the total development of any region where those highways are situated. And so we have the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) mentioning that he is encouraging the building of regional jails. That is good. This should come as quickly as possible; but where are those regional jails going to be located? Are they going to be located without reference to new political boundaries in the regional units? I would hope that the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs are carefully looking at this thing and that when those jails and the new regional units are situated they should be in such a way that they conform to the pattern which should, and which must, emerge for the new regional governments.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is incumbent upon this House and upon this government to deliberately delineate the areas of study and also the areas in which regional government, such as are recommended in this report, should be set up. We cannot afford any longer the kind of helter-skelter, hodge-podge development that has grown up across this province; we must think in terms of grouping the population with the services that those groupings can give us. Concentration of population brings certain advantages in transportation, industry and culture, but those concentrations of population also need food-producing areas, they must have recreation areas, they must have open space and green space and all the rest of the amenities needed. So the old city-state concept of years ago, where the two are one, inseparable parts of each other, must come back into our thinking. Today, as we think in terms of the city and the rural area, we must think in terms of viable units which belong to each other and which can be developed as units which mean something in our day in civilization.

In this situation I think we have to carefully consider what we are going to do about this matter of self-government. I know that bugbear which my hon. colleague has mentioned here, that local councils are afraid of what will happen to them and what will happen to jurisdiction, and I have read editorials which have expressed concern that people who are now close to the electorate and the needs of the people will no longer be close, because if seats of government are removed to a distance, those local problems will be lost in the bigness of the new unit.

I just do not believe this is entirely valid today, with the new means of communication, the new means of transportation. People are as close to their representative today as the telephone, as so many of us find out day by day. No matter how far people may live from us they can easily and quickly contact us when they need us at the provincial, at the federal, and at the municipal level. And in the larger municipal units this is just as true as in the very small ones across this province.

The hon. member for Waterloo South has mentioned that in these groupings the cities must eventually come in, and I think the cities must. I think I understood him correctly, and certainly this is the recommendation here, although there has been some disagreement among the committee in this field, but the city is an integral part of this unit and it must no longer be separated from the hinterland and from the small towns and villages. When I look over some of the situations that exist in this province it is rather an interesting thing.

Just to use a couple of examples, in the county of Carleton in the eastern part of the province we have the city of Ottawa with 280,000 people. Then the municipalities are like this, 25,000, 1,200, 2,300, 1,600, 2,300, 20,000, 2,300, 1,800, 934, 835, 766. This is the variation in population within that one county.

When we look at the county of Bruce, we find there populations in this order, 1,700, 2,800, 2,000, 4,100, 333, 401, 744, 353, 1,363, and so the story goes. Great variation. Variation so significant that these small municipalities cannot possibly hope to compete in the days to come for staff, for equipment, for the amenities which people expect to have in any modern municipality. So the very driving force of these small sizes inevitably is going to bring us together.

But there is another thing we have to face—the lesson we have learned, I think, in Metropolitan Toronto over the last ten years, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Waterloo South is a bit concerned at the changes in the present setup, in the present boundaries, in the present powers, that they do not come too fast. He said, I think, that we should see if this thing works out successfully in stages before we plunge in.

It is like the old bit of advice that the mother gave to the son, "You had better not go into the water until you know how to swim." I think in this situation we are in exactly the same kind of position where the need is here, the need is urgent, where we have got to learn to swim in the new municipal structure, and we have to get some of these structures set up and get them set up fast.

But if we try to repeat the experience of Metro Toronto then we are only asking for the same kind of difficulty that Metro demonstrates, and which today we should avoid.

The Smallwood report issued in 1963 pointed out these significant facts, that where we have the kind of grouping that we have in Metro Toronto, with each municipality an entity unto itself, with its own assessment and treasury and administration, with a larger unit taking over simply trunk services and certain key and basic things, then the disparity within the various municipalities continues and, in fact, increases. So you had a situation where East York in 1962 had an assessment per capita of $1,787 and Leaside an assessment of $4,052. This has widened over the intervening years since Metro was formed.

And the assessment per pupil enrolled in public schools, which is a very significant figure, is this: Leaside, 34,200; Forest Hill, 29,700; and at the other end of the scale, Scarborough, 9,600; and East York, 13,300. What has happened here is simply the rich kept getting richer and the poor kept getting poorer. The small municipalities could still not afford the services that were offered by the larger municipalities and the problem was not solved. Mr. Goldenberg had to be appointed to try to find new answers after that period.

Fundamental, it seems to me—and this is one place where I disagree to some extent with some of the members of the committee—is this recommendation quoted by my hon. friend from Niagara Falls, recommendation eight, that the regional council be given the power of assessment, taxation, planning, arterial roads and all the rest—the powers of assessment and taxation, that is the regional council.

So assessment, as we have been trying and as the hon. Minister has been trying to do over the last period, should be widened, and the regional government should be responsible for that. But it should be responsible also for the fiscal policies of the region. We just cannot afford to have a continuation of local treasuries in local municipalities.

I can see a situation where local municipalities might become boroughs or wards of a larger region, either individually or in combination, and some provision has to be made for this kind of local administration.

But fundamentally there must be one treasury in the region. The boroughs may submit their budgets to the regional government. The budgets will then be scrutinized in view of the needs of the whole area. The borough might ask for $200,000 to put in watermains this year. The regional government might say we allow you $150,000. That goes back to the borough and then the borough administers that $150,000. It determines where within the borough boundaries, the greatest need is for those watermains, and then it lets the contracts. But the bills are forwarded to the central treasury for payment, and thereby fiscal control for the whole area is maintained.

But it does more than that. This method eliminates the great competition we have had for assessment in industry. Within Metro today, every municipality is competing for industrial assessment. Mr. Smallwood tells us that over this period, since Metro was formed, North York's ratio of industrial-commercial total assessment, and some of us had something to do with this, has risen by 11 per cent from 1954 to 1962. Etobicoke's by 12 per cent; and Scarborough's by 5 per cent.

Now the problem here is that industrial assessment is the kind of assessment that does not demand schools and many other services, and so it is gravy, if you will, in the assessment picture. So we have each of the small municipalities competing for it. It helps the tax rate, because single family homes do not pay their way in most municipalities, unless the tax rate is very, very high.

But if we have one treasury in the Metro area, or any other region, then all the industrial assessment and taxation flows into the central treasury, and within that region industry can be placed where it ought to be placed, not just where local municipalities are able to pull it, and so logical planning for industrial development can take place. Then the bills for the whole area are paid out of, in part, that industrial assessment.

The hon. Minister of Economics and Development had a problem on his hands regarding houses. The Ontario housing corporation is trying to build thousands upon thousands of low-cost houses in this province, but many municipalities resist this because the tax income does not pay. So low-cost housing is barred, blocked, and delayed; we have not been able to get it. Much of this is because the municipality which accepts low-cost housing accepts a tax liability.

If within the region one treasury is set up and all tax incomes flow into that region, the low-cost housing can be placed within the region, without affecting the borough or ward or local area's taxes. Those houses can be placed properly and, I would hope, in cooperation with the development of the highway and street system, vis-à-vis the industrial development.

We face the problem today of trying to bring order out of this chaos. One thing I would like to mention in this regard is that election—and this again is one of the recommendations—of representatives on the central regional council must be direct. It cannot continue the present county system where you have great conflicts of interest between the reeves and the various officers of various municipalities. It must be direct. More than that, it must be for longer terms. The recommendation is three-year terms as minimum. I think that should be extended to four, but I am quite content if we get the three-year term; then I think we are making real progress in this regard, because this kind of planning demanded for regional government is the kind which takes time. Nobody who has to come up for election every year or two can possibly do the job that ought to be done.

Mr. Speaker, we hope that this government will face up to this problem today. Time, it seems to me, is of the essence; action is imperative before the new jails, the new police jurisdictions and the new emerging boundaries for all the new services which are being offered by all and sundry are solidified into a hopeless, tangled, jurisdictional jungle. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has an instrument in this report to bring order out of impending chaos; I hope that he will undertake this job immediately; that he will put the power of his government behind it and that the job will be undertaken.

I know that the hon. Minister has assured us that Mr. Cumming, the former deputy Minister, is in an office prepared to start to implement this programme.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): In the Deputy Minister's office.

Mr. Young: The Deputy Minister's office. We will not argue about that point at this moment, because it seems the new deputy is fairly happy with the arrangement. I do not know, but it is rather an unusual procedure.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): What is that?

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister should have been listening.

Mr. Young: I do know that there is concern in this field. I do not think that we can leave this to the whole process of annexations and struggle between municipalities that we have had. I do not think we can leave it to regional planning boards, because they have to deal with a diversity of jurisdictions. The recommendations they make may be accepted by one jurisdiction and rejected by another, so they have no power. The only answer here is new regional municipal governments, political entities, geared to this day and age, large enough to be viable, large enough to permit the kind of planning which must come, large enough to attract trained staff which can use the kind of equipment which modern municipalities demand. This will mean the disappearance of many small municipalities, but I do not think we can, at this time, afford to think too carefully about those little political machines in those little municipalities. This government must give that strong lead, not just persuasion. I think as a Cabinet and as a government there must be unity; there must be stronger action, and I would ask the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs that he enunciate government policy in this direction and tell us what we can expect. How serious is the government about this plan, and how quickly can we expect a setting-up of new and modern municipal administrations within the bounds of this province?

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Speaker, I think it is interesting to note on this committee, according to the journals of the legislative assembly, 1960-61, the way the original committee was set up. It might be of interest to the newer hon. members, and some of the others who have been here, too.

The committee was set up on a motion by Mr. Frost and seconded by Mr. Warrender. The original members of the nine-man committee included Mr. Beckett, the chairman, Messrs. Belisle, Evans, Cowling, Gordon, Morrow, McNeil, Singer and Thomas. Mr. Beckett, of course, continued; Mr. Belisle moved on to Ottawa and became a senator; Mr. Morrow is now the hon. Speaker of the House; Mr. McNeil went to another committee; Mr. Thomas is not with us. So the complexion of the committee has changed over the years. As a matter of fact, I do not recall, Mr. Speaker, in my time here a select committee that has continued at such length as this one. This in itself is an indication of the importance and the size of the subject to be dealt with. There have been four reports submitted; the final report, I think, is a most important document. Like other members of the committee who have spoken, I was not in complete agreement with all the recommendations made by the committee, but I think in the majority of cases they were well thought out and, in the final writing, the recommendations were agreed upon.

On page 168 of the fourth report we say:

In order to restore responsibility to the elected representatives and increase the possibility of economical and efficient administration of municipal services, larger units of government are necessary in the province today.

And further:

A great deal of caution must be exercised in implementing change in a system of local self-government that has evolved over a century. That system embodies the collective experience, knowledge and wisdom of many persons. It has worked rather well, and should not be lightly dismissed. Instead, serious consideration should be given to this committee's recommendation that there be a continuing committee on municipal and local government reform. Our system of local government should be under constant review and changes implemented as the need dictates.

Some of the hon. members this morning have made reference to Metropolitan Toronto. I am one of those who has been particularly interested in the development of Metropolitan Toronto since 1954, and it was my pleasure to have a part in the passing of the original Bill No. 80 which set up Metropolitan Toronto.

Really, Mr. Speaker, we do have a regional government operating in our province today, because I think that this metropolitan region of Toronto is the way that the system could be developed in many ways, and I have stated that in committee.

We have talked about direct representation, direct election, certain services being taken over by a proposed regional government, but I always get back to the idea that we have proven successful regional government right with us. There will be changes and amendments made, naturally, that is in the evolution of things. But basically I think the metropolitan form of government in Toronto has been very useful and has organized this vast area into a unit which has been most successful, even with its many shortcomings.

And I think it is understood, Mr. Speaker, that The Department of Municipal Affairs has gone ahead with several studies throughout Ontario in different areas and these, of course, could be put into effect very quickly on the same basis as Metropolitan Toronto.

As the hon. member for Waterloo South mentioned, in his opinion—and I agree with what he had to say—it would not be necessary to move in and establish regional governments in areas where they were not required, and there are many such areas in the province of Ontario. But I think there are enough areas which need attention in our province today in which we can move very quickly in setting up a regional government in whatever form the government might decide that they are going to recommend. But again, I say we know of Metropolitan Toronto, we know of its successes and we know of its failures, we know what it has done for the people of our area. Maybe at the beginning we could expand that into other such sections of the province.

On page 173, we say:

Regions must be studied individually in terms of population, logical planning areas, watersheds, economic and social conditions and other relevant factors, in order to define suitable boundaries for larger units of government. As a practical start, the committee recommends the adoption of the county in whole or in part or with additions thereto, as the basic unit of government.

It is odd how your ideas and thoughts change over the years. As I say, some of us were on the original committee, and I must admit quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, that some of my original thoughts, or thoughts that I had four years ago pertaining to municipal government, are not the thoughts that I have today. I am sure that applies to other members of the committee.

I felt that local autonomy was a most important thing, and I still do, but at the same time in the province where we have almost 1,000 municipalities, some consolidation for the betterment of the people in a given area is most important. And if some of the local governments have to be merged into the larger area and lose out as an individual economic council, then that is just part of the general good for the whole area.

I do not say that we should eliminate small councils just because they happen to be small councils. After all, many local councils have been in force and effect for many years, and have done a lot of good, and I would be the last one to just say, holus-bolus, we are going to cut out 500 municipalities. At the same time, we must remember that a year or two ago we arranged the consolidation of school boards and reduced the number of school boards in the province, which, to the best of my knowledge, has been very advantageous to those areas affected.

So, the pattern may be set as far as the local governments are concerned. The county system is here to stay. I do not favour any abolition of the county system of government at all. I think the county system of government has done a lot for our province over the years. But I do not feel in setting up this proposed regional government that we should go along county boundary lines necessarily. I think that we should set up a region, not having regard for county boundaries or municipal boundaries or conservation areas.

As one hon. member says, we have many regions in the province today, including conservation regions, economic regions, planning regions, and so on, but the most important region that we will set up is the area which will contain a municipal government.

My feeling is that the new area can be developed much along the lines as we have done in Metropolitan Toronto. They could take over water, they could take over sewage, they could take over police, they could certainly take over the financial aspect of the situation and move into several of these areas on a regional basis, leaving certain authority with the local council and the local government. Obviously over the years, the importance and the work and the duties and the functions of the larger government would take control and automatically over the years the responsibility of the local council would be reduced to practically nothing without, in the early stages, saying, "This is the way it is going to be."

In time, the situation would take care of itself and the work of the local government would become greatly reduced.

This has been tried in other areas and I keep harking back to Metropolitan Toronto all the time because it is the one we are most familiar with. But on page 176, for example, of our final report, under responsibilities of regional governments, we say:

The problem of assigning powers and duties to the regional government was considered at length by the committee. Inherent in the question are the varied interests as between those in urban and rural areas. Services considered necessary for the city-oriented person might prove a burden and even ridiculous for the rural resident.

The committee came to the conclusion that a study must be made of each individual area before any specific allocation of responsibilities could be recommended in that area. The committee feels, however, that there are certain basic responsibilities that should be assigned immediately to the regional council. These relate to assessment, taxation, planning, arterial roads, public health, hospitals, welfare and policing. Certain other services might be administered by the regional council.

That pretty well conforms with some of the ideas that I have spoken about.

I think in the overall picture, Mr. Speaker, that we are headed certainly in the right direction. There is a place for the local council, there is a place for the regional council. We can move cautiously into areas that will be given due consideration by the hon. Minister and the experts in his department before anything is done. I do not feel that we are moving into an entirely new situation because we do have a regional government here from which we can learn very much, and regardless of what some people have to say I feel that this has been successful to a point and that we can use the ideas, the good points and the bad points of Metropolitan Toronto to initiate and begin our other regional areas in the province.

I think one of the most important recommendations that this committee makes is that a continuing committee be established to be associated with the department or the hon. Minister in some way, so that constant review can be made of the municipal setup. It was my good fortune, Mr. Speaker, to be chairman of a municipal advisory committee that operated over several years, and I think made many very good recommendations to the Minister, some of which he used—

Mr. Young: Is the hon. member preaching for a call now?

Mr. Cowling: No, not necessarily, I am just talking about municipal officers. Much good work has been done over the years in the matter of municipal affairs. I congratulate the hon. Minister and his department for the action that they have taken, and I have every confidence, Mr. Speaker, that the implementation of the main aspects of our report will be seriously considered. I look forward at our next session to passing many of the recommendations as they are introduced by the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, my remarks in this debate are going to be brief. This has been an interesting debate and those hon. members who have participated in it have reviewed the report reasonably completely and have put forward views that, substantially, I share.

The tenor of my comments are going to be in line with urging the government to get something done. We have seen, as this session has unfolded, that there are problems of centralization, of regional forms of approach, not only in The Department of Municipal Affairs, but in a variety of departments. Last evening, when we were discussing the report of the Ontario police commission, it was obvious that something has to be done to consolidate police forces. Certainly the same sort of thinking is going to apply when the estimates of the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) come before us. There is an urgent need to consolidate health units throughout the province and make them big enough so that there will be enough money available to properly look after the health of the people of the province on a municipal or regional basis.

Similar problems were obvious during the debates on the estimates of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, Mr. Speaker, and I said last night, and I said during those estimates, that I do not think that a persuasive effort is going to be successful, either in his department or in any of the other departments.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, with the efforts of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development. He had this regional conference, a most impressive one. There were all sorts of people who came forward and gave their opinions, but the one thing that emerges from all this discussion from this report, sir, from the economic conference, from the report of the Ontario police commission, from the remarks of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, and from what I am sure the hon. Minister of Health is going to have to say when his estimates come before this House, is obvious. Everyone seems to agree that our system of local government is a horse-and-buggy one which we have not adapted to today's way of life. 1965 is very different from 1849.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is just a matter of the hon. member's opinion—

Mr. Singer: I was going to be kind to the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am kind to the hon. member.

Mr. Singer: Just a minute. I was going to say that I think really the hon. Minister believes this, that all we are really discussing is the method of doing it.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is right.

Mr. Singer: The method of doing it.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Let us not talk about horse-and-buggy days, because that is irrelevant.

Mr. Singer: It is a horse-and-buggy statute and it is a horse-and-buggy system, and if the hon. Minister wants chapter and verse as to why, we will have to go at it a bit longer. One figure comes quickly to my mind. The Ontario police commission advises us that we have 280 municipal forces, 202 of which have nine or fewer men. The commission goes on to say that no force with fewer than nine men in it can possibly be efficient. So, in numerical strength of forces, over 200 of 280 are, in the opinion of the hon. Attorney General's advisors, inefficient. In the 970 municipalities that we have, I am sure the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs will agree that there are not really more than what—50 to 75—which have the financial resources, the staff to do the job that a municipal government is expected to do and is able to do today.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I would not agree with that.

Mr. Singer: Well, move the figure up. Make it 100.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I would not agree with that, either.

Mr. Singer: It is less than half; probably less than two-thirds of the 970-odd municipalities that we have.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have to move towards a different form of municipal government, regional government. This cannot be spelled out in complete detail in this report, it is suggested. My urgent plea is that the government take the initiative, and the kind of initiative is most important. The police commission in its recommendations said there were three systems of bringing this about. There is the permissive system, the persuasive system or the mandatory system. It is my sincere opinion, Mr. Speaker, that permitting people to do this is going to achieve practically nothing. Perhaps as good a persuader as there is in the government benches, according to his own words, in any event, is the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions. He has been doing his best to persuade, and he says he is most encouraged by the results of the conversations he has been having. But he was unable to tell us of the success in even one instance of his fine effort to persuasion.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): It takes a certain amount of time.

Mr. Singer: I agree. So the persuasive system, even with the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, takes quite a time. He is not able to give us even one example as to where he succeeded. He is hopeful; good for him.

The hon. Minister of Economics and Development who, by his own admission, can sell refrigerators to the Eskimos, also says regional government is great.

The hon. Minister of Education from time to time not only says it, but brings in the odd statute. The hon. Prime Minister, in September in London, and the other night when he was speaking to a gathering of the faithful accompanied by several of his hon. colleagues, seemed to indicate that he thinks it is a good idea.

There is little apparent disagreement on the government benches that we must move forward to this objective.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: But if we could move forward over a period of years and examine the hon. member's own experience in municipal affairs, I think he will agree with that statement.

Mr. Singer: My experience in municipal affairs, the hon. Minister knows full well, has been in the metropolitan area; there has been a substantial change in the metropolitan area since 1952. But the reason that came about was because of a crisis. In 1952 it became obvious to everyone, including the government of the day, that the system by which the 13 municipalities in the metropolitan area were being governed was stifling development. North York was left without any water—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I think it came about through the political courage of one man who was prepared to do it with the consent of only one of the 13 municipalities.

Mr. Singer: I am glad the hon. Prime Minister said that. I am saying let us have the same sort of courage today; let us have the same sort of courage right now.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We had it last year with the school boards. It is characteristic of this government.

Mr. Singer: Let us get going. Let us not wait until you build up the same sort of crisis that evokes the sort of courage to which the hon. Prime Minister refers. And it was a real crisis; North York without water, Scarborough without money, Toronto with no room. All these things promoted this fantastic crisis which eventually forced the government to act, or brought forth the show of courage that resulted in the creation of Metropolitan Toronto. Phrase it as you will, but do it today—that is my plea. Do that today and take your Minister of Reform Institutions and your Minister of Education and your Minister of Health and your Attorney General and say we are going to move to a type of regional government that is suited to the terms and conditions under which we live in the late 1960s. I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that the permissive system is not going to work, that the persuasive system will, perhaps, work, but I doubt if anyone in this House is going to live long enough to see it carried out. If this system is worthwhile, it must be mandatory and it must be done at government direction.

In saying that it must be mandatory, I am not suggesting that you ride roughshod over the people who are going to be concerned, and might object. But I am saying there has to be a clear declaration of government approach. There has to be unification on the Cabinet benches as to how each department concerned is going to fit in. Then there have to be a series of local or regional conferences to explain how it is going to be done, and examine the answer in each particular instance; because what might apply in the Niagara peninsula is not necessarily the answer in Port Arthur and Fort William, or in London or in Kingston.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am glad the hon. member realizes that.

Mr. Singer: I have said this all through; it is no new discovery. I have said this for many years, and I think we have got to embark upon it. I recognize it. When the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs brought his estimates before this House, I recognized that each region has to be studied individually and I commended him for suggesting that he was going to embark on—how many did the hon. Minister list? Ten or 12 studies? He admitted with me that it is going to be very difficult to get the ones you listed done within a 12-month period, because there are not enough trained people available.

I say that we need a declaration, Mr. Speaker, of government policy, that this is the direction in which we are going to move. We need this sort of study to go on. We need the opportunity for local consultation, but there has to be a recognition that the only action, the only way that this is going to be solved, is from the top down. It is not going to bubble up from the bottom, whether it is permissive or whether it is persuasive; it has got to be done from the top down and the government has to decide, having studied carefully and having listened, that on such-and-such a day in such-and-such an area, this is the way it will be. We have listened and this is our best decision.

In doing this, Mr. Speaker, there has to be a method worked out which does not exist on the government benches, and of co-ordination between all of these departments. It involves, perhaps, half a dozen different Ministers and half a dozen different departments. As we get into this, do these studies and make these decisions, all these departments have to become involved.

I asked the hon. Minister of Economics and Development, when his estimates were before the House, whether there were any plans or arrangements made so that his people who are studying regional development advise Mr. Jones, doing the Ottawa study, or Mr. Goldenberg who is doing the Metro study, or these other gentlemen who are going to be hired to do the other studies. The hon. Minister of Economics and Development did not give me an answer. I do not know whether such a system has been set up or not. But he has a branch of his department concerned with regional development. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs is concerned with regional development. I would hope that these two hon. Ministers are working together, that the regional development students in the economics department are making themselves and their reports available to the Murray Joneses and the Carl Goldenbergs and the others who are being investigated. I am not aware that such a system exists. Maybe it does. But if it does not, it is long past overdue.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: We are not all stupid.

Mr. Singer: I am not suggesting that anybody is stupid.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is what you are saying.

Mr. Singer: I am just suggesting a lack of direction in this government to clear up this problem, to move into the type of local government that we need. This lack has persisted for many years—certainly for the 23 years that this government has been in office.

My plea, Mr. Speaker, is that with this report and with what we have heard from the police commission, with what we have heard from the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs and the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions and all the rest of them, let us get at it and let us have a positive government statement.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is precisely what we are doing.

Mr. Singer: No, I do not think it is. Let us have a positive government statement that we are going to embark on this; that we will direct you. Before we direct, we will investigate carefully and we will give you an opportunity to present your views. If that is done, we will move towards better municipal government in the province of Ontario.

Mr. J. H. White (London South) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The first order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Gaunt) adjourned the debate on the Budget and he wishes to continue. But owing to his attendance, I understand, at a funeral in his area, he is not here today. We will proceed with the member for Cochrane North (Mr. Brunelle) and the member for Huron-Bruce will be allowed to participate at a later date.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. R. Brunelle (Cochrane North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the Budget debate, may I first commend you, sir, for the efficient and dignified manner in which you preside over the affairs of this House.

I wish to join with those who have participated in this debate in congratulating the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) for the financially sound Budget he introduced a few weeks ago. The economy of Ontario is indeed in a prosperous position and I am happy to report that the region I have the honour and privilege to represent, Cochrane North, is experiencing continuing economic growth with a high level of employment.

Before proceeding with this subject, permit me to mention, as we approach the centennial celebrations, some brief comments on the history of this northern region. The Cochrane district is privileged to have an extremely colourful past. It is able to boast that it was the first part of Ontario to be discovered by early explorers in the 17th century. The French explorer and fur trader De Groseilliers first stepped ashore in James Bay in 1669. In 1673 Pierre Radisson built the first Hudson's Bay Company post on Moose Factory Island. In a study published in 1957 by the University of Toronto school of architecture, it was stated that the staff house and the blacksmith forge on Moose Factory Island date back to 1820, and the Anglican mission church to 1860.

The blacksmith shop is reported to have been built in 1740 and is thus the oldest building in the province of Ontario. It contains a small museum. Dominating the room is the old blacksmith's forge. On each side, two gigantic bellows now lie silent and dusty. It will be of interest to the hon. members that the century-old Anglican mission church is unique; there are holes bored through the wooden floor covered with wooden pegs so that in case of spring flooding, water will pour in and keep the building from floating away as it did several years ago, when the parishioners were aroused in the middle of the night. They had to wade through several feet of water to bring the church back to its original site.

Moose Factory's historic past needs more recognition; this historic island could become one of the main tourist attractions in this province. I wish to quote briefly from a report entitled "The historic potential of Moose Factory as a visitor attraction":

It is commonly believed that when Count Frontenac built, in 1673, the fort that was to bear his name on the site of modern Kingston, the cornerstone of Ontario was laid. Not so well known is the fact that during that same summer of 1673, when the French established their post at Kingston, the British, through the agency of the Hudson's Bay Company, were constructing a quite similar fort at the mouth of the Moose River on James Bay. Thus, if we think in terms of cornerstones, the present province of Ontario began with two, each of which might be considered symbolic of the roots from which our nation sprang.

Fort Moose, constructed on Hayes Island on the estuary of the Moose River, was the second oldest post of the Hudson's Bay Company in the new world—the first post having been established in 1668 at the mouth of Rupert River in what is now the province of Quebec. In 1686, Moose Fort was captured by a French expedition from Montreal led by the Chevalier de Troyes. In the latter's words, "it was square, each side 130 feet long and protected by palisades from 16 to 18 feet high; the palisades were flanked by bastions of soil kept in place by stonework, and the two bastions facing the river mounted three cannons each while the two bastions facing the tundra mounted two cannons each."

The French capture of Moose Fort, which they renamed Fort St. Louis, was an easy victory, but their tenancy was by no means secure. In the bitter rivalry for the fur trade, French and English efforts to retain control of the site on the Moose see-sawed back and forth until, in 1713, the Treaty of Utrecht finally ceded to England all posts on Hudson and James Bays.

Not until 1729 did the Hudson's Bay Company decide to re-establish Moose Fort. The following year, a work party arrived at Hayes Island to commence building a new post. In spite of such problems as bricks arriving from England broken, construction proceeded steadily and by 1732 the fort was reported to be in good "forwardness." Disaster struck on Christmas Day, 1735, when a two-hour fire destroyed completely the new post from which the company had expected great returns.

The decision to rebuild Moose Factory was made immediately and one, Richard Staunton, was sent out from England to take charge of the new post and its construction. Having learned only after the disastrous fire that Moose Factory had possessed two cookhouses—instead of the authorized one—Staunton's superiors instructed him to build one new cookhouse, a "good distance from the powder room."

Records available on this side of the Atlantic are not clear as to when Moose Factory was relocated on its present site on Factory Island. It is likely, however, that the new site was chosen for the post at the time construction was commenced in 1736 to replace the burned one. That it was in its present location by 1774 is positive from Samuel Hearne's chart of the mouth of the Moose River.

With a reorganization of the Hudson's Bay Company in 1810, the post at the Moose became the headquarters of all the factories at the southerly end of James Bay. After the union of the Hudson's Bay and North West Companies in 1721, Moose factory became the residence of the governor-in-chief of the southern department of Rupert's Land. This department was discontinued about the turn of the century, but Moose became the headquarters of the district. So it continued until 1934, when district headquarters were moved to Winnipeg and Moose Factory reverted to the status of a trading post.

With such an impressive historical background, Mr. Speaker, Moose Factory is an ideal site for the establishment of a historic museum. As we prepare for the celebration of Confederation, the founding of this nation, no centennial project could be more fitting than the restoration of Moose Fort and the establishment of a modern museum.

The Ontario northland transportation commission has enthusiastically supported this proposal and has agreed to sponsor it as a centennial project. On behalf of the commission, may I express our thanks and appreciation to the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld) for having wholeheartedly supported this proposal, the project, and for having made available the services of his department for research and restoration of historic buildings.

Moose Factory, along with the neighbouring community of Moosonee, will be focal points and a mecca for tourists visiting northeastern Ontario. Towns along the way, such as Cochrane, will benefit considerably and our own railway, the ONR, will experience a favourable increase in passenger traffic. Five thousand to 10,000 additional visitors a year may not mean much to Niagara Falls or Kingston, but to the James Bay area it will have a tremendous impact on the local economy.

While on the subject of northern development, I believe some comments on Moosonee and Moose Factory would be apropos. They are the two largest communities on the shores of James Bay and adjoin one another, with Moosonee lying at the extreme northern terminal of the Ontario Northland Railway.

Mr. Speaker, this is a frontier region. The population is predominately Indian and is increasing at a rapid rate. Trapping is the main industry, which makes the economy of the area basically rooted in the 19th century. I believe that this northern region, with the assistance and co-operation of federal and provincial governments working together, along with religious leaders and the inhabitants themselves, could become a viable, self-supporting development area.

I will not attempt to deal with the social, educational and physical problems of Moosonee and its environs, because these important matters are presently being actively studied and considered by various departments of this government in co-operation with federal officials. My remarks will be confined to a few recommendations to help bolster the local economy and also provide employment to the growing Indian population.

The two industries which could provide a sound economic base for Moosonee and area are tourism and transportation of merchandise further north. Transportation is the key to opening up a frontier region. At the present time Moosonee is serviced mostly by rail and, to a small extent, by air. The Ontario Northland Railway has, since 1932, operated a passenger and merchandise service from Cochrane and Moosonee. Austin Airways Limited provides an air service between Moosonee and outposts on James and Hudson bays from Fort Severn on the south-west coast of Hudson Bay to Povungnutuk on the east coast of Hudson Bay. This plane service is limited in its operation, as planes must use floats during the summer months and skis during winter. There is no communication or transportation for approximately two periods of the year—during freeze-up and break-up.

There is a definite economic need for a permanent airstrip at Moosonee. Austin Airways estimates over 90 per cent of its goods moves from the railhead at Moosonee to points further north by air. As the north continues to develop, the importance of Moosonee as a distribution point will increase. However, Mr. Speaker, I realize that the location and construction of permanent airstrips come under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Recently, the federal government announced a new programme of capital assistance for local airports. A maximum of $1 million a year in grants will be provided to municipalities and public bodies. The citizens of Kapuskasing were pleased to learn a few weeks ago that $325,000 would be spent on the improvement of the Kapuskasing airport. However, I was disappointed to learn that the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill had made no reference to the construction of a much-needed airstrip at Moosonee.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Write a letter right away.

Mr. Brunelle: In fact, for the benefit of the hon. member for Downsview, I even told our federal member that we, the Ontario northland transportation commission, would provide the services of business cars so that he and the federal Minister of Transport could come to Moosonee and assess for themselves the need for an airstrip. That invitation is still open.

I would respectfully ask the committee of the economic council studying airport facilities in northeastern Ontario to make a survey of the volume of air traffic in and out of Moosonee. Armed with these impressive figures, it should be, we hope, easier to convince the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill of the necessity of this desirable and warranted airstrip.

To really open up the James Bay area—to make accessible the rich resources of this region—I would strongly advocate the construction of a road to Moosonee.

This project has been mentioned before, but the need for this road today is feasible and necessary. First, I should mention that by the end of this year it will be possible to drive within 100 miles of Moosonee. If hon. members will refer to their northern Ontario maps on their desks and if they will open them up on the section which shows northern Ontario, starting at Smooth Rock Falls, secondary Highway 807 is presently under construction to Fraserdale. From Fraserdale there is a Hydro service road to Little Long Rapids. From here to Kipling, the most northern Hydro project site on the Mattagami river, there is a good, hard surfaced road. There is approximately a 100-mile road gap from Kipling to Moosonee, and road construction on the first 50 miles, up to the junction of the Missinaibi and Mattagami rivers is quite practicable according to studies made from aerial photographs.

This information was given to me by the Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper Company in Kapuskasing, and there is the availability of gravel deposits; the terrain is quite good, and it is quite practical for the first 50 miles. The last 50 miles would present more construction problems due to the swampy nature of the terrain. However, the most knowledgeable experts on muskeg—and I am happy to say that yesterday I spent all day in Sudbury, having been invited to attend the eleventh conference on muskeg, under the sponsorship of the national research council of Canada—tell me that it is quite possible to build a road in this type of peat land area.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize and point out that a road to Moosonee will complement the railway—I repeat, will complement the railway—and will not detract from it. The road should be built under the roads-to-resources programme, whereby the federal government and the provincial government each pay half of the cost of such development roads. Should this joint sharing programme be discontinued, the Ontario government should undertake this access road alone. I would strongly recommend to the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) and to the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), that they conduct at once studies of the economic and engineering feasibility of the extension of the highway from Kipling to Moosonee.

I am convinced that an economic study would justify the expenditures for this highway. A road would provide access to the extensive forest resources, would facilitate mining exploration and expedite the development of the known rich mineral ore bodies. Think of the impact such a road would have on the tourist industry of Moosonee and area—on northeastern Ontario—on all of the province. Thousands of visitors would drive to see the most northern settlements on the Arctic tidewater. Picture the hundreds of people who would like to boast that they were at the tip of James Bay and dipped their big toe in salt water for the first time. The economy of the entire northeastern Ontario region would be greatly strengthened.

Another important consideration for a road to James Bay—and this, I feel, is a most important one—is that the present population of Moosonee and Moose Factory is in excess of 3,000 persons. By 1975, ten years hence, at the present rate of growth, and the rate of growth in Moosonee and Moose Factory is the highest birth rate on the North American continent, it will have increased to more than 5,000. A community of this size must have a road outlet.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that this government carry out at once engineering and economic studies on the extension of the road from Kipling to Moosonee.

If we fail to do this, I feel our northern development programme will fall far short of those being conducted by several of our sister provinces.

Cochrane North, Mr. Speaker, is experiencing significant growth developments in its main industry—the forest industry. The wealth generated by the forest resources in the Cochrane district is realized in the woods operations, the sawmills, the poplar plywood plants and the pulp and paper mills.

At Smooth Rock Falls, the Abitibi Power and Paper Company Limited commenced construction last summer of a bleached kraft pulp mill at a cost of more than $13 million and with an annual capacity of approximately 100,000 tons. It is expected that the new plant will come into production in the fall of this year with a high-quality bleached kraft pulp, produced from the black spruce pulpwood trees. This new addition will increase employment opportunities in the woodlands and in the mill itself, and will bolster the economy of the entire region.

In the town of Cochrane, on October 4 last, at 6 p.m. on a Sunday evening, tragedy struck suddenly. Within a few hours, the new firm, Cochrane Enterprises Limited—many of the hon. members here remember that these well-known people appeared before the committee last winter with a private bill—had their recently built poplar plywood plant completely destroyed by fire. The industry, which had only been in operation for a year and four months, had created 325 new jobs in the district and had a payroll of more than $10,000 a week. It had contributed valuable business to both the Ontario Northland Railway and to Star Transfer.

The million-dollar blaze was an unmitigated disaster to the community. Canada's largest manufacturer of poplar plywood was out of business; if the plant was not rebuilt, the future of Cochrane looked bleak indeed. The owners, the Perron Brothers, of La Sarre, Quebec, and Albert Boisvert of Cochrane, undaunted by their loss, made known at once their courageous decision to rebuild immediately.

I am happy to announce that this new industry, with 20 per cent increased production, commenced operation on Monday of this past week. This will be the most modern poplar plywood plant, as well as the largest, in eastern Canada.

The decision to rebuild and the promptness with which the project was carried out, dramatically illustrates the enterprising spirit of our northern people.

In Kapuskasing, the Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company produces over 900 tons of newsprint a day, with its four modern newsprint machines. I am happy to announce that the company has plans to add a fifth machine. This will increase production by about 110,000 tons of newsprint a year and will require an additional 50,000 cords of pulpwood annually. The expansion will create more jobs in the mill and in the woods.

The town of Hearst is also blessed with expansion in its plywood industry. The Levesque Plywood Company there recently announced the construction of a $600,000 addition to its present plywood plant.

Economic expansion is evident in many parts of my constituency; however, this rich region is not forging ahead at the rate that it should. Cochrane North's economy depends mainly on primary industries, of which the forest-based industry is the main one. If this rich and huge area is to develop to its full potential, it should be done through economic regional planning with the assistance and co-operation of federal and provincial governments. This applies to the entire northeastern region. The district of Cochrane is unique in that it combines the features of immense geographic terrain, sparse population, and is located hundreds of miles away from the large southern markets. According to the report Economic survey of the district of Cochrane published in 1963 by the north-eastern Ontario development association, I quote from page 147: "It is a recommendation of this report that this district be classified as a 'special development area' whereby the Ontario government should provide special incentives for industrial and resource development." A welcome step was announced a few weeks ago by the hon. Provincial Treasurer in his Budget statement. A three-year tax-free period would be given to new processing and manufacturing industries locating in any of the six designated areas in the province. Timmins is one of these areas and it extends to include the southeastern part of Cochrane North. But, good as this may be, it does not go far enough.

Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer to enlarge and revise the designated areas in co-operation with the federal authorities. I also submit for his consideration that the present plan for designating areas should be reviewed and take much more into account than simply the present yardstick of the unemployment totals of regional UIC offices. In selecting the areas for federal and provincial inducements to secondary industry, the potentialities of these places and the development of their rich natural resources should be a prime consideration. Assistance should be provided throughout areas sufficiently large to contain within them at least one town that could be regarded as a plausible centre of growth.

To illustrate my point, I will refer to the town of Hearst, located at the western end of my riding. This community, located in the midst of rich and extensive forest resources, experienced a booming economy until the year 1947. The provincial government then adopted a policy curtailing the export of pulpwood to the United States in order to maintain requirements for Ontario pulp mills, and to encourage the expansion of pulp production in Ontario.

There are adequate forest limits to supply a 300-ton pulp mill in the Hearst area, according to a study made by The Department of Lands and Forests. Much of this pulpwood is neither being sold in its raw state, nor processed for pulp.

In addition to the raw material being in abundance, there is the availability of natural gas, unlimited hydro power, and a direct rail service from Hearst to Sault Ste. Marie. From here, transshipment can be made by water to the southern states. The demand for pulp and paper is increasing rapidly. It is predicted that the present consumption will double in the next 20 years. What, then, is holding up the construction of this 300-ton pulp mill, which would do so much to not only fortify the economy of Hearst but of the entire surrounding region? It is some encouragement, Mr. Speaker, some financial inducement which will attract industry to locate in this rich forest region. If we fail to attract them, they will go to other regions and we will be the losers.

I now wish to speak about an industry which, until recently, has been relatively foreign to Cochrane North but will become, within the next few years, a dynamic force in our economy—the mining industry. This sleeping giant is just awakening in Cochrane North. The James Bay basin, which lies in the precambrian shield, has had scant exploration due to its inaccessibility and the swampy nature of a large part of the terrain.

Mr. Speaker, what really sparked a sudden interest in this James Bay area was the combination of two factors. The first was the discovery made last year, by Texas Gulf Sulphur in the Timmins area. This billion-dollar find generated mining activity throughout the entire Timmins-Cochrane-Moosonee region. More than 100 mining and exploration companies have been, and are presently, actively exploring and drilling in this interesting mineral region.

The second factor, which triggered a new wave of exploration interest in this vast muskeg-covered area was the release last fall of a series of aeromagnetic maps by the federal and provincial governments. Of tremendous interest to geologists, prospectors and developers alike, is a 160-mile long magnetic belt—if hon. members will look at their maps, I have coloured it green—stretching south from James Bay, paralleling the Moose and Abitibi rivers and extending to Island Falls, immediately north of the town of Cochrane. A similar major magnetic anomaly stretches from the north end of Fauquier township, a few miles east of Kapuskasing, and extends south to the Chapleau region. It is not known what kind of minerals are causing these magnetic features, since a large part of the areas are covered by swamps underlain by overburden and a veneer of late sedimentary rocks. These features are most interesting geologically and could hold, and I am sure do hold, a rich supply of minerals.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): What about diamonds?

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, MAY 10, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the west gallery students from St. Francis Assisi separate school, Toronto.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I am sure you will be equally as pleased as I and all other hon. members of this House to know that a very pleasant surprise has come to The Department of Health through a bequest specifically left to the Ontario hospital school at Smiths Falls. The superintendent of that school, Dr. Harold F. Frank, has just been advised that a sum of approximately $30,000 has been bequeathed to the school by the late Mrs. Viola Elizabeth Beath, formerly of Ottawa.

The bequest was given to the school with no qualifications as to its use. The late Mrs. Beath had been a nurse in World War I, and for the past several years had been particularly interested in mentally retarded children, and worked long and assiduously in their interests. She had been very impressed with the work done by Dr. Frank and his staff at our hospital school at Smiths Falls and in her will had made evident in tangible fashion the great admiration she held for them.

Knowing Mrs. Beath's intent, it is proposed to place the money in the hospital school's sundry fund when it is received. Through this fund it will provide a great many extra comforts, special events and other such things for the patients at the hospital school.

We are all deeply appreciative of the thoughtfulness of the late Mrs. Beath and I would point this up as further evidence of the active participation and involvement of society in the work we are trying to do.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett).

In view of the staff report to the Metro Toronto and region conservation authority that all outstanding expropriations will require an amount equal to what the authority expects to raise from its member municipalities and the two senior levels of government during the next four years, does this mean that some of those whose land is under expropriation will have to wait this long for settlement of their claims?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member for York South concerning the acquisition of flood plain lands by the Metropolitan Toronto and region conservation authority is essentially the same question that was asked by the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) during the discussion of my department's estimates, on April 8, which appears in the Legislature of Ontario Debates, number 71, on page 2117.

At that time I pointed out that this question had caused a great deal of concern to both the authority and my department. I have already discussed the problem with members of the authority, and up to the present we have not been able to arrive at a solution. However, the committee which will be established to examine the provisions of The Conservation Authorities Act and land acquisition problems, particularly in urban areas, will undoubtedly put forward recommendations and I expect a solution will be found long before the termination of the four-year period.

Mr. MacDonald: It has taken a long time already.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) the following question:

Why is the salary scale for attendants at Oakridge hospital at Penetanguishene lower than that for custodial officers at Guelph, and are there any plans for increasing it?

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, in reply to this question, I may say that the matters are determined by the civil service commission and the classification is a plan of the commission.

The commission has given me the following report: The duties and responsibilities of the attendants at the Oakridge hospital are regarded as being primarily those of attendants and not custodial. The working level of attendants at the Oakridge hospital is paid on a salary range of $3,480 to $4,200. The special nature of the work at Oakridge is recognized by a differential of $300. An attendant 2 in all other Ontario hospitals is paid $3,240 to $3,900. Other levels of attendant at Oakridge benefit by similar differential.

The working level for a custodial officer at Guelph has the salary range of $4,050 to $4,400. In determining this rate, due regard has been paid to the rates of pay obtaining in other jurisdictions where employees are occupied mainly in the detention and custody of inmates. A committee from the group that visited this area last week came to see me and I promised them at that time that we would review the classification schedule.

With respect to the second part of the question, "Are there any plans to increase the rate?" the answer is that all occupational groups of hospital attendants, nurses, custodial officers, and so on, employed in Ontario government institutional settings are at present under review and negotiation in accordance with the agreed cyclical salary review policy. These rates will be established based upon such negotiation and will be effective April 1, 1965.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) which only the two of us may understand.

Does the Ontario housing corporation intend to take over and continue the work now being done by Mrs. Lena Cook when she leaves in August of this year?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the hon. member's question. I believe it does require a little explaining.

By arrangement with the housing authority of Toronto, the Metropolitan Toronto social planning council is carrying out a study of the relocation problems inherent in a major redevelopment scheme such as St. James Town. Under this arrangement, Mrs. Lena Cook, who is an employee of the social planning council, spends two days of each week in the St. James Town area counselling families who are being relocated by the housing authority of Toronto. I am advised that August was agreed upon as a time when Mrs. Cook's services would no longer be necessary and by which time it was expected that the necessary material for the study report would have been collected.

When Ontario housing corporation was requested by the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto to undertake the rehousing of certain families in the St. James Town area on an emergency basis, the corporation used its own tenant relations' officers and home visitors to work with the families affected. There was constant liaison between the staff of the Ontario housing corporation, the housing authority of Toronto and Mrs. Cook.

In effect, therefore, Mrs. Cook was involved in the St. James Town area to assist the housing authority of Toronto in its relocation activities and to carry out a study on behalf of the social planning council. While staff of the Ontario housing corporation will continue to work in the St. James Town area for the purpose of relocating families, their objective will not be precisely the same as that of Mrs. Cook, who is largely concerned with research.

In a report to the metropolitan welfare and housing committee dated May 5, 1965, concerning its activities in St. James Town, Ontario housing corporation strongly advocated the need for a more sophisticated approach to relocation, if major urban renewal developments, both private and public, are to take place with a minimum of hardship.

Relocation requirements extend beyond the provision of physical accommodation, as important social and psychological factors are involved and must be considered. For this reason it was suggested that discussions take place with the metropolitan welfare and housing committee, with a view to determining the most effective technique which will ensure proper responsibility for emergency housing and adequate services.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) begs leave to present to the House the first annual report of the pension commission of Ontario for the period to December 31, 1964.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the orders of the day, I would draw the attention of the hon. members of the House to the draped chair of the late Joseph M. Gould, the member for Bracondale, who died last Saturday in Toronto general hospital. I would like to extend to his widow and his family our deepest sympathy, the sympathy of all of us in this House.

Mr. Gould was, of course, a barrister by profession. He practised here in Toronto. He had been a member of the city council for some five years and that training was evidenced in his treatment of certain matters in this House. He was well regarded by all his fellow members in this House.

Over these past few months, I and my colleagues have kept in touch with him, both in person and by mail. I would like to say that he had a long and very uncomfortable illness which he bore stoically and with good heart. His death will be a great loss to this House.

I would like also to mention the name of Arthur G. P. Frost, who also died over the weekend and who also was a member of this Legislature for Bracondale. Mr. Frost did not run in 1959, but having been in the House since 1951, he was well known to a good many of us. He, too, had been an alderman for ward 5. I would like to extend our sincere sympathy to his family.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, with the hon. Prime Minister, my colleagues and I join in extending our sympathy to Joe Gould's widow and his family. We will miss very seriously our colleague who spent the years with us since 1959, not only as a member of this House but as a friend—a friend whose loyalty and integrity we valued very highly.

It is always a real blow to politicians to see one of their friends pass on, because we have some idea among ourselves of the trials and tribulations this profession brings to us. Mr. Gould, as we know, not only sat in this House and made a substantial contribution, but as a citizen of the community his concern with his constituents, with his neighbours, with the newsboys for whom he acted for so many years, all marked him as a man of outstanding devotion and care for the community which he served so ably and so well. We in this party shall indeed feel the loss very greatly, as we know our hon. colleagues in the House do as well.

Mr. Speaker, I did not have the personal privilege of knowing Mr. Frost, but I am aware of the record of service he rendered and we extend to Mr. Frost's family our deepest sympathy.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, it is a very sobering thing to realize that a man relatively young in years can be cut down in the full flower of life in the fashion that Mr. Gould was, particularly when one realizes that within the past year he was so active as to be seeking the leadership of the party of which he was a member.

I would like to join with the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. member for Downsview in expressing the sorrow of the House at the loss of a colleague and expressing our sense of bereavement with his friends and family; and also to do the same to the friends and family of Art Frost.

I sat in this House for some four years or so with Art Frost. We were members of clubs in the central part of the city and saw each other quite frequently. He was a very kind and gentle man, in the real sense of the the word a gentleman.

It is a rather remarkable coincidence, indeed, that two men who stood and represented the riding of Bracondale in this House over a period of 10 to 15 years should both have died on the same weekend.

Again I would like to join with the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. member for Downsview in expressing our sense of bereavement to the family and friends.

Mr. Speaker: In respect to these two former members of the House, I would ask the members to rise and observe one minute's silence.

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The twenty-ninth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 202:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose the last day these estimates were before the House, I was in the midst of discussing that portion of this estimate, vote 202, dealing with the powers and authorities both for investigation and for recommendation of the proof of improvement of local police forces. As I recall it, I had begun to outline to you, sir, some of the problems that had been faced in the town of Brampton in connection with policing there. At one stage, I think, the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) interrupted to say that since January 1—and I am not sure whether my dates are right or whether he in fact mentioned a date—but since a new council had taken over in Brampton things had much improved.

I am very pleased to hear the hon. Attorney General say this, but I think in view of what transpired in November of 1964 there should be a full and frank discussion of the investigation that went on, the recommendations that were made and the immediate reactions of the local council.

Mr. Chairman, as you may know, in Brampton there was some substantial concern with policing. At the suggestion of the mayor—I think of the day, I do not know whether he is still the mayor or not—a police commission was appointed, and I named the members of the police commission. One of the first things the police commission did—and the police commission consisted of Mayor Russell Prouse and Magistrate H. T. G. Andrews and Judge E. W. Grant—one of the things that the police commission did was to decide to invite the Ontario police commission in to do an evaluation of the policing situation in the town.

The police commission sent in Robert Kerr. Robert Kerr was a former deputy chief of police of the metropolitan police, a gentleman who was certainly well versed in police work, very highly regarded by his colleagues on the police force here in Metropolitan Toronto; and obviously very highly regarded by the police commission, otherwise they would not have taken him on.

Mr. Kerr came in and did a very substantial survey of the police force in the town of Brampton and he gave a report wherein he listed some 21 criticisms that he made of that police. These are some of the things that he said.

He said that the chief constable's office was in a state of confusion, that the top of his desk was covered with files and letters and reports. There were files on the floor and on the chairs and on the top of the filing cabinet.

When I read that, it sounds somewhat like my own office downtown; but in any event, I am not trying to run a police force.

He said that the filing cabinet in the chief constable's office was full of files which were filed in complete disorder with no thought of alphabetical or other arrangement; even the chief could not find what he was looking for. He said that the chief constable has a very poor knowledge of vital statistics in his department and town—such as the area of the town, the miles of streets in the town, the crime, the accident picture—and had no knowledge whatsoever as to what the 1964 budget amounted to. He said that money paid re parking tags was left lying loose on the desk in the outer office; his suggestion was it should be kept in a locked drawer.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): It sounds like Eastview.

Mr. Singer: I was going to say that complaint sounds somewhat familiar. In another municipality, I think the hon. member for York South mentioned Eastview, there was quite a concern about money lying loose and not being kept locked up and no proper records being kept up.

He said that the property and liquor storage room, I guess for seized property, was in a disgraceful condition, dusty and dirty. It was not a secure room. Being partitioned off the general office, even if the door is locked anybody could climb over the partition. There was found property which obviously had been held for ten to 20 years, very little of it was properly tagged as to the date found and where and by whom.

He points out that The Police Act, section 17, subsection 2 gives authority to dispose of all property other than motor vehicles or bicycles at the expiration of three months and there is no need to retain found property beyond that period. He states that there was a large quantity of seized liquor and beer in the room not properly sealed or tagged, that the department had run out of gummed tags and seals which are supplied free by the liquor control board and that nobody had bothered to obtain any. He points out that there is no need to retain liquor if the person charged is found not guilty—you return the liquor to that person. If the person is found guilty, you retain the liquor for one month and then dispose of it through the proper channels, the liquor control board.

He remarks that the chief does not check applications of persons desiring employment as police officers. This one I find particularly strange. The chief only does so after they are hired and sworn in and could give no valid reasons why he does not check them, other than that the board is hiring them. Mr. Kerr goes on to say that conceivably someone with a criminal record could be hired but not discovered until after he had been sworn in as a police officer.

He points out that there is no departmental duty book to show day by day who is on duty, off duty, sick or on vacation. At the present time a small journal is maintained which each individual member of the department signs and where he enters time-on and time-off. He says this is not satisfactory and that the sergeant on duty should record all this. The duty book can be used to record overtime, record attendance, property found and disposition of the same, automobiles held by the department and disposition of the same, and other necessary things of which it is essential that a record be kept. He states that there is no record of overtime worked by personnel. In July, to obtain the amount of overtime work, the list of personnel was placed on the notice board and each member filled in the amount of time. He goes on to add that this is far from satisfactory and I can understand that this would be far from satisfactory.

He states that there is no supervision of constables when they are outside the police station on a beat or patrolling in a cruiser.

There is a complete lack of supervision that makes me wonder what the constables do when on patrol or on a beat. Are they carrying out their duties, as they should, or are they not?

Apparently Mr. Kerr could not obtain an answer to that from anyone.

He states that the memorandum books—commonly referred to as memo books—maintained by the constables are far from satisfactory. They show only time on duty, any calls they receive, in and out from lunch, and going off duty. What does he do if he receives no calls? Where does he patrol? What location does he give traffic enforcement to? What premises does he check? A memo book, in Mr. Kerr's opinion, should be a chronological record of everything he does, where he goes and everything he takes action on. No one checks the memo book to see that he is keeping a correct record. The sergeant should have been directed by the chief constable to do so.

He points out that there are no standing written orders or directives given to the personnel. He states that a police force is a semi-military body and as such it must be disciplined. A force that is disciplined with justice and fairness is a good force. A force which receives no discipline is not a good one. There is no official record of any member of the Brampton force being disciplined in 12 years. He points out that there is a complete lack of training, that no member of the Brampton police force has received recruitment or basic training. The department carries out no in-service training. The four sergeants have attended short one-week seminars on specialized subjects. He says:

I can find no reasonable excuse to explain this lack of training. No department has an overabundance of personnel but you will find that all well-directed and efficient forces are well trained. Chief Constable Keats claims that lack of sufficient personnel has prevented him from sending men to the police college at Aylmer.

Says Mr. Kerr:

I find this hard to believe when the force is able to carry on during the vacation period when two or more personnel are on leave of absence.

He states as his opinion that this is a serious deficiency.

He points out that the record system is about 25 per cent efficient. Some effort has been made to improve it during the past year. Some responsibility has been given to the sergeant and three patrol sergeants in this regard, but the lack of direction from the chief constable and a lack of knowledge by the four sergeants in what is required in a record system has resulted in no great improvement in the system. He says:

I could list all of the items I found in the files but I can see no great benefit in doing so and occupying the pages of this report in pointing out the inefficiency of the record system. It will be sufficient for me to say that the Brampton police record system is a hit-and-miss system and must be immediately rectified.

He points out that the department has no secretarial help. He says:

It is beyond my comprehension how a police department of 23 men can carry on without a secretary. The amount of correspondence in a department of this size, together with the number of files that have to be maintained, justifies the immediate hiring of a secretary, something that should have been done years before this. . . .

Throughout the survey it was quite evident there was a complete lack of proper written reports from constables to the sergeants, the sergeants to the chief and the chief to the board of commissioners of police. When the chief submits reports to the board which are not properly addressed, and in one instance not even signed, it is not entirely unexpected that he accepts reports written on pieces of paper and on the back of letterhead stationery, and addressed to "Chief," and signed with initials of the person writing the same. Proper procedures are a necessity in a good department and proper reports are one of those procedures.

He states that there are no rules and regulations laid down for the guidance of the force and says:

While I realize that it is the board's prerogative to study and approve the rules and regulations, the chief should have been presenting his ideas and suggestions on the matter to the board.

He sets out that the operation of an ambulance service is not a police function. During 1963 the department answered 417 calls, which consumed 405 manhours. Considering two constables went on the vast majority of the calls, the manhours consumed are closer to 800, or the full time of a constable for 100 days or 20 work weeks. In his opinion, he says this is a serious matter. On many occasions there have been only two constables on duty, and to answer an ambulance call, which on occasion has resulted in the ambulance having to go to Toronto, the town of Brampton was left with no police protection whatsoever. Even though it is not a police function, Chief Keats argues in favour of it. What does the town of Brampton want—and I think this is a very important question. Does it want an ambulance service or does it want a police service?

He points out that the distribution of personnel to various reliefs leaves much to be desired. The Brampton police force uses a four-platoon system insofar as senior constables are concerned. There are 13 senior constables who are distributed as follows—and he sets out the hours and goes on to say:

With the exception of the constable who was detailed to safety work, the constables rotate around those four reliefs, every four weeks.

The five probationary constables have been assigned to three reliefs.

All those duties are posted on a yearly basis. This results in a constable being able to tell in January what days he will be off in December.

I do not take exception to this system on that account, but I do on two other counts. First of all, this system does not take into consideration the day-to-day exigencies of the department; for instance, unexpected traffic situations or crime problems or lengthy illnesses of personnel, and many other occasions when personnel must be reassigned and utilized. Second, it does not permit the proper distribution of personnel.

In police circles it is known that the 4 p.m. to 12 midnight shift is the relief that carries the heaviest work load, and therefore the largest proportion of the personnel should be assigned to it. The 12.01 to 8 a.m. relief, owing to the amount of crime that takes place during these hours, must have almost the same number of personnel assigned to it as there is on from 4 p.m. to 12 midnight. The 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. relief has the least workload of the three reliefs and therefore it should have the least number of personnel.

The platoon system does not do this, and on the Brampton force there are many days when there are far too many personnel on duty on the day shift.

He goes on to say that the motor vehicle equipment is not used to its fullest extent. He says:

I spoke to the chief in this regard and he stated that he left the assignment of the cars to the sergeants. The sergeants say that the chief does not allow them to utilize all three cars.

From observations and questioning the chief and the four sergeants, the following is the general rule followed in assigning cruisers:

From 12.01 a.m. to 8 a.m., one cruiser; from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m., none; a cruiser is used on relief only when a call comes in. If no constable is in the station, a light is flashed at the main intersection of Queen and Main to attract the attention of the foot patrol.

I hope that the hon. Attorney General is paying attention to this modern system of policing.

After the light is flashed to attract the attention of the foot patrol, the policeman on patrol walks to the station and takes out the cruiser to go on the call. The cruiser sometimes is used on this relief to serve summonses. From 4 p.m. to 12 p.m. there is one cruiser; and from 7 p.m. to 3 a.m. there is one cruiser.

As can be seen, at no time are there more than two cruisers on patrol; and from 3 a.m. to 7 p.m., never more than one.

The centre business area consisting of two blocks on Main Street and two blocks on Queen Street receives at least 60 per cent of the effort and attention of this force under the present beat and cruiser patrol system.

Then he goes on to suggest the redistribution of personnel should be considered, putting six constables on the 12.01 a.m. to the 8 a.m. shift.

This would ensure that three one-man cruisers and one foot patrol were available for duty seven days a week, with two constables relieving.

He suggests that on the 4 p.m. to 12 midnight shift seven constables should be on duty. This would ensure that three one-man cruisers and one foot patrol were available. A second foot patrol would be available five evenings a week and could be used for those nights that are busy, for example, Friday and Saturday. In a municipality like Brampton, Friday and Saturday are pretty busy nights, and one would think that the schedule would be adaptable enough to take care of the economic habits in the town.

He points out that all occurrences are entered in an occurrence book chronologically without any thought of breaking them down into the various types of offences, and so on. This is an antiquated system which possibly would be adequate for a one-man force, and here we have 23.

This system provides no means whereby a record is kept of each individual occurrence or complaint. A 23-man force must have the crime picture, the work load and the activity of the force instantly under evaluation, seeking ways and means to combat crime and to provide a better police service. An occurrence book does not provide these facts and this system, as used by the Brampton police department, must be changed to a system of occurrence forms properly filed, as used by all up-to-date and efficient forces.

He states, regarding the lack of delegation of authority and responsibility:

Chief Constable Keats, whatever his reasons are, has endeavoured to direct the department by himself. Previous to 1964, he delegated no authority or responsibility to his senior officers—an inspector, a sergeant and a corporal.

This lack of delegation even applied to correspondence received while the chief was absent on vacations and conferences. No one opened the mail and it remained that way until he returned. I can find no instance—

says Mr. Kerr:

—where any responsibility was given to a senior officer prior to 1964. Several promotions were made effective on the first of January 1964, and the sergeant and three patrol sergeants were given certain responsibilities. This was a step in the right direction, but they received no instructions from Chief Keats as to how they were to carry out those responsibilities, with the result that the records of the department and the overall supervision has shown little or no improvement.

He concludes by saying:

There are other small areas of deficiencies which I could list, but I believe that for the purposes of this report, sufficient have been listed.

And to that I would say, amen. Surely there could not be a more damning indictment of the operations of a police force than that.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Would the hon. member explain to the House, and for my benefit; is he being critical of the town of Brampton and its police force, of the legislation, of the police commission, of the report that was made, or of the Attorney General?

Mr. Singer: Perhaps a little bit of each, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps the hon. Attorney General will permit me to summarize my criticisms when I come to the end of this story. I do not think I am being critical at all.

Let me go this far at this point: I am not being critical at all of the police commission because they were acting, in so far as they were allowed to do so. I am certainly not being critical of Mr. Kerr, because I think that he came in, and as a trained police officer he made his report, wrote down what he said and there it is.

But I am being critical of the state of the legislation; I am being critical of the way the force is run; and I am going to be critical of the council of the town of Brampton, because the town, having received this report, decided that they were going to do away with the police commission because they did not like police commissions that asked for this kind of report and got the report. In a long front-page story in the Brampton Times and Conservator, dated November 4, the headline is: "Council Votes Death to Police Commission." So out goes the police commission because they did not like the kind of report that was made. The report reads:

They instructed their town solicitor to prepare a bylaw repealing the bylaw that created the commission consisting of the three gentlemen who are on it. The majority of councillors contended that Mr. Kerr's report was unfair, and the breakdown in communication between the council and the commission was to be corrected by the commission's demise.

Mr. Chairman, if all of these sins of omission and commission have existed and they were only brought to light by reason of an investigation which had been asked for by the town police commission, the reasoning of the gentlemen on council who believed that these situations would only be corrected by the demise of their own police commission somewhat escapes me. In any event that is what they did, over the violent objections of the mayor.

Mayor Prouse told the council they would be jumping out of the frying pan into the fire if they were successful in dissolving the commission, and added that the separation of politics and police administration is necessary.

The mayor explained that The Police Act requires only the head of the municipality necessarily to be on the commission, not the judge and magistrate too, which was once the case. He placed the blame for insufficient co-operation between council and the commission on the shoulders of council.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether or not they were successful, even though they decided to instruct their solicitor to prepare a bylaw to get rid of the commission, whether they were successful in getting rid of it. Perhaps the hon. Attorney General can tell me.

This became quite an election issue and this became quite a local issue. One of the editorials here says: "What a council!" I think that is appropriately said.

Council's firing of the local police commission this week is one of the blackest chapters in the history of our local government. Only Mayor Prouse and councillor Bill Bryden opposed the ridiculous resolution, showing themselves worthy of representing the ratepayers.

The real point of this, Mr. Chairman, I think, should be obvious. If we are going to have investigatory powers such as are vested in the police commission, the Ontario police commission, then surely there should be some authority somewhere, whether with the Ontario police commission or with the hon. Attorney General himself, to examine the report such as Mr. Kerr prepared, and if necessary to take action in regard to that.

This happened in November, and I was very interested to hear the hon. Attorney General say that the situation had much improved. How many of the 21 complaints Mr. Kerr lists have been cleaned up I do not know; perhaps the hon. Attorney General can tell us. But the fact that the police commission, through their officials go in and investigate and this report is made and then it comes back to the local council who for reasons best known to themselves say: "It is a prejudiced report, you are only picking on us"; or, "You are only picking on some personnel we have had around for years"; and "The only answer is to fire the local police commission," certainly is a bunch of nonsense.

If these errors, if these sloppy practices, if these examples of bad policing do in fact exist, and if they are pointed out as they were by the Ontario police commission, surely, Mr. Chairman, the responsibility lies on the shoulders of the hon. Attorney General to see that something is done about them, and something is done about them in a forceful way.

At the beginning of my remarks, I suggested that there were perhaps two alternatives. One was that the chief of the day could be handed the report and told, "You've got six months—or a reasonable time—to clear this up"; or if the decision was made that the chief of the day was unable to do this, then perhaps there should be another chief. But to allow this thing to come back into council and have these great discussions about whether the local police commission was good or bad, whether or not the commission was trying to pick on the chief and others, and whether or not Mr. Kerr's report and the actions of the Ontario police commission were an infringement on local autonomy, surely is an exercise in complete frustration and surely there could not be a better example of the inefficiencies that we have here in the province of Ontario in trying to control and set up proper police procedures.

There is no suggestion here, Mr. Chairman, that the policemen were dishonest, or that there was any corruption, but there is certainly the obvious suggestion that the force was sloppily organized, that there were no proper records, that there was no proper discipline, that there were no proper duty rosters, and that sort of thing. In modern policing and in a big municipality, close to the largest city in the province, surely something better than that is needed and should be available.

When this report was made available, what action did we get from the Attorney General? I have looked carefully and I have inquired carefully and I have been unable to find that the Attorney General did anything. I use "Attorney General" in a collective sense—his office did nothing. Surely somebody in the department must have and should have the authority. Whether he wants to put it in a statute and give it to the police commission or not I do not know—that is his decision—but if you do not want to do that, then you should keep it yourself. This report seems to be an authentic report, and I do not think anybody has challenged Mr. Kerr's ability to make this report—the police commission certainly accepted it. Knowing what I do of Mr. Kerr I would think it would be an honest and careful report. And what situation do we have? We have complete and utter confusion in the police force of a large municipality in the province of Ontario.

What else do we have in Peel county? Peel county is policed by the forces of Toronto township, Brampton, Chinguacousy township, Streetsville and Port Credit. The northern portion is policed by the OPP with the exception of two small forces in Bolton and Caledon East. Consequently a map of police jurisdictions in Peel county looks rather like a patchwork quilt. There is no uniformity, no cohesion, and as far as I have been able to ascertain, no co-operation whatsoever among all of these various forces. The Brampton force and the force in Chinguacousy township, I have been advised—and Chinguacousy township, as the hon. Attorney General well knows, surrounds Brampton—do not even operate on the same radio frequency. The Brampton force with its three cruisers, which it rarely uses, probably does not turn on the radio anyway. But surely it would make some sense in a definable geographic area such as Peel county, to have these forces operating with some sort of cohesion and co-operation. That apparently does not exist.

What is the solution? The solution was pointed, without specifically mentioning Peel county, in the Ontario police commission's annual report, and it is amalgamation. I suggest again, Mr. Chairman, the solution is not going to be arrived at by permissive amalgamation or by persuasive amalgamation. When a situation like this exists and has existed for a number of years and is aggravated by this sort of situation, the only solution is going to be by forced amalgamation.

Again, Mr. Chairman, as I indicated to the House when the debate took place on Friday in relationship to the report of the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts, I do not think that where the government comes to the conclusion it must act that it should act and completely ignore the local municipalities. I would think that where an emergent situation such as this appears, the hon. Attorney General would ask for the most up-to-date report on the policing of Peel county that his Ontario police commission can produce. Having received that, he should call in representatives of the various communities or municipalities that are concerned with it and show them the report and ask them for their suggestions. But having done all that and having listened carefully, then there is a responsibility on the hon. Attorney General or on whomever he chooses to put it, to act and to bring order out of this chaos.

I suggest to the hon. Attorney General that we are getting no such action at the present time and we are unlikely to get it for the foreseeable future because we have had no positive statement of policy at all in regard to this sort of problem.

Of interest, Mr. Chairman, along the same line, are the answers that were tabled—I suppose on behalf on the hon. Attorney General—on Friday last in respect to two of my questions, No. 56 and No. 57. In question 56 I was trying to find out how many new police officers had been hired in 1963 and 1964 and how many had received any training. As I read the answers that were produced, if I understand them properly and I think I do, something less than 50 per cent of the new officers who became officers in 1963 and 1964 in the province of Ontario received any recruit training at all. Something around one half of the policemen who were hired in those two years were sworn in and put on their uniforms—and there they were, they were policemen.

To revert to what Mr. Kerr said about Brampton: Apparently in Brampton, as new officers were hired, they were not even investigated by the chief before they were hired. What kind of policing do we have in this province if there is not a standardized system of training for new policemen?

In question 57 I was asking about promotions. Of those people who were promoted in 1963 and 1964 in about 577 Ontario police forces in municipalities having more than 10,000 in population, something more than 100 of the promotions took place without any qualifying examinations, and those are in the larger municipalities. In the smaller municipalities, having a population of less than 10,000, where there were some 81 promotions—substantially less than half—some 33 promotions took place after there had been courses and perhaps some qualifying sort of tests. Therefore more than half of the people promoted in the small forces apparently had, according to these answers, no training for their promotions, or no qualifications, and so had something less than 20 per cent in the large municipalities.

Mr. Chairman, our police arm is a most important arm in the enforcement of justice in the province of Ontario. These questions and these answers and this sort of criticism, are not just being made up and I am not just gathering newspaper reports out of the wild to dream up unfair criticism. These are reports made by substantial and responsible people and they are made under the supervision of the hon. Attorney General's own police commission. The answers that are given to me are obtained from departmental records, and indicate beyond any doubt that the efficiency of our policing in the province of Ontario falls far short of what the people of Ontario are entitled to expect. I think today, sir, that we should hear from the hon. Attorney General—but not that the government is thinking about building a new police college in a couple of years, not that it is thinking about persuading somebody to amalgamate, not that the police commission is going to go out and make more reports and table them for nobody to act on. I think we are entitled to hear a positive programme of reform for our police in the province of Ontario.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, on the question of the estimates of the police commission. I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General if, having read the first report of the police commission on organized crime, whether there is a second report in preparation and if so when is it likely to be tabled?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Does the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, mean another report from the Ontario police commission, in addition to the one that I tabled very recently?

Mr. Renwick: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think not. I am not expecting another immediately, not at this time.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on that same question, if I may return to it: The first report, as I understand it, was indicated in its context to be a preliminary report on organized crime by the police commission. The commission indicated—and I am speaking of the report of January 31, 1964—the commission, when it made that report, indicated its intention to proceed with a continuous and intensive study of the question of organized crime and indicated in the context of its report, not only that it was the first report, but that it was also simply a preliminary report.

I think the answer which the hon. Attorney General has given on this question indicates to me that the government is for some reason now preparing to withdraw entirely from participation in the control of organized crime in the province of Ontario, and to withdraw and abdicate its obligations entirely to the Ontario police commission. I was concerned, in reading the report of the police commission, which was tabled a few days ago, to note that the hon. Attorney General will now only become involved in questions relating to the Ontario provincial police if it is decided by the Ontario police commission that he should be asked about matters of particular concern. This question has been resolved, apparently, in the terms which are set forth on page 12 of the report which, after reciting the provisions of subsection 2 of section 40 of the Act, setting out the relationship between the Attorney General, the Ontario police commission and the Ontario provincial police, then goes on to say that the commission will only give directions to the force on matters of general and broad policy and not on the actual operation of the force, which is, I believe, understandable.

It then goes on to state that the Attorney General will grant general approval for such directions, subject to the responsibility of the commission to refer to the Attorney General for specific approval policy matters of particular significance.

I would like to anticipate that the hon. Attorney General will give us some explanation as to how in fact he considers that he, as the Attorney General, will have any relationship with the question of the control of organized crime and the intrusion of syndicated crime into the province of Ontario if that very remote connection only is maintained between himself and the commission.

Is it possible that the hon. Attorney General can give us some indication of the extent to which organized crime is in existence now in the province of Ontario; and in what areas it is in existence and whether from the time that the last report was published in January of 1964 there is any evidence of further intrusion of syndicated crime into the province of Ontario?

I noticed that the hon. Attorney General has referred on a number of occasions to the importance of the public awareness and public concern about organized crime, and yet we now appear to have a decision, made by the hon. Attorney General's department and by the police commission, to withdraw from public concern and public discussion this whole area of organized crime. Now it may be that the wise thing is not to publish a second report along the lines of the first report on organized crime, but we would certainly feel here, that it is most important that each year the Ontario police commission should devote a substantial part of its report, or indeed a second report, to an objective, consecutive, intelligent appraisal of the past year with relation to organized crime in the province of Ontario, so that the people of Ontario will have some basic information on which to judge whether or not this whole area is under proper surveillance; and where, in turn, the police commission and the Ontario provincial police and the other municipal police forces will have from the public the sense of awareness which will greatly assist the police forces in carrying out their policing obligations.

I do not think that anyone reading that first report, having read prior to that the report of the hon. Mr. Justice Roach when he conducted the public inquiry, can now be satisfied that a year later, or a year and a half later, we should simply get a very cursory statement in the police commission report about the investigation of crime on two pages, pages 29 and 30, where in fact the only thing that is stated is that there will now be two intelligence officers who will be non-operational but who will, I assume, provide a co-ordinating facility within the police commission for information about crime throughout the province of Ontario and will provide a co-ordinating facility with the other police authorities acting in the province of Ontario, such as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the municipal police forces; as well as with police forces operating in the adjacent boundaries in the United States of America, and with the federal bureau of investigation and the federal bureau of narcotics in the United States.

It does seem to me that without explanation it is difficult to sit here and understand how these two particular officers can in fact effectively deal with organized crime. I for one certainly cannot accept the statement that therefore, through our intelligence officers, the investigation into organized crime is continuing and will continue on a professional basis.

The whole substance and point of my remarks on this particular area of the estimates is that surely there must be a continuing desire on the part of the hon. Attorney General and on the part of the police commission to make certain that the people in this province are constantly and continuously aware of the extent to which organized crime is operating in Ontario, the examples of how organized crime does operate in Ontario and the degree to which syndicated crime is intruding into organized crime in the province of Ontario for the purpose of a monopoly control.

I read with interest about the extension of the police intercommunication system throughout the province. I think it is a very good step forward. I have read with interest the various indications of co-ordinating activity which are taking place among the various police forces. But I can simply say that to have what, to me, is a basic, an elementary report providing us, apparently for the first time, with the number of police jurisdictions operating in Ontario throughout the municipalities, which is, after all, strictly a counting proposition, and then to be faced with two short pages on the investigation of crime and a very brief statement as to the interrelation between The Department of the Attorney General and the police commission and the Ontario provincial police, would certainly indicate the essential need for continuing to have this whole area of police operation in Ontario under public scrutiny and public surveyance so that the department will get some sense of urgency in carrying out the obviously needed reforms that are necessary for the proper functioning of the police system in the province of Ontario.

I would hope that in the course of what remarks the hon. Attorney General may be making that he would let us have his views about whether the question of in camera inquiries is simply a matter which is now abandoned by the government, whether the government is studying the question of in camera inquiries, whether it has come to any conclusion about it. Whether it thinks it is possible to reconcile the rights of individual citizens with the necessary functioning of the police authority in the province.

I think it would be most helpful, if not in the course of these estimates certainly in other reports of the police commission, and I personally would think that they could be issued twice a year, that there should be a continuing series of brochures setting out the facts about organized crime, with examples of the types of frauds which are committed upon the public, and explaining to the public how crime operates. Many of the areas in which crime operates are matters which most of us are not particularly aware of, and I think that if the patterns and the ways in which crime is operated in the province of Ontario were specified, many more people would be aware and readily able to spot a developing pattern in any particular field.

I would also hope that in the course of his remarks the hon. Attorney General would indicate the number of instances in which there have been investigations by the commission of police brutality: the number of references that have been made about police brutality to individual municipal police forces, and the number of instances in which The Department of Reform Institutions has referred questions of police brutality to the Ontario police commission for its investigation.

I would simply conclude my comments on this particular vote by urgently asking the hon. Attorney General to adopt some of the suggestions which we make, so that public interest will continue to be focused on this question of organized crime, and so that it will not now be withdrawn from the limelight of public scrutiny and returned into the closed operations of the police commission with no adequate statement from time to time to the public of the extent and degree of penetration into our society of organized and syndicated crime.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a good deal of interest both to the remarks of the hon. member for Downsview and the hon. member for Riverdale with respect to the estimates under this vote.

I must say that, as I indicated in listening to the hon. member for Downsview, I failed to grasp in what direction his criticism was pointed because I really must say that I fail to see where criticism of a single police department in this province of Ontario impinges very heavily upon The Department of the Attorney General. I think the hon. member was fair enough to say that perhaps he was not really being too critical of this department; certainly he was not critical of the police commission or of the investigating body or the very capable persons who inquired into the situation in Brampton. He was critical, he said, of the police force there and of its management.

I can perhaps say this in response to his comments, that of the 21 recommendations made by the board which inquired at the direction of the police commission, more than half have been carried out. A change has been effected in the personnel of the police commission of that town. Actually, the commission is the same now for both Brampton and Chinguacousy; the heads of each municipality are different, of course, but the other two members are the same on both commissions.

I agree that it would be desirable—and I think the police commission report points out that it is desirable—that one of the directions in which we should and must move is to amalgamate, so as to dispose of small police forces with 10 men or less on the force. Here is a municipality with, I think the hon. member mentioned, some 23 men, which perhaps is not functioning as best it might. But, I think, in fairness to some other municipalities, that was rather a local situation and I think it is largely corrected. As I say, many of the recommendations have been carried out.

I may tell the House that within the last 10 days Chief Magistrate Arthur Klein and Senior Adviser Clark of the commission attended that community and again studied what had happened and, as I indicated to the House last week, we have good reports of what is transpiring there.

I think we must move in the direction of amalgamation, as the commission report says. We perhaps should try it first by permissive legislation, then by persuasion, and if both of these methods fail, then by mandatory legislation. I may tell my hon. friend that if he has to deal with municipalities in this province by telling them that they must do something that has been in their constitutional rights as governments created by this government—and those rights long enjoyed, and with a long custom and a long usage of carrying them out, and with a very capable and responsible manner of looking after their own local government—he will find, I think, that the municipalities are a very difficult group with which to deal.

True, our policy, I believe, has indicated that we should have at least some larger unit of government next below the province in a type of regional government, or a county type of government. This has been illustrated recently in our Department of Education and its legislation. But policing is a little different. There are a few different features here; municipalities are a bit more jealous of those rights. One municipality may claim to be a little better behaved, or a little better run, or have fewer problems and problems of a different nature than another within a county or within a region. It may contend that it conducts its affairs more economically, more efficiently. To say to five or six or eight or 10 municipalities in a region, "You must come together; you must have your policing done under one head," and to say this all of a sudden in legislation is a difficult thing to do.

I think that by passing permissive legislation, and to some extent persuasive, as we are doing, we will lead municipalities in this direction and I do not think I could be honest if I stood here and said, "Yes, we will accept the suggestion, we will force this situation on the municipalities in legislation at this time."

If I may use education again, I would illustrate this way: You can gather up all the children, all the students, from all the municipalities in the region, and you can apply to them and give to them the same standard of education, the same service, the same transportation, and the same across the board. But you have one municipality, say, of 3,000 people, one of 1,800 and one of 4,000, separated by some miles, with different conditions, one an industrial community, one something else again, and you can say, "We will combine you all together." This is what they fear. How do they know, that where there must be a deployed type of force moving about the area, they are going to get a standard form of police service when the situation calls for it? These are some of the problems that cause municipalities to hesitate.

I know the problem is there. It is one that should be solved, one that must be solved, but all I can say is that we move in that direction, and legislation which I have introduced is a step in that direction. The report of the police commission indicates its awareness and its recommendation to you; and I shall only say we shall move in that direction, following the recommendations of the report as quickly as possible.

On the remarks of the hon. member for Riverdale, I think I should first say this: He is concerned that the government has "withdrawn"—if I took his words down correctly—"from the control of organized crime." Now that is one way perhaps of expressing his view, but I do not understand it that way.

We have a police commission which is a continuing body. A commission which last year was comprised of some rather different personnel, to some extent, had brought in a report on organized crime. It sought certain powers, certain extended powers to continue its investigation. This Legislature refused to meet the recommendations of the commission with respect to the large and perhaps somewhat drastic powers that were asked. The Act which was passed in the last session of the Legislature provided—I read from section 17 of last year's Act:

The Lieutenant-Governor in Council may direct the commission to inquire into and report to him upon and matter relating to the extent of investigation or control of crime or the enforcement of law, and he shall define the scope of the inquiry in the directions.

Now the police commission reporting—and I believe it is at page 29—reporting on the investigation of crime, said:

Whereas your commission considers that the best way to combat crime, whether it be referred to as organized or syndicated crime, is by having well organized and equipped police forces staffed by trained personnel. Nevertheless, we deemed it advisable to create an intelligence section consisting of two intelligence officers to cover information pertaining to criminal activities in Ontario and to evaluate and correlate this information so that it would be constantly available to the Attorney General, this commission and the police forces throughout Canada and elsewhere on a "need to know" basis. This intelligence section pays particular attention to areas of crime which are passed under the control of an organization or syndicate. They, in the words of The Police Act, imposing this duty upon the police commission, are establishing and will maintain a system of statistical records and research studies of criminal occurrences and matters related thereto for the purpose of aiding the police forces in Ontario. These intelligence officers are non-operational. They do not—and then they go on to point out they will not investigate particular crimes nor will they investigate police forces.

So that our system now—and I think it is a good system—is that the police commission, having an intelligence section of the best personnel we could find and properly equipped, now have a finger at all times on crime; organized, syndicated, single—of whatever nature and wherever it appears. This type of continuing investigation, with persons trained to investigate crime and then to relay that information and make it available, as they say on a "need to know" basis as it appears, right at the time it is incipient, to the police forces concerned with the investigation, suppression of crime and the arrest of criminals.

This, I submit to you, is the best type of investigation possible. The Act, as you in this Legislature passed it last year, provides that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may direct the commission to inquire into and report upon. This would be a continuing of the type of investigation such as was being carried on when this Legislature met last year. The opportunity is still there, the means of carrying on such an investigation are there; but I submit to you that it is a better way, unless a very desperate need arises where the commission says, "We need to hold some sort of public inquiry." I think the manner in which it is now being done is a better way to investigate crime.

The hon. member asked about the in camera hearings. This was one of our subjects of debate in connection with the bill last year. The words, I believe, were removed from the Act, at least they did not appear in the final legislation. I think my answer must be that the in camera hearing is available to the same extent, is available in an inquiry carried on by the police commission, to the same extent that it would be under The Public Inquiries Act.

Now I do not intend at this moment, here and now, to give a dissertation on the case law relating to the rights of persons and witnesses in an inquiry and where and when and to what refinement the in camera situation may be carried. But I would say to you I think it is correct that the commission would have the same right as might be exerted in a public inquiry under The Public Inquiries Act.

I am indebted to having it pointed out to me that in section 17 to which I previously referred, subsection 4 reads:

Upon the request or with the consent of a witness at an inquiry under this section his evidence shall be taken in private.

So that you will recall in our debate last year and our discussion in this Legislature it was felt that it would be made permissive to the witness so that he might be protected by having his evidence taken in private; or we may translate that, I think, to in camera.

Whether that goes far enough, I recall at that time there was some difference of opinion, but it was felt it was reasonable and proper in the circumstances of this type of inquiry to provide that protection, to throw that cloak of protection at least, around a witness giving evidence before an inquiry. But the inquiry is only such as may be directed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and he does so, I would say, on the advice of the commission, coming through the Attorney General.

I do wish to make clear my submission to you that I feel the best type of inquiry, the best type of method to deal with crime, is to have a good intelligence section; to have competent, well-trained police officers; to have good liaison between your forces; to have excellent communication; to be ahead of the criminal whenever he makes a move.

I do not think—perhaps someone would put me right—I do not believe that Scotland Yard gets out a detailed police report of its activities. It is a famous investigation branch of a famous police force, but I am not aware that its current activities are made public for the benefit of the public. I think it works quietly. Most of the things we read about it, with the exception of what we read of proceedings in the courts, since we read of the court's procedures as we do in our own country, are about an historical matter after the famous case is over, apart from those reports which appear in the press.

When the hon. member says "I think the public should be aware of criminal activities, criminal procedures, of organized crime, syndicated crime"; I do not feel that the public needs to be kept vigilant in that way. I think the public knows, because from day to day we read of the criminal being apprehended, of the criminal being tried in our courts, of the methods that are used in our country, of the methods that are used in adjoining provinces, and of the criminal exploits that go on here and in the country to the south of us. We read about their methods and their devious means and procedures in the newspapers when they come before the courts for trial. I think the public is well aware that always, within our borders and on the edges of our borders, will sit and lurk the criminal element, and that we must always be vigilant to meet it and beat it before it can take advantage of the situation.

I say again, the intelligent police force, well equipped, well trained, with a good morale, competent in numbers and competent in training and competent in equipment, with its communications as good or better than the criminal can produce, supported by a judiciary which is independent and ready to administer the law, and supported by the character of a people who will not stand for bribery and corruption and for criminal shenanigans to go on, is the best defence against crime of any kind—organized, syndicated, or whatever you may call it.

I do not think I could become alarmed in the face of crime; I know it is always there. In my duty as adviser of this government in this department, I say we have established a strong police force, a well-equipped force and an intelligent force, and we have bolstered its ranks so that it is capable of combating crime wherever it may appear. So far, I am happy to say, there has been no call, as the police commission points out in its report, for the type of investigation which should have to be directed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, under section 17.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, I well recall in the early years in which I sat in this House the attitude of the former Prime Minister of the province toward organized crime and toward those people who made their livelihood through engaging in criminal activities. It was that if they continued to do that, he always had a mental preconception that we would get the police after them and put them in jail as being bad people. Neither that concept nor that practice, if it was followed by the police forces, proved very successful, as was demonstrated by the report of Mr. Justice Roach, which was tabled in this Legislature.

No one will ever convince me—they can talk to me all night or talk to me for a week—that the Mafia or the Cosa Nostra, by whichever name it is more appropriately called, has not got its tentacles into Ontario and does not engage in the control of book-making and gambling activities. Certainly, if as seems apparent, it is in a position of some importance in Montreal, as has been demonstrated by the revelations of the activities of Lucien Rivard and some other people, then almost certainly, perhaps to a lesser extent, the Cosa Nostra has its minions and its auxiliaries and its subsidiaries within Ontario.

I, sir, am a great admirer of the Ontario provincial police force.

I have been criticized in this House, though not very seriously, by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) and the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) about relying upon my own experiences and revealing my own experiences in the House. I never felt that it was too great a sin for a man to base what he had to say and attempt to make a contribution on what he had experienced himself, for after all, experience is the greatest teacher.

I have had considerable contact with the Ontario provincial police, and as the years go by, I am increasingly impressed with the efficiency of that force in the detection and prosecution of crime as compared to the efficiency of municipal police forces.

If I may be permitted to say as a barrister who has been engaged in, I believe it is seven murder cases now, there is the difference of night and day when the antagonist on the other side to defence counsel is the Ontario provincial police and an inspector from the CIB, and when the defence counsel faces the detective branch of the local police force.

Comparisons are odious and I hesitate to make them, but I think it may be of some use to make that observation in order to bolster what I have to say later. Speaking for myself, I would be quite content if the Ontario provincial police policed virtually all of this province with perhaps the exception of the larger metropolitan areas—with perhaps the exception of cities—I would be quite content. I would feel quite safe and happy when I laid down my head to rest at night, if the Ontario provincial police were responsible for the policing of the rest of the province. Indeed, in terms of land area, as I calculate it, the Ontario provincial police is now responsible, in terms of area and acreage, for the policing of the greater part of the province of Ontario.

I can tell that when I look at the figures in the Ontario police commission's report and when they reveal that only 280 municipalities are responsible for their own policing. I am informed reliably, in fact I am informed right from the top, right from the horse's mouth, that there are 938 organized municipalities in Ontario and of these 938, 32 are cities, 157 are towns, 159 are villages, 572 are townships and 18 are improvement districts. So if you add the cities and towns—those would probably have their own police forces—you would get a total of 189.

I know of one improvement district that has its own municipal police force and that is the improvement district of Elliot Lake, so we have, then, a total of 190. That leaves 90 municipalities, and probably the 90 municipalities are townships, so that the Ontario provincial police in organized municipalities is probably responsible for the great majority of townships—remember I said that there were 572—and all of the villages, which number 159. Certainly in terms of numbers if not in terms of population, two-thirds of the municipalities in the province are policed by the Ontario provincial police.

To reduce it to exemplary terms, to use specific examples of the type of responsibility that the OPP carries on, I have always considered it to be the very epitome of the ridiculous to see in my own district the Ontario provincial police members leaving their headquarters on Lisgar Street in the heart of downtown Sudbury and journeying northward on Highway 69, their destination being the townships of Hanmer and Capreol which they have the responsibility to police, those two townships, organized municipalities, having no private police forces. On the way to their destination in Capreol and Hanmer townships, to the south of these communities they pass through six miles of the township of Blezard, which has something between a two-man and three-man force. You can never tell whether it is a three-man force or a two-man force because the turnover is very great.

Why, I ask myself in terms of economy, if they are going to Hanmer and Capreol should they pass through that six miles of Blezard township—and almost all the inhabitants of Blezard township reside on either side or within a few blocks of Highway 69—yet the provincial police are not responsible for the policing of that township. The expense has to be borne by the local ratepayers, and I say to myself: Would not common sense dictate that somebody get together with somebody and Blezard be relieved of its obligations to police itself and the Ontario provincial police take on all three townships?

Now, that is the northeast part of the riding. Over on the northwest an identical situation occurs. The Ontario provincial police again leave their headquarters and they journey out that road—about which the city of Sudbury is fighting with the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), trying to get him to pay the cost of rebuilding it—they journey out Highway 544 and their destination this time is Balfour and Dowling townships, adjacent to the town of Chelmsford. Chelmsford is the home of my brother from Nickel Belt and has its own police force, that is a two-man force—no, I think it is a one-man force and a part-time constable.

The provincial police, going to Balfour and Dowling, they pass through Rayside on the way. That is another six-mile township. Rayside has had its own force for, it must be something approaching eight years. But again, the same situation is repeated. What I say is that it is the very epitome of the lack of economy. Why, I ask in reasonableness, if the provincial police are responsible for two townships can they not take on the one that they go through?

Having said that, I add that the people are so law-abiding in Blezard on the one hand and Rayside on the other, nothing ever really happens in those two townships. Certainly nothing serious, within my memory, in the last decade or more.

Again, speaking for myself, returning to what I said, I would be content to see a great expansion in the Ontario provincial police force and the impinging upon that force of greater responsibilities for the policing of this province, because it is an exceptionally fine body of men.

My experience teaches me, having dealt with Ontario provincial police officers, that the overwhelming number of them are men of keen desire to serve, are men usually of a temperament that has put them in police work whereby they are content to devote the rest of their life to it. In the vast majority of cases they are courteous but firm—firm in their responsibilities but are able to carry them out with courtesy. In the police court, where I meet them most often, they are alert and intelligent, well trained in the art of giving evidence.

Again I draw a comparison. There is the difference between night and day to see a trained provincial policeman in the witness box on the one hand and a municipal officer on the other. Some of the municipal officers in the smaller municipalities—I must make the judgment—some of them in the witness box are foolish and are the victims of an alert defence counsel, not me, these are other defence counsel, but they are easily led into error.

Now that is my assessment of the Ontario provincial police force. The force is one of which we can be justifiably proud, and especially in the field of the scientific detection of crime. Only the Ontario provincial police force has at its beck and call the scientific aids and the Attorney General's laboratory. I know that the municipal forces can use them, they can bring their exhibits to the laboratory; but there is a close contact between the CIB—that is to say, to lengthen out those initials, the jargon, the criminal investigation branch of the Ontario provincial police—there is a close liaison between the criminal investigation branch and the Attorney General's laboratory.

I would like to see that in every case of serious crime, perhaps outside Metropolitan Toronto, in the province, in every case of serious crime—that is to say murder, arson, rape, and those are the most numerous—I would like to see an officer of the criminal investigation branch of the Ontario provincial police assigned immediately to it. Once again we see a disparate and contradictory situation where if a serious crime such as murder occurs in a small community, then the Ontario provincial police inspector moves in almost immediately; if it occurs in an urban municipality, it is left to the local force to deal with and the local force may not be well enough equipped and well enough trained.

That is what I have to say about the provincial police.

The only thing I'd do by way of reform is that I would go around and take down the picture of the commissioner of the provincial police that he has put in all the district headquarters. Really, he is not a generalissimo of the provincial police and he is not something like General MacArthur.

When I first saw his picture in full regalia, with more scrambled eggs than some of the admirals that I served under in the fleet, I was rather startled. I wondered whether the local detachments, before dispatching themselves on the highways in the morning, had to line up in front of the picture and perhaps salute it. I do not think that contributes very much. I would take that picture down if I ever replaced the hon. gentleman from Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Wishart) in that seat. I do not believe in pictures of people or politicians spread out around the province, or senior civil servants for that matter.

Now, sir, I want to get to something even more specific. Twice within the last three years the Ontario police commission has been in my community of Sudbury investigating the local police force, that is to say, the city of Sudbury police force. The general assessment that I make about the visits of the police commission—the first one under the chairmanship of Judge Bruce Macdonald, and the second visit under the chairmanship of the newly or recently appointed chairman of the Ontario police commission—the assessment that I make of—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Would the hon. member indicate whether the commission came in at the request of the municipality or the council, or whether they came in of their own volition?

Mr. Sopha: On both occasions they came in by request; first, if I am correct—and somebody will correct me if I am wrong—the first occasion, which I think was two or three years ago, the years pass by and one does not always have an accurate memory of dates, the first one was at the instance of the local police commission; and the second one, the recent one, was at the instance of the city council because a very active alderman on the second occasion had been making some rather serious and startling charges about brutality on the part of some of the officers in the Sudbury police force. But I was going to say that my assessment of both of those investigations by the Ontario police commission is that we have not in Sudbury, to date, been left very much better off as a result of the intervention.

I can sum up the first one; I can sum it up very shortly, and I can say with accuracy that it accomplished virtually nothing. When the police commission invited them in, they had a series of meetings with the police commission and as a result—I am not sure—they asked the chief of police to resign and the last predecessor but one of the present incumbent of the office of Attorney General, the present hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) very conveniently and very obligingly gave that chief of police a job in The Department of the Attorney General. Nobody could ever quite figure out what the nature of his duties were; he just sort of wandered around the halls here and he had a job of a nature that he was in charge of co-ordinating those things which needed to be co-ordinated. It was a sort of job something like that, but he had an office on the 4th floor. Finally, discovering that the man was—what is the word?—atrophying, or in danger of dying from atrophy, they appointed him a magistrate. That was the predecessor of the present incumbent. That was the only result, so far as I can see, of the first visit of the Ontario police commission.

As recently as last week an inspector attached to the Ontario police commission made a report to the police commission of Sudbury of his investigations, which have been carried on over a period of three or four months. The particular inspector is, of course, very well known to the present hon. Attorney General—a fellow citizen of the same community, Inspector Robertson. Inspector Robertson made his report last Thursday and when questioned by those guardians of freedom and protectors of the public interest, the press, he declined to reveal any of the contents of his report because, he said, there were some personalities involved in the report. He, very cavalierly, I thought, said to the press that perhaps in two or three months' time the contents of the report would be made known—perhaps, he said.

I do not feel, speaking on behalf of the constituents that I represent, that such an attitude on the part of that inspector, reflected in the refusal of the police commission to reveal the contents of the report, is very salutary for our city.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: May I just interject here to ask the hon. member, as I asked before, who asked for the report to be made? You told me the city council. The police commission assigned an inspector to make the report; he made the report. Would he not be very improper if he did otherwise than to present the report to the council, which paid for it and which engaged his services through the police commission to make it, and then let council give it such publicity as it sees fit? Surely, it is not the place of the inspector to broadcast it. I think he should properly present it to the city council. I must say that at this time.

Mr. Sopha: I must disagree. In the enabling legislation, the power is clearly given to the Ontario police commission to go into any municipality and it does not have to be invited.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It was invited.

Mr. Sopha: It does not have to be invited.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But it was.

Mr. Sopha: It can go in, as we say in the law, proprio motu—on its own initiative.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It can—

Mr. Sopha: It can go in, and it has done so. It has gone into municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But not in this case.

Mr. Sopha: All right. But the distinction is a distinction without a difference.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, no.

Mr. Sopha: It does not really matter who invited whom into the community.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There is one small difference. Let me acquaint my hon. friend with this difference which is of some moment to certain people. If the police commission goes in proprio motu, of its own initiative, then the government of this province pays all the expenses of that inquiry. But if it is invited in by a town or city council, or a municipal body, then the costs are at the expense of the municipality and that makes quite a difference in who has the right to get the report and who can give it publicity.

Mr. Sopha: I will say to the hon. Attorney General, through you, Mr. Chairman, that I am not going to be drawn into any discussion between himself and myself in the realm of pettifoggery—any discussion that reflects really a question of semantics. I am one of those who believes that this Legislature here and the Treasury benches over there, which comprise the government of the province, and the arms and agencies of which the Ontario police commission is one, are superior bodies to municipalities, and indeed in this specific case I believe the Ontario police commission is, by statute, a superior body to the local police commission in Sudbury.

In this particular case, so far as I read the press and I listened to the television and radio in Sudbury, no comment was made at all by the local police commission about the report. The only comment that was made was by Inspector Robertson. He was the only one quoted. And there was no question, so far as the citizens of Sudbury were concerned, that the local police commission was withholding the report. It was Inspector Robertson who said to the press, "I am not going to release this report because personalities are involved."

As late as Saturday night, when that great event had been completed of which I spoke last week to the hon. Minister of Highways there was the annual gathering of the clan, that great event, at which Allan MacEachen was guest speaker. Next week—I might interpolate, if the Chairman permits me—having completed that great event, you would not hardly believe it, but I am on the platform in Sudbury with John Diefenbaker. If the hon. Attorney General and I get along today, I give my undertaking that when I am on the platform at that ceremony next Saturday with John Diefenbaker, I will say to John Diefenbaker privately, "You know, those Tories at Queen's Park are not half as bad as you think they are." If I can get him to reduce his assessment of you by 50 per cent that is quite an accomplishment, after what he said about you—you remember what he said about you. We will not review that.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): This is all private—

Mr. Sopha: He did not say it privately, he said it in the House of Commons. I will talk to him privately, I will indeed. I have never met the man in my life and I look forward to it. I look forward to meeting the former Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. R. Brunelle (Cochrane North): A great man.

Mr. Sopha: Yes; well he has made quite a contribution to the life of this nation. Let us leave that.

I want the hon. Attorney General to face up to it. If there is something wrong with the Sudbury police force after two investigations by this commission, then of course personalities are involved.

How else could they help but be involved? The Sudbury police force is made up of people, human beings, officers—one woman, and 80 or 85 men. If something is wrong, personalities are wrong.

As late as Saturday night the rumour flying about the city was that three officers of the force had been suspended. That was the rumour. Names were being bandied about, names of the officers. There was no verification of it.

Now within our community the police force has been functioning in a very unsatisfactory way for a number of years. Let me tell you this about the police force, against the background of what I conceive to be the responsibility of the Attorney General in regard to corrective measures under The Police Act, which was amended in this Legislature during my time to set up this Ontario police commission and to give it powers to take corrective action in regard to municipal police forces.

Up to four years ago I was counsel, solicitor, to the Sudbury police association and I grew to have a personal knowledge of the workings of that force as long as they reposed their confidence in me to be solicitor for the police association. There came a time when the group in control of that association, the group whom I represented, the executive, in a very dramatic fashion, which I will not detail, was thrown out by the majority of the members of the association. When I saw who the new executive was going to be, let me tell you I delivered my resignation by hand the same day.

Now despite my contact with that association none of the officers, Inspector Robertson or anybody else from the Ontario police commission, ever came around to my office and said to me, as the local member and indeed the local member who had had intimate contact with the police force and who, in earning his daily living, sees this force in the courts of justice; at no time did any of them ever come to my office and say, or come to me at Queen's Park and say, "What do you know about it? Have you any information to give us?"

But no, a few years ago when I had something to say about organized crime in this province and, "requiescat in pace," when I have something to say about the involvement of a Cabinet Minister with those in organized crime, then two of the inspectors, the top man, the very top man and his deputy, journeyed to Sudbury to my office and came in, unannounced, plumped themselves down on a chair in my office and said, "What do you know? What do you know about it?"

Well, it was two against one at that point and I will never forget and I will never forgive that. I sent for my junior, to make it two against two. I asked him to come in and sit down while I talked to these two who had come unannounced; and I a member of this Legislature.

The proper person, in my view, if they wanted to question me—and I wrote to the Prime Minister of the province about this—the proper person to question me as an elected member of this Legislature was the Attorney General, a fellow elected politician; not two senior civil servants.

So I said to them on that occasion, just to make the record complete, I said to them: "Can I tell you off the record? I will tell you what I know. Can I tell it to you off the record and I will give you the information I have."

They said, "No, you cannot."

I said, "You do not get the information, you do not get it then. Good day, and that is final."

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): You said you would speak to a judge, and the judge was appointed but you did not come forward.

Mr. Sopha: The judge was not yet appointed.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: You said you would speak to him, but when he was appointed you did not have the guts to come forward.

Mr. Sopha: I did not need to.

Mr. MacDonald: Here is Sir Galahad.

Mr. Sopha: I say this to the hon. Provincial Secretary through you, Mr. Chairman, that in the course of this debate if he would keep his lips closed and his ears open, he would catch more facts than flies.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I got in the witness box, but you did not have the guts to—you sat as a spectator.

Mr. Sopha: You needed to. We could go into the whole circumstances about you and your deputy.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes, now that the report is all filed.

Mr. Sopha: There was no information in my possession that was not given from the witness box. Had I gone into the witness box, anything I had to say would have been redundant. There was no question of myself ever being called—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: You do not make redundant remarks, is that it?

Mr. Sopha: There was no question of me ever being called to the witness box. All the information I had was in the possession of the counsel for the Liberal Party and it was presented.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Get on to 1965.

Mr. Sopha: You ought to say to the hon. Provincial Secretary that in view of the history of the Provincial Secretary and his deputy, he should never open his mouth about the Roach commission.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: These are dead issues—

Mr. MacDonald: I agree with the hon. Prime Minister, but perhaps he might suggest to the hon. Provincial Secretary that he stay silent instead of raising issues that are dead issues.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Who is raising the issue?

Mr. MacDonald: You.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, it is not always easy to sit silent. We are patient but sometimes a little spark will show.

Mr. Sopha: That is a great contribution.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is equal to anything I have heard this afternoon.

Mr. Sopha: A great contribution! You have only been here for part of it. I do not criticize you for not being here—that is your own affair. We just seem to get along better when you are not here. So you go with my blessing.

Now I am coming to the conclusion of my remarks. That is, having traced the history I had come to the point where I complained that these people never saw fit to come and see me and to hear my views about the workings of a police force within my own constituency. I wonder, if Sudbury had the misfortune of being represented by a government member, would they in that case go to the government member and acquaint him with what they were doing and attempt to seek knowledge from him? Do they stay away from an Opposition member in the same way that the bride and groom do not like a skunk at a wedding? Is that the inarticulated major premise from which they work? These things I wonder about.

But in the light of the situation in Sudbury and the elapse of a period of three or four or five years under which our police force has been under some degree of suspicion, I hand a challenge to the hon. Attorney General, to tell the House and to tell me and to tell the citizens of Sudbury what he intends to do in the exercise of his office to, once and for all, through the use of the Ontario police commission, get the city of Sudbury police force on a firm and efficient footing, to remove the abuses from it, to remedy those things that need to be remedied, so that the citizens can once again return to the frame of mind of perhaps ten years ago, when they had confidence in their police force, they felt safe in their homes, when they had the conception that they were served by men of integrity, competence and ability.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 202 carried?

Mr. Singer: No, no!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Attorney General wants to leave his comments until the conclusion, I want to revert briefly, and I hope I can rather dispassionately, to the topic that my hon. colleague from Riverdale was raising before the hon. member for Sudbury spoke.

I would agree with the hon. Attorney General that it is much more appropriate and effective that those agencies charged with guarding society against the operations of organized crime should operate quietly. There were some obvious limitations on the procedure adopted in this province when we were forced through circumstances—and through circumstances that were created by this government in good part by refusing to even acknowledge the existence of organized crime for quite some time—to establish a Royal commission, with all of the attendant publicity and everything. Having coped with the emergency of that situation, I repeat, I agree with the hon. Attorney General that I think guarding against organized crime in a continuing way, day to day, can best be done by an appropriate agency, like the police commission, with an efficient police force, in a quiet way, rather than with the press at its doorstep and the TV cameras focused on its activities all the time.

However the question that worries me—and I come to a few that I want to put to the hon. Attorney General—is that he says that he is confident that we have got that sort of agency now. I hope his confidence is well placed. But I just want to draw a few things to his attention.

One of the conclusions drawn by the Roach report with regard to the way in which organized crime became established in the province of Ontario, was that when it became too hot for those who were directing organized crime in the larger municipalities, where there were more effective police forces, they moved out into the smaller communities, or they moved out into those gaps between the police agencies, where they felt there were weaknesses that would permit them to continue to exist.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that there is something more than coincidence in the fact that the Ontario police commission, in two succeeding years, has said to this government that if we are going to be able to do our job, we have got to face the fact that the small police forces across this province are inefficient. They simply are not trained; they have not got modern equipment. They may conceivably be more effectively coordinated by the OPP through channels that are being established, but they simply are not competent forces able to deal with organized crime. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the hon. Attorney General, that as long as this government refuses to act, as I think it should have acted two years ago, on the recommendation of the Ontario police commission, in eliminating these little forces that are ineffective, in effect, establish regional government or regional administrative units—this is something we have been talking an awful lot about in this province—for the police forces across the whole of the province, then and then only will I for one in this province, be confident that we have got the kind of law enforcement agency that is going to be in a position to cope with the development or the resurgence of organized crime.

It is idle for the excuses to be made, as they continue to be made this year as they were last year, with regard to the difficulties in establishing larger units—breaking through the parochialism of these small police forces across the province. When you bow to those local interests, and do not act, you are leaving this province with an ineffective law enforcement agency and therefore you are leaving this province with the danger that organized crime can be re-established.

If I may put it bluntly and personally, the responsibility now devolves on the hon. Attorney General, who is a very kindly and a considerate man, but it is his responsibility to implement something which has been clearly recommended to this government in two succeeding years. You are going to have to take the responsibility for not accepting the recommendation of the Ontario police commission and implementing it, and I repeat, when you put that recommendation along with the conclusions of the Roach report, there are some pretty dangerous and sobering warnings that emanate from it.

The second thing, Mr. Chairman, that I want to draw to the attention of the hon. Attorney General is this: Arising from that highly controversial debate that we had last year on the so-called police state bill, in the government's effort to implement the recommendations of the Ontario police commission for getting a more effective agency in this province, rightly or wrongly—and for the moment I am not going to argue the rights or wrongs; I want to look at the consequences that flow from them—we came to the conclusion that, for example, the police commission could not hold in camera sessions. The hon. Attorney General has said that the OPC now has two intelligence officers, and he uses the term “non-operational.” I presume the hon. Attorney General means by that that these are people who are sort of behind the scenes, keeping on top of the situation, feeding the information that they get to the police commission, and that if the police commission ever becomes persuaded that the situation has got to the point that it must have broader powers, it will make application to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and can proceed to have an investigation.

From my understanding—and I do not pretend it to be complete, but it is not non-existent, if I may put it at its lowest level—of the operations of organized crime, I do not think your intelligence officers are going to be equipped to the extent that they cannot, on occasion, in effect, hold in camera sessions with the appropriate people to get information.

Let me try to make my point this way. As I understand, the difference between the structure we have established following the police state bill last year, and the structure in New York state, it is that at any time the comparable body in New York state can move to investigate a situation. Nobody needs to know about it except the authorities from whom they get permission, and they can proceed to hold in camera sessions. If they want to use the penalties against somebody who refuses to testify, then they have to go to a court, so it seems to me they are protecting the rights of the individual. But they can do it quietly and they can do it in a fashion that if those who are involved in organized crime are brought in, their buddies out in the field do not know about it and, therefore, the witnesses do not run the risk of finding themselves in the bottom of the Niagara River with a block of cement on their feet. Or an average citizen is not fearful to come in and speak because there is no danger that he is going to become the subject of attack from these very vicious operators in organized crime.

In other words, it seems to me you have got a situation in which, only with a serious development is it going to be possible, or is it likely, that the police commission will be forced to the position of asking for permission from the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to hold an investigation. If such an investigation is held it will have to be for the most part a public investigation, with all of the difficulties that involves, if you are going to get at the full operation of organized crime. I acknowledge that the hon. Attorney General has been advised by his deputy that any witness can ask for an in camera session. But this means that most of the investigation is going to be out in public, and therefore you cannot operate in the fashion that the hon. Attorney General himself has said is the best way—a quiet, behind-the-scenes getting at the facts before you alert those concerning whom you are seeking the facts, so that they can resort to alternative tactics. That is the second point.

I have a third point I want to raise—and again I am not arguing the right and the wrong of it. I would concede in advance that this is an issue in which there are sharp cleavages of view in all political parties. This almost becomes a matter of conscience. But some day, if I may borrow the proletarian phraseology of the hon. Provincial Secretary, somebody on the government side of the House has got to have the guts to face up to the issue of how we are handling, or how we are authorizing, the use of many of the modern devices that are now available for organized crime or for anybody who wants to resort to their use. I am talking about bugging and wire-tapping and things of this nature.

I repeat in this House what I said a year ago—that on some occasions the police force uses these; business uses them to get information on their competitors; on some occasions the federal authorities in Ottawa have sent representatives from Canada to courses in the United States to learn how they are being used. I say to the hon. Attorney General that some time soon somebody has to face up to the fact and cease winking at the fact that they are being used day in and day out—in some instances, in a clandestine fashion, even by our law enforcement agencies because they are faced with the problem that they are coping with organized crime that is using them.

I repeat that this is an exceedingly controversial issue; it cuts across political parties in terms of policy. I do not know of any political party that has a policy on this, but some time soon, if you want to have effective law enforcement agencies—indeed, some time soon, if you want to enforce the law, because the hon. Attorney General gets up and says that he is opposed to this and some of his backbenchers say, “Hear, hear”—he has to seek out its use when it is being used today, because it is in violation of the law.

The reverse side of the argument is the one that has been advanced by Robert Kennedy in the United States, and top people in Great Britain. They argue that the only way in which you can intelligently cope with this situation is to pass a law which says that nobody—including the police force—can use these modern devices unless they have been given permission by application to the courts, with all the safeguards that are necessary, and that we can lay down the law for their use.

If you do not do that kind of thing, you end up with a situation in which organized crime is using these devices all the time and the police forces are forbidden to use them unless they resort to them in a clandestine fashion on some occasions. I think that this is a wholly unsatisfactory situation and I conclude once again by saying that it is another area where I think that the hon. Attorney General has got to face up to the problem and presumably to reconcile and resolve within his own Cabinet and within the government, what is the responsibility of a government in this modern day and age when coping with these modern kinds of instruments.

Until he does that, in terms of larger units of administration for our police forces, in terms of other aspects of the difficulties involved in investigating in regard to organized crime under the laws that we now have established, and in clarifying the law with regard to these modern devices, it seems to me that some of us who have to sit on this side of the House, and among the public, and wonder whether we have the most effective kind of agency to cope with organized crime, are entitled to have our reservations and not be as confident of the situation as the hon. Attorney General is.

Mr. Singer: Does the hon. Attorney General want to reply, because I have another topic that I want to get on with?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, we have taken a long time on this vote but I think we might spare a few more moments and I would like to reply to some of the things that have been said and at least make some comment upon them.

The hon. member for Sudbury was very complimentary in respect of the Ontario provincial police force and on behalf of that force and the commissioner I would like to say that we are grateful for his words of compliment which I am sure are well deserved by that force. It is, as I have reported to this House, a competent, capable, well-trained efficient force, and the commissioner and his staff accept those compliments for the excellent force with which we have been provided.

I think that this House should know that, of course, nothing that I say is in any way boastful, but I do say with pride, that in the recruitment and in the promotion of that force right from top to bottom, there is never a suggestion of anything political. This, I think, is one of the great strengths which lie under the morale of that force; it is one of the strengths which give it the high standard that it has. It is something of which I am proud and I report it to this House.

I would say to the hon. member for Sudbury that it is almost a matter of routine, actually, in most of our smaller municipalities, if they request it in the event of a crime of a serious nature, such as the hon. member referred to, that an inspector or two inspectors from the CIB are sent to assist in the investigation and in the preparation of evidence and the securing of such evidence for presentation to the court, this is almost a matter of routine, a matter of course now. I want to reassure the hon. member for Sudbury and other hon. members of this House, that this is the procedure which is followed—the OPP intelligence services are made available beyond the areas which they actually are charged with policing. They are available to the province and to the municipalities.

I am going to be very brief about the inquiry which was conducted by the Ontario police commission into the affairs of the police force in the city of Sudbury. I can only say that it was requested by the city of Sudbury, by the council. An inquiry was proceeded with promptly and I suggest that since the city of Sudbury required it and since the city of Sudbury was paying for it, that I would have been ready to criticize severely—and I think that the commission would have criticized—the inspector who made the report, if he had started talking to the newspapers before he handed the report over to the people who were entitled to have it, the council of the city of Sudbury. It is up to them to act; it is up to them to publish it. They can do as they like with it, but certainly the inspector was right in saying that he would not talk about this report. I can only say that I think he was entirely correct.

I was glad that the hon. member for York South agreed that we should investigate crime quietly. I agree also with him that there are some areas which still give us some concern in the matter of organized crime, but beyond that I do not propose to go into detail. I do not, however, think—and I think the facts do not support the proposition which he put forth—that organized crime has moved or is likely to move into the small hamlets, the towns and villages and even small cities. This is not what evidence shows is its performance. This is not its way of operating.

Actually—if we are talking about the very small police force and if we are speaking of it as a weak link in our chain of control with respect to crime—I do not think that is the serious part of our weakness, because I do not think that organized crime can exist, operate and maintain itself in a small municipality without becoming apparent. It seeks the large area where there is activity in which it can operate and where there is cover by virtue of population, where it can carry on its nefarious activities.

Mr. MacDonald: You are ignoring the network of bookmaking across this whole province—in every village of any size—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Bookmaking could still be done in the large and in the small centres, and across the province anywhere with the electronic equipment we have today. It could be done anywhere, whether it was in a municipality or in the backwoods. I will—

Mr. Sopha: Bookmaking breeds other crimes, it has been demonstrated time and again.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is true.

Mr. MacDonald: It is the treasure chest of organized crime.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is true and I only reiterate that it is a policy, a recommendation, that we amalgamate as soon as this can be brought about, and I will have to accept, as the hon. member says, the responsibility for not doing it today. I do not think it is feasible to do it all of a sudden and to bring it about in this province at this moment, in legislation. While I think the pattern is clear, we move toward it, and we move as reasonable men. That is all I can say to that, and I think that anyone who attempts to do it otherwise would be met with such opposition in certain of the municipalities that it would not be successful.

I also would like to say a word about the use of modern devices to combat crime and the activities of criminals. I did say last year in this House that I think these devices are an invasion of the freedom of the individual. They are; on this we must agree. I say this: I would be happy to see them used against the criminal, certainly if I could confine it to that area, but how, tell me how, do you apply a rule or a device or a method against one member of society be he innocent or guilty and make sure that you touch only the guilty?

Mr. MacDonald: Why do you ignore its continued growing operation in society already?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Last year, when the hon. member asked me the same question, I inquired and I was told by all the police forces of this province that they did not use the electronic listening snooping devices. I have not inquired at this moment; it is not that I do not want to inquire to get an answer the hon. member suggests will not suit me, but I do not know of any police force that has the right to use these electronic devices.

Mr. Singer: Would you like some evidence now or shall we save it for a later moment?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Just a moment. I understand that these things are being used. I think it is perhaps possible, perhaps it is possible to bring them into use for certain purposes for the combating of crime and to lay down such safeguards that they may be used by proper people for the proper purpose for doing away with improper activities. This is a problem which I have not solved and I appreciate—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Could it be dealt with on the same sort of basis as the search warrant principle requiring that a court must give authority?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, it is a problem which I think is deserving of consideration and which is having consideration and at that I shall have to leave it. I shall be glad to have the comments and advice of the hon. members of the House.

Mr. Chairman, speaking with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Riverdale, I had intended to refer to some of the recommendations that had been made by what we call the MacDonnell commission, and to say something of the implementing of those recommendations. I shall be brief.

The first one—these were numbered—was that all police forces should be under the immediate government of an independent and non-political authority, subject to removal for cause, by the government on the recommendation of the Attorney General. That pursuant to that policy police commissions should be appointed for all municipal departments now governed by municipal councils. That provision be retained in the organization of such a commission for political representation.

Actually, we moved largely to that and the legislation which I brought into this House a few days ago extends that principle;

we are increasing the types of communities in which police boards are now required. That recommendation has been fairly well carried out; there are still some areas to be implemented.

Number 2 suggested: that smaller police departments where geographically feasible be amalgamated.

I can only say that the forthcoming legislation will promote that amalgamation and, as you know, we have dwelt upon it. It has been urged by permissive legislation, then by persuasive legislation and eventually, if necessary, the mandatory powers. I think we shall move to that.

Number 3: That all police recruits with the possible temporary exception of those employed by Metro Toronto, be trained and qualified at the Ontario police college.

We have gone a long way toward that; we trained a great many more last year than in the year before. We are seeking the new facilities, and eventually we shall achieve that and I think before too long. All our police recruits will be trained before they come on the force.

Mr. Singer: How long?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I cannot tell the hon. member.

Mr. Singer: One year, two years, five years, ten years?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Not too long, I think I would say to the hon. member. If we get the facilities, which should not take too long to acquire, we should be able to train our police force. We need facilities and staff. We have asked for additional funds in our estimates this year for staff. I have told you that the new plans for the police college are on the capital expenditure list for The Department of Public Works. I think this is reporting progress.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Number 5:

That the Ontario provincial police high-grading squad be renamed the gold theft squad or another more appropriate name, and continued as a special squad.

I think that recommendation has been fully carried out. The recommendation contains more language than I have read but the recommendation has been carried out.

Number 6: That the Ontario police commission, the Ontario provincial police, the Metro Toronto police department each appoint a criminal intelligence officer, responsible directly to the head of his organization whose responsibility it shall be to maintain a complete and up-to-date appropriate record of known criminals and their activities and associations, to meet frequently and maintain contact.

This is our intelligence branch, this has been done. This, I think, is one of the most important recommendations. The language again is longer than I have read but it has been carried out.

Number 7: That the Ontario provincial police establish and maintain for the benefit of its own and municipal forces a central criminal records office under the direction of its intelligence officer.

This is done, the records are there. They are maintained not only for the benefit of municipal forces but for all the other forces with which the Ontario provincial police has liaison and that includes all the forces with which it deals.

Number 8: That the Ontario police commission, the Ontario provincial force and Metropolitan Toronto police department co-operate in the formation of an intelligence clearing committee representing the major law enforcement agencies in eastern Canada and the United States.

That recommendation has been carried out. That is the central intelligence clearing committee.

The recommendation with respect to pawnbrokers and second-hand dealers being provincially licensed is under study but has not been carried out.

There was a recommendation that courts be asked not to impose concurrent sentences. That is something that we can only work at by suggestion; we have no power to legislate in that manner.

Number 11 was incorporated in The Police Act.

I think with those remarks I have referred quite fully to the comments which have been made by the hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I am a little surprised at the hon. Attorney General's remark that he is not aware of the use by the police of some of these modern devices that the hon. member for York South was referring to. The hon. Attorney General, being an honourable man, I am sure he would not have made that statement unless he believed it to be true.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What I said was that I had not actually asked the police forces to answer me on that question. I do not know the language exactly but I indicated that I had not inquired this year as to the extent of such devices.

Mr. Singer: Whether the hon. Attorney General had inquired or not I would think that at least one instance of the use of such devices should have been drawn to his attention by his officials. I refer, sir, to a clipping that was contained in the Globe and Mail, March 2, 1965, probably in the bulldog edition because I do not think it appeared in the Metro papers. I am going to read it in full; it is only a short clipping and I would like to hear the hon. Attorney General's comments on it. It is headed:

MICROPHONE IN CELL; MURDER CASE
COURT TO HEAR RECORDING
Special to the Globe and Mail

North Bay—A provincial policeman was ordered yesterday to produce a tape recorder and the tape made when the listening device was concealed in a cell where a murder suspect was being held at Sturgeon Falls.

Magistrate Norman Nadeau told Constable Jean Racine to have the tape and equipment in court today when he resumes the preliminary hearing of the capital murder charge against Maurice DeVoe, 16, of Cache Bay.

DeVoe is charged with the November 29 night slaying of Marie Lavergne, 69, of Cache Bay.

Constable Racine, a defence witness, told of the listening device concealed in DeVoe's cell when questioned by defence counsel, Richard F. Donnelly. He said he had been asked to translate the tape [it was in French] which was made December 9, but was unable to do so because there was too much vibration from the spot where the microphone was placed.

When Mr. Donnelly moved that the tape be produced and played in court, Crown attorney E. A. Tilley said he did not see what use it would be if it could not be understood.

Magistrate Nadeau, however, ruled that the policeman should not be the judge as to whether the tape could be understood in order that it be brought into court. Constable Racine said that he had no knowledge of any other listening device used in the case.

Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to understand how an incident of this sort that is so repugnant to our ideas of the enforcement of law was not brought to the hon. Attorney General's attention. Certainly from the wording of this newspaper story—unless it is completely erroneous—there can be no doubt that there was a listening device placed in the cell of a man charged with murder and that the device was on when he was being interviewed by defence counsel. Certainly there can be no doubt that a provincial police constable knew about it because he went into court and gave evidence about it. What kind of system of justice have we got in this province where a provincial police officer can do this sort of thing, and how can the hon. Attorney General have made the statement he did in regard to listening devices and that sort of matter unless his officials keep him in abysmal ignorance of what is going on? I would like some explanation of that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitation in saying this is the first occasion on which I have ever heard of this incident. It may have happened, and I daresay it did—I do not deny it—but it was not drawn to my attention. I do not know what edition it appeared in; I have not heard about it.

Apparently the matter came up before a magistrate in a court—

Mr. Singer: Exactly right.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —and he directed that the device be played for whatever it was worth. I know nothing more of it than that. The court made a ruling as to whether the device was evidence; that anything to be heard on it was or was not evidentiary. That is all I have.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, that is, perhaps, all the hon. Attorney General wants to say at this time, but I think, following on the remarks of the hon. member for York South, surely the people of Ontario are entitled to know what ground rules the government has in regard to this. The hon. Attorney General stands here today, and he stood here a year ago, and says that he is not aware of police using listening devices. Then I say that he is kept in abysmal ignorance by his own officials.

Here is a provincial police officer who goes into court and says a device was there and that it is the only one he knows about. Not only that, but this would appear to be one of the most obvious invasions of a defendant's or of an accused man's right to talk to his counsel in privacy. Was there any disciplinary action taken? This is a serious thing.

Here is an accused man, apparently lodged in a jail cell, being interviewed by his own defence counsel and the police are listening in on a listening device. Albeit, it did not mean anything because it was not even a well-placed listening device; it was not placed on level ground, so that the recording it produced could not be understood. But the fact is that according to this report—and if it is correct and there seems no reason why it should not be correct—there was the most obvious and most terrible invasion of the rights of an accused man, and I say if the hon. Attorney General has not heard about it until now, then his officials are not doing their proper job, because this should have been dealt with immediately.

Before these estimates are over, and I suspect that they are going to go on for a few days yet, I would like the hon. Attorney General to find out what he can about this and to bring us a full report, including a report about what disciplinary action, if any, is taken, and the extent to which this sort of policy goes on. I do not know who Constable Racine is—I would presume that he is attached to some northern detachment of the OPP—but I would not presume that Constable Racine would embark upon actions of this sort without the knowledge or the concurrence of his senior officials. Was it his corporal? His sergeant? His inspector? How far does this go? Is it a usual thing that when the OPP is involved in murder cases, listening devices are placed in the cells of accused people? This, I think, is most important.

I was not going to bring this up at this time. Until the hon. member for York South raised it I was going to save this for vote 212 because it deals with the OPP. But here it is in this context, and there will be a few days' time yet so that if the hon. Attorney General does not have the facts before him, we will wait for his answer. I do not know whether he would care to comment further on this—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I did not say when I was up a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, that having made a note of it, I had every intention of investigating and finding out and getting this information, but since the hon. member has referred to it again I can tell him now that it is my full intention to investigate all the facts—if they are facts. I can say this right now: If it is a fact that an accused, whatever his crime, cannot discuss his case with his defence counsel without being listened in upon, then a reprehensible situation has come to pass which cannot be sustained for a moment.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to make two brief suggestions to the hon. Attorney General. I want to suggest to him that when he goes and asks whether or not the police force is using these devices at various levels in the province of Ontario, he does not take a "yes" or a "no"; he inquires into the situation, perhaps by such methods as he wishes to resort, to get the full story of it.

I want to suggest to him that the law at this moment and the attitude of this government at the moment in the minds of many policemen places them in an absolutely impossible position. They are asked to protect society against people who are using these devices all the time, and they cannot use these devices themselves. I can assure the hon. Attorney General that I was talking to a very highly appointed police officer a year ago who, in so many words, assured me that they were being used, so I suggest to the hon. Attorney General that he not come back and just say that he has simply asked them and has been told that they are not being used.

The second thing, just by way of edification, is that I happened to turn on my car radio at one time a few months ago—and I believe it was repeated a few days ago, perhaps because of some discussion in relation to legislation before this House—and tuned in a programme from a local radio station called "Periscope," in which the interrogator did one of his very good jobs of questioning the operations of a private detective agency. It would really make your blood run cold to listen to the matter-of-fact exposition to all that they could do, and presumably all that they are doing today. The thing that really intrigued me when I heard it for the first time was that there was no inhibition on their part to indicate the kind of instruments that they were using and how they could be used. I would not like to be unfair, because it is some time ago since I heard it, but implicit in it, I think, was a breach of the law as the hon. Attorney General suggests the law exists today in the province of Ontario. I draw that to his attention for his investigation.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, we have got involved in a number of subjects and I want to return to the business of the investigation by the Ontario police commission in Sudbury and make a couple of additional comments.

I want to assure the hon. Attorney General that on this side of the House, and I have paid very close attention to the debate, we are attempting to be constructive. We are not attempting to criticize for the purpose of criticism and one of the things we have in our mind is that with the accession of the present hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie into the post of attorney regis, we have the opportunity of making a fresh start in this department. I say with assurance of conviction that the administration of this department under his two predecessors was pretty dreadful, during the last six years.

The second last one, who has now moved along the row, was abominable, and we had plenty of illustrations and examples of that right in this House. I went to the last one and asked him not to appoint Campbell as director of the securities commission, and I asked him to appoint another man, a man on Bay Street of the highest integrity who was well equipped for the position. I got short shrift. I was insulted. I was told that as a member of the Opposition, I had a lot of nerve coming to him to make a suggestion for the appointment to the important position of director of the securities commission. Look at the trouble we are in now. Look at the position Campbell is in now. I leave it.

Let me read the last paragraph of the Ontario police commission's report, under the heading "Police Brutality":

Other cases of police brutality, when drawn to the attention of your commission through press or public reports, are investigated through the channel of the appropriate police governing authority and the resulting evidence placed before the proper tribunal or other authority for remedial or disciplinary action as considered necessary.

Now I say that is not good enough for the administration of police forces in this province. This business of local autonomy—though the words were never used by the hon. Attorney General, that was the concept he was referring to this afternoon—that phrase local autonomy is a convenient crutch. The Treasury benches use the phrase when they do not want to do anything; then they say shrouding themselves in the most holy aspect, they say we do not want to interfere in the workings of local municipalities.

But then on the other hand, when they want to interfere in local municipalities, they do it with abandon.

The hon. Minister of Highways does not allow a local municipality to monkey around with the King's highway that runs through the municipality. He has his say about it.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, (Mr. Spooner) when he wants to interfere in local autonomy, to give you an illustration, he goes into the municipality and he says, put such and such an industry on the assessment roll. Could you imagine greater interference with local autonomy? He has done it on two occasions in the Sudbury district.

The Ontario hospital services commission has left a small measure of local autonomy in the operation of hospitals, a sphere with which the hon. Attorney General is very familiar.

The water resources commission, another one, has not left much of a measure of local autonomy.

Perhaps your legislation needs to be amended. We were given the impression, when this police bill was enacted in this Legislature, that the Ontario police commission would become a supervisory body over all police forces throughout the province with the aim of increasing their efficiency and with the aim, of course, of giving the citizens of this province the best policing that the amount of money that is spent can buy.

Now, I say, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Attorney General, that it is not a good enough answer to say that, however, if the Ontario police commission gets into a municipality to investigate the police officers, to make a reply by saying it is up to the local board or commission to reveal what they have found out.

Perhaps the legislation, I repeat, needs to be amended. Perhaps, and probably, we would vote for the amendment if the legislation went to the extent of saying that having made their investigation and having made their recommendations, there was a mandatory feature given to the Ontario police commission—or better still the Attorney General, perhaps, would be better to order the police commission to carry out the necessary measures to correct the evil.

Now, to illustrate: In the first investigation by the police commission in Sudbury one of the complaints about the force was that there was a considerable degree of nepotism in the force; it was one of the things referred to in the report. Now, the nepotistic—maybe I am creating a word—the nepotistic characteristic of the Sudbury force has never been corrected. It remains there, to fester irritations and jealousies among that force.

The second investigation was instigated by police brutality. It is a remarkable thing that quite a number of constables from the Sudbury police department have been paraded through the courts in the last year or so, charged with assault. I have a case coming up in a couple of weeks' time where one of the items of evidence will be that the accused was assaulted by the police officer from this same force.

I tell the hon. Attorney General there is a good deal of concern in Sudbury about our police force, the 88 personnel; there is a good deal of uncertainty about it. I say it is not good enough for Inspector Robertson or the hon. Attorney General to say we will not release the contents of the report. The hon. Attorney General need not, if he is interested in the health of a community, if he is interested in the well-being of the residents.

The hon. Attorney General, like his colleague the hon. Minister of Highways and his colleague the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs and, indeed, the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile,) another sterling example of interference—the hon. Attorney General himself can release the contents of the report and say: "Here is what we have found and here, in respect of Sudbury, is the corrective measures that we expect to be taken to bring this force back to maximum efficiency."

If the hon. Attorney General does not want to do that, then, I say, let us, at this session of the Legislature, if time still remains, or at the earliest opportunity at the next session, let us amend The Police Act to bring it into line with a degree of central control in the government of Ontario, bearing in mind, of course, that all of the police forces, all of the police commissions in the province are supported to some extent by public funds voted by this Legislature. If they are going to be supported by public funds, it is quite appropriate that there ought to be some central control.

Finally, within a democracy there is no more fearsome organization than the police forces, there is no greater threat to individual liberty than police forces that have not integrity and honesty. I am not making any reference to any specific police force, but the police arm is the arm of the government whereby the government, the state, a unique institution, is enabled to enforce its enjoiner by the use of force. That is what the police force is and only the state, in a pluralistic society, is entitled to use force. That force comes under The Department of the Attorney General, so I am one of those in this House who will vote for a high measure of control over local police forces by the Ontario police commission. I say that in the confidence that the great mass of the citizenry of this province would join with me.

Several hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sopha: They would feel comfortable if all of the police forces, that group entitled to use force against them, were under the control of a central body staffed as it is by men of integrity, alert intelligence and initiative plus, plus this feature—I join with enthusiasm with my hon. friend from Downsview who has made some remarkably trenchant observations during the debates—plus this needed factor: A great reduction in the number of police forces in this province. This police commission has said in this report categorically, in the clearest possible terms, they have said “No force under ten men can possibly be efficient.” Well, even the most droll person can understand those words, even the most droll “No force under ten men can possibly be efficient.”

An hon. member: And we have over 200 of them!

Mr. Sopha: Do not tell me, I have seen them; I have seen lots of them, the forces under ten. I could give illustration after illustration. Remember the poor town of Blind River! The hon. Attorney General, when he first started to practise law in Windsor after he was called to the Bar at Osgoode Hall, he left Windsor and he established in Blind River, the first place he set up the private practice of law, and he was there for many years. Remember their experience?

Things got so bad in Blind River in the running of the police that finally the municipal council had to come along—I shall be finished very shortly—they had to come along and they had to ask the Ontario provincial police, will you send us a sergeant—pardon me, he was a corporal at the time—will you lend us a corporal to be the chief of police in Blind River? And Corporal Walter F.

Etmanski became the chief of Blind River for many years.

That is where we stand, as expostulated by the hon. member for Downsview and myself. In speaking on behalf of the whole of our party, we have given you a blueprint that we think it is necessary for you to follow to increase the efficiency of the police arm in the province of Ontario. We will continue another day.

Mr. Singer: Hear, hear!

An hon. member: Is the vote carried?

Mr. Singer: No, it is not carried.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the committee rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will have second readings and will continue with the estimates.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MAY 11, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the west gallery, students from Fonthill public school, Fonthill and St. Francis of Assisi separate school, Toronto.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre), from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's fifth report, which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill No. 73, The Private Investigators and Security Guards Act, 1965.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

MEDICAL SERVICES INSURANCE

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act respecting medical services insurance.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of this matter, I felt that a rather full statement would be appropriate at the time of first reading.

As I present this bill respecting medical services insurance for the consideration of the House, I am quite sure it will be patent to all hon. members that this piece of legislation is not an isolated Act, but rather a further step in a programme of health services which actually began with the life of the province.

The health of our population has always been of concern to government; on the birth of the province, the first government assumed responsibility for the care of patients in already existing mental hospitals, a service which is still provided by the government in a greatly increased and expanded degree.

Then, in the early days of our history, when the life of the population was seriously threatened by epidemics of infectious diseases, government intervention and participation became necessary. This grew into what is now our extensive public health system, which is responsible for many health services, mainly in the field of prevention. Then followed government involvement in school health programmes, and support of tuberculosis patients in sanatoria, with case finding in tuberculosis as a preventive measure, and in the later 1930s the government began direct subsidization of general medical care for those who were then among the great hosts of the unemployed, a programme which grew to provide certain health care services to all in receipt of social assistance.

The real beginning of government participation in an orderly and steadily progressive health care programme came in 1947 when, after an extensive study of health needs of the people of our province, capital grants were first provided for the construction of hospitals for active treatment, convalescent and chronic care. The grants began at $1,000 per bed and doubled to $2,000 per bed in 1958. In 1959, grants on many service areas were added and in 1963 all these grants were still further increased to $3,200 per bed or bed equivalent in service areas. Then, a year ago, as you will recall new low-interest loans were provided as a further incentive to expanding our active treatment hospitals.

All these supports have been of great value in encouraging and helping our people to achieve their goals. However, the greatest single step forward was taken by the government of this province on January 1, 1959, when the Ontario hospital care insurance programme came into operation. Covering more than 90 per cent of the population from its inception, today more than 99 per cent of our people are insured. Indeed, it can be said that to all intents and purposes, all of the people of Ontario are insured against hospital costs. I would emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that this programme was founded on certain principles which have been proven sound, workable and successful—principles from which we have never departed.

These were, and are, that hospital care insurance would be universally available to all, regardless of age or state of health. The services of our hospitals are there for those who need them so long as the need is based upon medical necessity.

Coverage is non-compulsory, except for employee groups, and this was done to ensure continuity of protection for those who, over the years, had had hospital care insurance included in their wage and salary contracts.

So, to sum up, the government has contributed extensively to health services through mental hospitals and clinics; public health and preventive programmes; tuberculosis prevention and treatment; school health programmes; maternal and newborn care; general hospital construction grants; and hospital care insurance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the government of this province proposes a further step forward as provided in the bill I have just introduced.

Within weeks of the introduction of the hospital care insurance programme in 1959, The Department of Health, with other appropriate departments of government, began studies in depth to seek ways of assisting to meet other health care needs. These studies have gone steadily forward in the interim. Although a tremendous volume of data is available concerning health care, standards, quality, quantity, costs and needs, there are, nevertheless, considerable gaps in the information which we should like to have available to us.

For example, we have considerable knowledge regarding those who are insured and those who pay directly for their medical care costs, but we still need to know a good deal about the adequacy of insurance contracts now in force. Again, we have scant knowledge of how much care is provided for those who have no insurance and cannot pay for their health care, nor have we any reliable statistics of the cost of such care. Of course, we could apply national or provincial averages, but there are many factors involved in health care so that, at best, such averages might well be little other than educated guesses.

Then, too, much of the information we have is related to treatment of disease and disability that has already happened, and not nearly enough information about what is involved in the prevention of ill-health.

I know hon. members will appreciate that this is contrary to all the best concepts of health care, but I am equally certain they will appreciate that a health problem must be attacked in the way that will meet the emergency at the time; when the disease is established, then the patient must have treatment. But, going hand in hand with this—or, if this is not possible, then immediately following treatment—methods of prevention must be sought out, developed and instituted. This can be prolonged, difficult and costly, and many authorities are convinced that not nearly enough emphasis has been put on this phase of health care, and that not nearly enough is known about it. Nevertheless, diseases which, a relatively short time ago, were considered to be hopeless of successful response to any treatment are today scarcely heard of, or their management is a simple routine. The doors opening to us by researchers beckon us on to achievement greater by far than anything that has yet come about.

Still, for all this, the immediate needs are evident and the general trend in all states and nations is to provide treatment services.

The division of the health care dollar has quite consistently been shown to be as follows: hospital care highest, followed in order by physician services, dentist services, other health services—lumped together—and prescribed drug services.

Since the first step had been taken, namely, the provision of hospital care insurance, it appeared logical that our next step would be in the area of physicians' services, and that is the purpose, and will be the effect, of this bill.

It is founded on the basic principles originally enunciated in Bill No. 163, the same principles as those upon which our hospital care insurance programme was founded.

We have provided in the bill just introduced that medical services insurance will be:

(1) Available to all, regardless of age, state of past or present health or financial status.

(2) Guaranteed non-cancellable and renewable. All of us are aware that many would provide insurance for themselves but, because of age, or chronic illness, they cannot buy it, or, if they are insured, it is possible that many existing contracts could be cancelled or the carrier might, within the terms of the contract, refuse to renew it. Insurance of this kind is of no use to an individual. Under this Act, this will not be possible.

(3) It will be voluntary. Although many cry for compulsion, an equal or even greater number cry out against it. The records in Ontario show that, given the opportunity, our people do not want, do not like, and would rather not have compulsion.

(4) The cost of standard contract will not exceed a maximum which will be approved by government on recommendation of the advisory council.

(5) (a) It will be available from the carrier of the individual's choice, except: (b) In the case of low income groups, the province will pay in whole or in part for the standard contract. This part of the programme will be administered by the government, through a division of The Department of Health to be set up and to be known as the medical services division.

This division will be housed in the building occupied by the Ontario hospital services commission, and the technical personnel and facilities of the commission will be used. However, the commission, as such, will not be involved in either the policy-making or the operation of the programme.

This means that in the case of those who need assistance to meet the cost of those physician's services, the government will directly administer the public funds used to pay these costs.

Herein is the greatest departure from the original proposals in Bill No. 163, and also from the proposals of the Hagey committee. It will be recalled that in both these instances, those who required partial assistance were to be permitted to secure coverage from the carrier of their choice. This, I repeat, will no longer obtain. For those who are wholly or partially assisted by the government, there will be one carrier, a division of The Department of Health, and to these people will be issued a standard contract.

Mr. Speaker, I should like next to deal with the question of who will receive total or partial assistance.

For a long time now, personal income has been considered an acceptable measure of one's ability to meet the normal costs of everyday living, and certain scales of income have been set by government as being sufficient to meet those costs. Income over and above these levels has been, and is, subject to personal income tax. It has been argued that those who had sufficient income to have money taken away from them by government by taxation, could hardly claim at the same time, by government definition, to be eligible to have money returned to them. While agreeing in principle with this thesis, we believe that those with taxable income of up to $1,000 require assistance in such matters as meeting the costs of medical care.

On the basis, we propose to continue to use taxable income as a measure of the need to be assisted. The bill therefore provides:

(a) That those of our citizens who are in receipt of incomes not great enough to be subject to income tax shall be covered by a standard contract without charge. For these people, the entire cost will be provided by the province.

(b) That those persons in low-income categories will be able to obtain, on application, a standard contract at a premium geared to the broadly accepted principle of their ability to pay. In other words, persons whose incomes are so low that they pay little income tax will receive assistance in securing standard contracts. A table, illustrative of how this would operate, will be placed on the record, I will not take the time of the House to read it now.

It will be noted that here, too, we have deviated from the Hagey recommendations by providing full coverage for all non-income tax-paying persons and a graded level of support for others rather than the premium percentage as proposed.

Hon. members will no doubt be interested in the numbers likely to be involved. Again, this is difficult to ascertain with any degree of accuracy. It is impossible, of course, to know who may choose not to prepay or have prepaid his medical care costs, and we do not subscribe at this time to compulsion. It is difficult, even with all the information available to us, to know who in the non-taxable or the lower taxable groups are already well provided for by group contracts through their employment.

We do know that Ontario is the province with the highest ratio of voluntary medical insurance in Canada. Some 76.5 per cent are already covered, and a further 7.3 per cent have special coverage, so that some 83.8 per cent of the people of Ontario are covered at the present time.

We have assumed, however, for practical consideration, that all who are eligible would apply for standard contracts. On this basis, we have some 978,000 non-income-tax payers and 847,000 with taxable income up to $1,000. These may be sub-divided as follows:

	No. of single persons and families	No. of people covered
Non-income-tax paying groups	462,361	977,869
Taxable income $500 or under	156,424	378,195
Taxable income $500 - $1,000	157,879	437,654

This means that a total of approximately 1,800,000—over 25 per cent—of our people, are likely to be totally or partially supported.

It will thus be seen that, with nearly 84 per cent of our people already insured, and this provision made for a number in excess of 25 per cent of the population, the 16 per cent coverage gap in Ontario may well be covered. I would make clear, however, that this postulation does not follow naturally. I would repeat what I have already said—we do not know how many of our people, for any one of a variety of reasons, may elect not to seek medical services insurance, but we have reason to believe that the provisions of this bill are amply adequate to assure that the needs of our people will be met.

The estimated cost of the public Treasury of the programme I have outlined is $70 million in its first full year of operation.

What will be provided by the standard contract? The contract is designed to meet the needs for physicians' services, medical, surgical and obstetrical, in the home, office and hospital, from the physician of the patients' choice. After the contract has been in effect continuously for 12 months, one annual physical examination per member, and psychiatric services up to 25 hours per year for an individual, and 50 hours per year for a family, will be available as insured services.

The programme is founded on a general physician service and the benefits will be at the general physician tariff of the Ontario medical association. If, in the judgment of the physician, referral to a specialist is indicated, the contract will provide payment of the specialist at the OMA specialist tariff. It is the stated policy of the Ontario medical association that "the stated tariff is to be considered the fee schedule that will be used for physicians' services."

There will be no interference with the patient's choice of doctor or the doctor's choice of patient.

In the case of those supported by government, it is hoped doctors will bill the department directly for services, but they may, if they choose, bill the patient, who will be reimbursed according to the schedule for the services rendered.

As I have already stated, the Act will be administered by a new division of The Department of Health. It will be headed by an executive director and it is intended to set up an advisory group of nine persons, to be known as the medical services insurance council to represent the public (five members), the medical profession (two members) and the insurance carriers (two members).

The council will advise on maximum premiums, open enrollment periods, the form and content of standard contracts and, indeed, on all things related to the programme. It will also hear all complaints and advise upon their settlement.

Provision is made in the Act for prompt assistance to anyone becoming unemployed, so that he will never be out of benefits.

Coverage will be provided in the standard contract for unmarried children, totally dependent up to the age of 21 years, in keeping with the provisions of the income tax regulation.

It is intended that this programme will come into operation June 1, 1966, following an open enrollment period. A vigorous publicity and advertising campaign is being planned, by which it is hoped to make all our people fully aware of the programme and to encourage those who are eligible for assistance to submit an application.

Mr. Speaker, I fully anticipate that there will be argument that everyone should be compelled to come under our standard plan, and that this is the only equitable and workable way in which complete and adequate medical services coverage can be attained.

This really boils down to a difference in basic philosophies. Some believe that government should regiment the people, deciding what is best for them and imposing that decision upon them by compulsion. Others, and we subscribe to this, believe the same objective can be attained without compulsion.

We believe we have proven this in our experience with hospital care insurance. Our studies, which have been extensive in this matter of medical services insurance, would indicate that if every province did what we now propose, there would be no insurance gap left. We have, in these calculations, considered the partial plans, and, even excluding or ignoring them entirely, have concluded that complete coverage could be attained by providing for the non-taxable groups in the population. If, as is proposed by this bill, assistance were provided for those in the low tax brackets, we certainly believe the gap could be closed.

Surely we have had clear and unmistakable evidence that compulsion brings in its wake many and great problems. Scarcely a month passes in which we do not read of the difficulties arising in nations and states where compulsory schemes have been introduced and imposed upon the people. France, Belgium, Italy; all have had serious difficulties within recent months with services not available because doctors were on strike. Britain is presently facing serious trouble with the plan there. Need I remind hon. members of what happened in Saskatchewan?

No doubt it will be held by some that, "we have not gone far enough."

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Will the member state his point of order?

Mr. MacDonald: I state my point of order, and it is twofold.

One, this government has seen fit to bring in this bill in violation of the rules of the House. The rules of the House state, as to be found on page 112 of Alex Lewis, namely:

39. Two days notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address for the appointment of any committee, etc.

For some reason or other, the government in its final decisions made them so hastily that it has brought this bill in without conforming with the rules of the House.

My second point of order, Mr. Speaker, is this: It is one thing to give a short explanatory statement on first reading, which the rules permit when there is going to be no debate. It is another thing for the hon. Minister to get up and to indulge in highly controversial political debate when we on this side of the House are going to have no opportunity to say anything until second reading comes.

Now I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the original introduction of the bill was out of order because the government has not conformed with the rules, and the hon. Minister is becoming more and more out of order the longer he proceeds.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to point out that it is customary for any person, a Minister or member, to give intention of introducing a bill. A period of, I believe, 48 hours, is required. If anyone had stood in his place today and objected to this bill being introduced, of course I would not have allowed it to be introduced and would have taken it as notice and allowed the Minister to introduce it on Thursday. But since no one objected to the introduction of the bill, it has been customary to accept that as being unanimous consent of the House. Therefore, since the bill has now been introduced, we will have to proceed with it.

I perhaps would agree with the member who has brought up the point of order that perhaps this past paragraph would have been better left out of the Minister's presentation; but since we are near the end of it, I would ask him to proceed and finish.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I must take full responsibility, sir, for introducing this bill without giving notice of motion. I thought I had crossed all the "t's," dotted all the "i's," and I crave your indulgence, sir. When no one objected when I did propose the reading, I took it that I had unanimous approval of the House; and I said at the outset, sir, that because of the high importance of the matter I felt that it merited a lengthier than usual statement.

Mr. MacDonald: An explanation is one thing and a political speech is another.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: If the shoe began to pinch, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. members had better see the doctor and get their feet fixed.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: No doubt then, Mr. Speaker, it will be held by some that we have not gone far enough.

I am almost finished.

There are those who will not be satisfied with anything short of a total health care plan imposed upon all of our people by compulsion. I have already mentioned compulsion, so let us look at the other part of the argument.

I can shout the hon. members down, if they want to indulge in a match.

Mr. Speaker: Order! I would ask the members for order.

Will the Minister proceed.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: While we all agree that it is desirable to aim for a programme of full, high quality health care for our people, the methods of attaining this goal may very well vary. Only experience can tell us which, if any, is better than all others.

But we who are charged with the responsibility of government must determine how the goal is to be achieved. All political parties in this House have admitted, at some time or other, that a programme of this magnitude must be phased. With this we agree and this we are doing.

This, I submit sir, is but another and logical step forward in a progressive programme aiming at our common objective.

But in such planning, priorities must be determined and established. It would be pointless, for instance, to say we were providing payment of physicians' services if there were not enough physicians to provide the service.

I need not remind you that government cannot practise medicine. There are many who tell us we have a shortage of doctors; albeit Ontario, with one doctor to 776 population, has one of the highest doctor population ratios on the continent. This is bettered only by five nations in the world. Nevertheless, we recognize the need for great numbers of well trained personnel and this shortage must be met before we can lead our people to believe that a full-scale programme is possible. We must put first things first, and this we are doing.

After much study and planning, this government last October announced a massive programme of support to help university teaching hospitals to update and expand their facilities so that greater numbers of professional and technical people could be qualified to meet the needs of our people. We have now added to that a programme of expansion of schools of nursing which will be laid before the House later in the session. The greater part of this by far must be financed by the province alone, the while providing for all the other expanding services required and demanded by a rapidly growing province.

So it is, Mr. Speaker, that the programme proposed in this bill cannot be taken as an isolated one. Rather, I submit, it must be read as an important and logical step forward in the context of all that has been done, is now being done and is envisioned for the future for the well-being of our people.

The total cost of the programme for expanding facilities announced last October was of the order of $120 million. Schools of nursing may well add a further $30 million to this; and with the programme provided by this bill costing an estimated $70 million, the total will exceed $200 million. That money must be found by the province, since to date the federal government has not offered any assistance.

No, Mr. Speaker, we have not said, nor do we yet say, this is the end, the last word in health care insurance.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): It is not even a good beginning.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It is but one further step forward in a long and progressive programme which has as its ultimate objective health care of the highest quality possible, available to all of our people respecting, of course, the right of the individual to determine if he wishes to avail himself of that service.

We believe, sir, this is a worthwhile step, and I heartily commend this bill to the serious consideration of the House.

Mr. Bryden: Worthwhile only for insurance companies.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Although this is not the time for questions, we have had a little bit of flexibility in our business today and I am sure that the member would be in order to ask a question.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Trotter: Could the hon. Minister give the House some idea of what the premiums for a family will be under the proposed scheme?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Trotter: Has the hon. Minister any idea? Does he bring in a plan and have no idea?

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): On the last page.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

THE MUNICIPALITY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are half a dozen or eight amendments to The Metropolitan Toronto Act. They deal with matters relating to assessment, transfer of pension benefits, and they also deal with the question of the operation of a system of the Toronto transit commission on Steeles Avenue. It has been found that the TTC may operate a transportation system on Steeles Avenue, but only on one side of the street because the dividing line between two municipalities is now in the centre of the road.

A matter of tax exemptions relate to land acquired for the subway extension and a number of other items similar to that, and include also authority to the metropolitan council to make a number of grants to various charitable organizations and also to the widow of the late John Blank; and also a grant of $12,000 to the Metropolitan Toronto convention and visitor association towards the cost of publishing a film.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Before the orders of the day, Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), notice of which has been given him.

Will steps be taken toward having Ontario represented in Detroit on June 15, when the governors' conference in regard to pollution in Lake Erie which met in Cleveland yesterday, reconvenes?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the meeting being planned for Detroit on June 15, as I am informed, is not a continuation of the meeting held in Cleveland but is another in a series of meetings that are being convened by various jurisdictions and authorities that are interested in this problem. The meeting yesterday was termed the Governors' conference on Great Lakes pollution and was convened by the governor of the state of Ohio in Cleveland, the hon. James A. Rhodes. Now Governor Rhodes wrote to this province and asked if we would send a representative and Mr. K. H. Sharpe, who is one of the assistant general managers of the Ontario water resources commission, attended that meeting. If we are invited to Detroit I can assure the House that we will be there.

Mr. Young: The press report stated that we were not there yesterday.

One further question to the hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Will the government make representation to have the current terms of reference of the international joint commission widened to include consideration of the Kierans plan to divert water from the James Bay watershed to the Great Lakes?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, this question also calls for something more than a straight yes or no answer. The Kierans plan is one of several that are under study and that are aimed at controlling the range and stage of the levels of the Great Lakes and making greater volumes of water available for domestic and industrial requirements, reducing pollution and so on.

This government, through the Ontario water resources commission, is carrying out certain investigations and studies covering all these areas in order that we may be in a better position to determine what course of action we might take here.

I would say this, that the international joint commission really deals with border waterways only and the Kierans plan has this inception not on an international border but perhaps in the Ottawa river, and it overlaps into Quebec. What I have done—

Mr. Young: But it deals with water levels!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes, it deals with levels, but the basic function of the international joint commission, and perhaps in this respect it might not be a fully effective body, has been to deal with boundary waters such as the Detroit River, the St. Clair River, the St. Lawrence River, and so on. This is where it has traditionally operated during the 50-odd years in which it has been in effect. It may not be that something like the Kierans plan would come within its terms of reference; these are closely laid down, because it has to take instruction from agreement by both federal levels of government. In other words, they must agree upon what is going to be referred to the international joint commission before it starts to function. At this stage of the game, I am not certain how interested the federal government of the United States is in the Kierans plan. There are several other plans of a similar nature being discussed in North America today, but I would say that I have asked that the subject of national water problems, as I think they might be most aptly described in Canada, be placed on the agenda for the forthcoming federal-provincial conference which will convene on the 31st of this month, in order that we may be able to institute studies into these matters, because the Kierans plan concerns not only this province; it really is a national project.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett).

Now that a number of 30-day options placed by the special tribunal investigating properties under expropriation for the Pittock dam have been permitted to lapse, can the hon. Minister report on what solution has been achieved in this situation?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for York South, may I say that I met yesterday with the chairman and several members of the executive of the Upper Thames River conservation authority to discuss this matter. Arising out of this meeting, certain proposals are now being considered by the authority. As a result, I shall not be in a position to reveal the course of the discussion or the proposals until the authority has had an opportunity of considering them fully and of reaching certain decisions.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The ninth order.

THE CHILD WELFARE ACT, 1965

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare) moves second reading of Bill No. 119, The Child Welfare Act, 1965.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on Bill 119. We would like to stress this afternoon that there is basic agreement in our party with the purposes and principles expressed in this bill. Child welfare is most important to develop a mentally and physically healthy population that Ontario needs if it is to continue on its march toward better living conditions for all. A comprehensive child welfare plan contributes not only to the mental and physical health of Ontario, but to the eventual spiritual and material well-being of the province as a whole.

Basically, the bill we have before us this afternoon is a good one, but it has been far too late in coming and it is still somewhat incomplete in scope. The Liberal Party of Ontario has urged the government of this province to enact more comprehensive child welfare legislation for some time. Finally, we have been presented with this bill, which is painfully lacking in many measures necessary to ensure even adequate child welfare services in the province of Ontario.

A comprehensive child welfare legislation must do at least six things. It must provide:

1. Preventive measures—methods by which the child can be cared for within the environment of his natural family. This is of primary importance.

2. It must provide for the protective care of neglected children.

3. It must deal with the supervision of foster children, and attempt to encourage the adoption of children into normal family environment.

4. It must arrange for the supervision of child welfare institutions.

5. It must provide a framework of co-ordination and integration within which child welfare agencies can function to their maximum potential.

6. It must accept the responsibility for some measure of after care; that is, provision to help children make the difficult transition from institutional society back to normal society with as little tension and friction as possible.

A child is a person with rights, capacities and tremendous individual potential. We firmly believe that this potential can be developed within the environment of the natural family and we are pleased to see that the government has acknowledged this by giving to the children's aid societies the responsibility to provide guidance, counselling and other services to families for the prevention of neglect of children. The 1961 report to the hon. Minister of Public Welfare emphasized the need for preventive services and states:

In many instances the parents also require intensive and skilled help because of psychological and social difficulties.

It is evident that many children now in care could have been helped to remain in their own homes, while others might have returned home much sooner. Preventive measures, based on the principle that removal of a child from his natural environment must be only as a final resort, have been in effect in Denmark for at least six years. In Finland, preventive measures were introduced in legislation in 1936; according to a review of child welfare, published in 1959, they have become so efficient that the children who are removed from their natural families are done so only for serious reasons, and so receive more and better attention. This is the way it should be. The principle of the unity of the family was embodied in The Child Welfare Act of 1953 in Norway and we are pleased to see that the government of Ontario has finally decided to acknowledge this concept in 1965—12 years after Norway did it, and 29 years after Finland.

I would like to point out, however, that recognizing the need for and value of preventive measures is not enough. To establish such basic measures as the 1964 report of the advisory committee on child welfare recommends will cost a great deal of money, and provision has not been made for this in the present bill. Such basic services embody the concept of family welfare as opposed to the narrower concept of child welfare and should include homemakers' services, child guidance and psychiatric treatment services, special education and employment facilities and day care services for children.

The report of the advisory committee on child welfare recommends that these basic services be financed entirely from public funds, but the legislation we have before us does not guarantee any such financial arrangement. The bill is vague in this area, where we feel it should be very specific.

The 1964 report recommended that funds from private sources be used mostly to pioneer new services and provide more specialized services, but according to Mr. Lloyd Richardson, the director of the Metro Toronto children's aid society, funds for prevention would still have to come from voluntary services.

We agree with the report of the government's advisory committee in this matter and feel that the government should not stop at recognizing the need for preventive measures, but should guarantee at least a specified percentage of the funds to meet the cost of such measures.

The second point on which I would like to speak is the actual care of neglected children. The bill sets out very explicitly procedures for committing neglected children to children's aid societies; but once they are placed in these societies, what happens to them? Institutions in Ontario are overcrowded and not sufficiently differentiated. At the end of 1963 there were approximately 3,050 children receiving service in 27 institutions. This is an average of some 112 children per institution over the course of a year.

What are the effects of the institutionalization and regimentation on the individual child? Neglected children, more than any others, require individual attention. The 1961 report on institutional needs states that:

Institutions should be so organized as to limit numbers in any living unit to assure development of the most normal relationship possible.

Now, how normal can these relationships be when 60 or 70 children are in the same institution and are treated by not enough staff and insufficiently trained staff?

But institutions are not the only place where overcrowding occurs. The courts are terribly overcrowded. The children's aid societies have reported that on April 1 of this year the average time that children have to wait for court orders was from six to eight weeks.

Overcrowding is a real problem and is reflected again in foster homes. The 1961 report on institutional needs stresses the existence of a substantial quantity of unmet needs for institutional care; and the 1964 report maintains that the foster care programme for permanent wards is characterized by too many substandard foster homes. The study of permanent wards included in this report indicated that the average ward in the 11 to 15 age group had already been placed in 4.8 foster homes. Now, what effect does this have on the mental stability of the child? It certainly cannot be beneficial.

The 1961 committee on institutions concluded:

It is clear that no complete pattern of services to children exists and it is believed that legislation to control foster family and institutional care of children is not adequate.

What we have in services has "Topsied" up as needs were exposed and as government or citizen groups were prepared to take on the challenge. This has resulted in needs that are not covered, a great variety of standards and several pieces of legislation which are inconsistent in their provision for standards and controls.

We appreciate that the government is finally taking measures to correct this by regulating standards, but simple regulation of standards is not enough. Facilities must be provided for adequate training of staff and funds must be provided to ensure that staff and institutions will be available whenever and wherever the need arises. In line with this, we feel that the number of children's aid societies possibly should be reduced in line with the recommendation made in the government's advisory committee report and more attention be given to regional allocation of children's aid societies and welfare services generally.

Also, we would recommend that positive steps be taken in the near future to ensure that there are enough trained personnel available to maintain this new programme.

The 1961 report on institutional needs recommended that institutions should provide a minimum total full-time staff of one to each three children in care, and at no time should there be more than 10 children under the supervision of one worker. Staff workers are currently working under exceedingly heavy case loads. The 1964 report of the government's advisory committee points out that the average monthly case load per field worker is 404 cases.

We stress again that it is the children who suffer in these cases. It is false economy indeed for any agency or authority to expect or anticipate the best results from unqualified or unsupervised staff.

At the end of 1963, children's aid societies offered positions for 950 social workers. Fifty of these were unfilled; and of the 900, only one in four had any formal social work education. The most enlightened legislation regarding child welfare—which this is not by any means—will still not work if provisions to supply adequately trained personnel are lacking. We remind the government of this in their attempt to take positive steps to ensure the beneficial treatment of the neglected children of Ontario.

The next point I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, is one regarding co-ordination. This bill was introduced to remedy a lack of co-ordination and integration in provincial welfare services. It has succeeded in many respects, but in others it is still lacking. It is a fact, and a sad fact, that children who present themselves in certain places tend to get certain forms of care. The 1961 report on institutional needs made this clear when it concluded that children who come before the courts are likely to go to training schools—those who come to certain mental health clinics, to mental hospitals; those known to child care agencies, to treatment centres, and so on.

Now these various institutions are under the jurisdiction of different ministries of this government. For the mentally ill or emotionally disturbed, care is provided in Ontario hospitals and in Ontario hospital schools under The Department of Health; for delinquent children, in training schools, under

The Department of Reform Institutions; and for deaf and blind children, under The Department of Education. The problem of integrating interdepartmental areas of jurisdiction to provide maximum benefit to the individual child is most important, and we regret that the government took no action to try to integrate the various departments in the interests of child welfare.

The last point I would like to touch on, Mr. Speaker, is aftercare facilities. This is an area of child welfare which has been completely neglected in previous legislation and to our great disappointment in the present bill. The difficulties in child welfare are by no means solved when young persons are discharged from an institution. The transition from institutional life to normal life in society will often be painful. Without good and effective aftercare, institutional treatment cannot have its full value. We feel that the government has a definite responsibility in this area.

In Sweden, the government accepts this responsibility by building apprentice homes in hospitals, where discharges can live while reorienting themselves in society.

In Finland, one of the aspects of aftercare is the child welfare committee's duty to appoint a supervisory guardian for the child, to supervise the young person and assist him with help and guidance. The Child Welfare Act of Finland also contains a provision ordering the child welfare committee to grant financial aid to young persons until age 23, if necessary.

We feel that in a progressive province like ours, similar realization and acceptance of responsibility towards discharges should be forthcoming. We firmly believe that without sufficient aftercare, much of the value of child welfare will be lost; we regret that the government did not see fit to include appropriate measures for aftercare in this legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we again agree with the purposes and principles of the legislation, but we are disappointed that it has come so late, and that it still lacks so much. We feel that child welfare legislation should be as comprehensive as possible and we are afraid that the lack of a guarantee of funds for preventive work, the lack of arrangements for interdepartmental co-ordination, the lack of provisions for adequate staff and the lack of suitable arrangements for aftercare unnecessarily endanger a successful child welfare programme in Ontario.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member of the Liberal Party who just spoke, and this party, are about to part company on many counts.

I find the general public response to this new Child Welfare Act an exceedingly curious one. It is, I suggest, both ambivalent and uncritical—ambivalent in the sense that there was an initial outburst of enthusiasm from various groups—I can think of children's aid societies in particular. Shortly thereafter, rather vigorous retrenchment and great reservations were expressed as the more fundamental principles of the Act came under scrutiny. It is my feeling that the children's aid societies were, by and large, so glad to be alive when this Act came in that, having taken that initial gasp of breath, they only later began to look at it and to express the concern that was contained in their press release, and what I am sure will be subsequent statements.

It was uncritical in this sense, Mr. Speaker, that the Act is so complex in some respects that we tended to accept the explanatory notes which accompanied it. As the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) pointed out in another connotation a few days ago, the explanatory notes accompanying Acts can be seriously deceptive and misleading; I want to suggest that that is what happened in this case.

It was also uncritical in its reception, Mr. Speaker, because the public, by and large, was so gratified at finally having a child welfare Act, which was supposed to be substantial—there had been so much heralded observation about three years of committee study—that everyone again gasped in appreciation and accepted the Act at face value.

Mr. Speaker, in large part we embrace an illusion. This Child Welfare Act, I suggest to the hon. Minister, is an impressive façade which conceals worrying implications. It is time to break the pattern of total commendation in this Legislature and to scrutinize some of the serious principles involved.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there are such glaring deficiencies in this Act that this party had to wrestle carefully with the prospect of supporting it in principle, which we will do, because any child welfare legislation is necessarily crucial and valuable and takes a step forward. But there are features so inadequate and retrogressive that in two or three fundamental respects we have to state our reservations without qualification. It is again, if I may put it to the hon. Minister, the ever-frustrating experience of the intent of legislation being undermined either by the Act itself or by the regulations which accompany it.

Let us refer back to this advisory committee report as a starting point. At the outset of this report, the hon. Minister, in his foreword, indicated that there were 14 major recommendations. Those are his words; major recommendations. I want to pull out one of those recommendations. I will read it; No. 12:

That continued emphasis be placed on expanding and improving the quality of adoption services.

I want to eliminate that because it is not easy to embrace in legislation, and I shall leave us with 13 major recommendations, if I am permitted to do so.

Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the 13 major recommendations which the hon. Minister outlined, three have been adopted in toto, four have been adopted in qualified part and six have been rejected by this government. I strongly suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that any government which pretends to a child welfare Act that is supposed to reflect three years' study of an advisory committee, cannot make those pretensions stand in this Legislature when almost 50 per cent of the recommendations are rejected, and another half or more of the remainder are accepted only in part.

Let us take a look at some of those recommendations and subject them to partial analysis.

The focal principle of this Act, Mr. Speaker, is the question of Crown guardianship. Of course, to the members of the New Democratic Party and to the members of the official Opposition as a whole, that is a fully acceptable proposition. If the hon. Minister will allow me to be colloquial, I will say that it introduces into Ontario society that happy image of Papa Louis, if I may put it that way; Papa Louis is well suited to the role, Mr. Speaker. He is warm, kindly, honourable, and bilingual; I cannot think of any greater paternity for 14,000 permanent wards in the province of Ontario.

Papa Louis has only one serious drawback; he is handicapped by a severe case of congenital and hereditary conservatism. That, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, undermines a lot of what the kindly, paternal hon. Minister opposite would wish to do. The Crown accepts the final and ultimate responsibility for those children—and let it be said at this point, if I can deflect my own remarks, Mr. Speaker, we assume that the hon. Minister accepts such responsibility. He is in fact the guardian, and when one of those 14,000 children falls into trouble we in the Opposition are going to come into this House and say, "It is your child, Mr. Minister; what are you doing about his plight?" There are a vast number of children in this province for whom that question can obtain, and I assume that the hon. Minister will give sufficient reply at the time.

There is no question that sound guardianship, therefore, properly falls in provincial hands; and there is no question also that it may encourage a certain uniformity of standards across the province in children's aid societies—although let it be said, Mr. Speaker, that we do not know, because standards are left to the regulations and the regulations are not published. But the entire rationale of Crown guardianship is based on the premise that the care and custody for these children will be adequately provided; and the entire onus in this bill is placed on children's aid societies without any accompanying guarantee that they can do the job; and that is, after all, the test of Crown guardianship.

Let me quote from the speech by Professor Spencer of the school of social work to the child welfare league conference. He said:

However necessary the place of the clear legal and administrative framework of guardianship may be, it is the spirit and the manner in which the legislation is carried out that are ultimately the determining factors.

To do justice, therefore, to the subject of guardianship, we are in reality compelled to examine within a broad context the standards and practices in child welfare in a community.

The committee itself—

referring to the advisory committee:

—clearly foresaw that the very process of transferring responsibility from 55 children's aid societies to the Crown, in practice to the Minister of Public Welfare for Ontario, would mean that these societies—the children's aid societies:

—would immediately declare the inadequacy of their resources to care for certain children. Thus they will now have greater justification for expecting the province to make available the necessary resources.

Now will Papa Louis make those resources available?

Well, the strength of guardianship, Mr. Speaker, being contingent on financial arrangements, it is worth, I think, analyzing those financial arrangements; and that is precisely what I should like to do for the next few minutes. But I want to point out initially that the financial arrangements as embraced in this Act run counter—now I cannot say this strongly enough—run counter to everything we understand by modern concepts of child welfare, and they in no sense fulfil the recommendations of the advisory committee. So let us take a look at them.

I am going to move slowly because sometimes I myself find it difficult to grasp; I will happily stand corrected by the hon. Minister if he wishes at any point to intercede with an explanation.

At the outset, because I think it is worthwhile, Mr. Speaker, let us clear up one of the illusions; the illusion about unwed mothers. I want to say to this Legislature something that some hon. members do not realize because of all the fanfare related to the Act.

This Act does not pay 100 per cent of the cost for services to unmarried mothers and their children. That was the recommendation of the advisory committee, they made that recommendation; but this Act does not do this. This Act pays 100 per cent of the cost for children born out of wedlock who subsequently come into the care, as we understand it, of children's aid societies. That is the only area to which the 100 per cent figure applies. It does not cover services to the mother during the period of pregnancy, during the period of confinement, during the period immediately after confinement. Those services, handled now, as many of them are through children's aid societies, are not within the ken of the 100 per cent fanfare that we heard. Those are still left to the original arrangements, the 60-40 split which presently prevails.

Nor, Mr. Speaker, does the 100 per cent formula apply to the children of unwed mothers, which children the mothers are attempting to keep in their homes without putting them into a foster home or up for adoption. They will have to maintain themselves on the present inadequate basis of general welfare assistance for three months and then, if they are fortunate, mother's allowance after that. Again there is no substantial relief whatsoever.

That 100 per cent figure, about which we heard so much, applies only to the children in care. I mention that at some length, Mr. Speaker, because it is important to point out that this means very little relief for the municipalities indeed; in fact, marginal relief. The argument was that this would save the municipalities a degree of money, where they would say with largesse that they were now prepared to expand their programme into other fields.

In fact, it is so marginal that it will not allow them to expand their programmes in other fields, it will simply take the pressure off. It is a good example of the illusory and misleading nature of most of the financial arrangements under this Act. The province implies great savings; the savings, in fact, do not exist.

Let me turn to the fundamental provisions, and before outlining them, let me take a moment to indicate what now exists. The children's aid societies presently receive most of their money in two ways; in fact, perhaps all of their moneys for a good many of the societies. There is a per diem payment for children in care; and that is a 60 per cent municipality, 40 per cent province split.

Second, there are special and voluntary and very small grants from municipalities for so-called "protection services"; that is, services in the home designed to protect the child from a degree of neglect so serious that it would warrant eventual separation. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the amount of money now spent across the board on protection purposes is only about 16 per cent to 17 per cent of total children's aid societies' budget, so you can see that the per diem payment was the crucial payment.

Now, what happens under the new Act to these methods of financing children's aid societies? Well, the children's aid society will establish a projected budget in negotiation with one or more municipalities incorporating requirements for first, care; and second, protection. Then of that total budget the municipality will have to undertake 60 per cent of the cost, the province will undertake 40 per cent. That is the basic provision.

The second provision is that within this total projected budget there can now be some moneys laid aside for preventive services. Now what do preventive services mean? They mean that even before neglect is evident, the children's aid society can step in and give some assistance, because if they do not it is likely that the circumstances will deteriorate and the children thereafter may need either protection or specific care.

Now let us say something about these preventive services right at the outset. They are all permissive, Mr. Speaker. The preventive services are not mandatory under this Act. And let no one mistake it. I read section 6 of the Act, subsection 2, part (g), where it outlines the areas within which the children's aid society shall provide services and then says:

And subject to the regulations—which are not printed!

—may be operated for the purpose of providing guidance, counselling and other services to families for the prevention of neglected children.

Now, Mr. Speaker, through you to the hon. Minister, everyone in this House knows, when he is honest with himself, that the state of municipal financing today does not allow the embracing of permissive legislation with any kind of enthusiasm. This has been evident in the whole field of protection services; it will not be transferred to preventive services. The hon. Minister is sorely delinquent in this particular for having left the entire area of preventive services on a permissive basis.

The children's aid societies will be the first to say that this is the crucial and fundamental area of their work—more fundamental, in a sense, than the precise services they otherwise handle. The reason this government finds itself in so much financial difficulty so much of the time is because we place onerous responsibility on agencies to hold a patchwork society together when, if we caught the ills at the root moment, those subsequent extremities would not arise.

On the surface, Mr. Speaker, returning to the basic budget features of care and protection, this is a step forward and seems to be an acceptable proposition. But I want to suggest to the hon. Minister that there are so many serious qualifications to this 60-40 formula that the entire principle is virtually nullified. Let me try to put them in order.

Point 1: It is the municipality that governs the amount. It will pay 60 per cent of what it agrees to negotiate and accept as an overall figure. For the first time in child welfare legislation, that part of the municipality's power is, in effect, also permissive. The total figure is negotiated with children's aid societies and, of that figure, municipalities will pay 60 per cent.

I point out to you that that is a dramatic departure. Up to now, Mr. Speaker, the municipalities have been paying 60 per cent of a mandatory figure set by a court order, not by themselves. The only appeal the municipalities had from the previous basis was to go to some kind of appeal court and say they did not agree with the arithmetical calculation—but they still had to pay the 60 per cent. The only grounds for appeal was inaccurate arithmetic. The rate for care, as well as for protection, will depend entirely on a figure of the municipality's choosing. If the hon. Minister opposite says he will give them regulations which spell it out, let it be pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister himself anticipates trouble. The only reason we have a child welfare review board to arbitrate is because the municipalities have a right to set the figure of which they will pay 60 per cent.

Point 2, Mr. Speaker: The director of a children's aid society in any given area must negotiate separately—first it will be behind the scenes, then it will be across the table—with every municipality to which a portion of the total budget is referable. In the case of children's aid societies in the province of Ontario, as the advisory committee report pointed out, they incorporate many municipalities. What you are really asking in this Act is that directors of children's aid societies should turn into full-time politicians, doing nothing but negotiating behind the scenes for the budget of which, if they are fortunate, they will receive 60 per cent.

Point 3, Mr. Speaker: The advisory committee never contemplated such a principle. I cannot emphasize that strongly enough. The advisory committee which met for three years, and on whose recommendations this Act is supposedly based, never contemplated such a principle nor, for that matter, such a low provincial contribution. That is equally important. Let me quote from the advisory committee report, page 25.

The committee recognized early in its deliberations that the relative willingness of municipalities to participate financially differed because of varying financial capacities and a wide variation in attitude and understanding of local child welfare needs and problems.

Father Bauer, in his dissent, said:

The value sense of local government stems primarily from the right of property rather than the right of persons.

But the hon. Minister is willing to entrust child welfare in the province to the rights of property. There was some ancient and glorious figure of the left wing who said that property was theft; in terms of the deprivation for children under this Act, that may well be a prophetic saying.

The committee, Mr. Speaker, advocated a formula which would take into consideration the following facts: the needs of the area; the fiscal capacity of the local authority; and the financial effort being made locally by the municipalities themselves. Then the advisory committee recommended that the province will pay an absolute minimum of 50 per cent and probably more. They would have been startled into revolt by a suggestion of an across-the-board 60-40 split, with the onus on the municipalities to provide the 60 per cent and with the authority in municipal hands to establish the overall figure of which that 60 per cent was a part.

Point 4, Mr. Speaker: A brief, submitted to the hon. Minister from the Ontario welfare council in February of this year—and approved by their distinguished board on which sit members of his staff—anticipated the results of this Act. They went much further, and I want to quote from them. Pages 6 and 7 of the report:

The services required by children and their families today are costly. This is so not only because of inflationary trends but because of the nature of the services required to deal with the difficult and complex problems referred to earlier. It is important that we recognize and accept this if we are to meet the needs of the children. Traditionally, these costs have been shared between the province and the municipality. Increasingly there are questions as to the appropriateness of these services being charged to the municipality.

That is the Ontario welfare council, Mr. Speaker, which goes on to say this:

The implications of the recommendations of your committee are for a generally enlarged and costlier programme for reasons already made clear. The reflected costs to the municipalities resulting from these increases may well leave them in a position of little or no relief and therefore tend to renew their questioning and resulting resistance. It is our experience that despite provision for equal sharing of costs for other services, such as homemaker and day care, many municipalities have declared that they are unable or unwilling to provide these. For these reasons we feel that provincial financial responsibility for protection in child care, as well as for the other essential family services, should be at a level which will ensure that the financial consideration does not hinder local communities in providing good services.

I emphasize this final reflection of theirs:

For this reason we feel that the municipal share should be nominal.

“Should be nominal”; but not only is the municipal share not nominal, it is 60 per cent of the cost and it is 60 per cent of a figure—again I emphasize—which they determine. I re-emphasize that they determine, Mr. Speaker, because I do not think there is another piece of legislation of this government which gives the municipalities the power over child welfare that this gives them.

Indeed, even under general welfare assistance your split is 80-20, with the municipalities paying 20 per cent, not 60 per cent. Surely child welfare should be considered of equal character.

Why this concern over the 60 per cent that is given to the municipalities, and their right to determine it? For a simple reason, Mr. Speaker, which leads me to point 5.

Let us be frank and honest with each other. The municipalities are showing increasing resistance to financial aid for child welfare. At precisely the point when the Minister puts a burden on them so severe that they cannot possibly respond in adequate measure, events demonstrate that the municipalities are unwilling to respond even to the conditions that presently prevail.

Look at what happened to the Metro children's aid society not so long ago—this year in fact. Metropolitan Toronto council refused them the request for 42 additional workers in the protection field, and told them that they could relate their budget to a 5 per cent increase across the board. The 5 per cent increase, Mr. Speaker, bore no relationship to child welfare needs; it bore relationship only to what Metropolitan Toronto council felt that it could absorb.

Take a look at our juvenile and family courts structure. Everyone remembers that the juvenile and family court was cut $100,000 by metropolitan council in the recent past. Accompanying the cut were such enlightened and sensitive remarks as those uttered by Reeve John McBeth:

Even if your budget was limitless in staff and money, you could not cure the ills of juvenile delinquency.

It is this kind of irrelevant and anachronistic mentality, plus the strictures on municipal budgets with which we are faced. What the hon. Minister is obviously doing in this Child Welfare Act is making it impossible for municipalities to respond.

What about the case of the Windsor children's aid society? It is presently carrying eight children at Warrendale for intensive residential treatment; carrying them because Windsor has the courage and the strength to adopt some kind of deficit financing.

Which municipalities will allow deficit financing to keep children in institutional care where it is required? The truth is, of course, that the municipalities cannot possibly respond in the measure that the hon. Minister outlined. Why should they suddenly be more willing than their resistance in the past has demonstrated? There are all kinds of hon. members of this Legislature who sat on municipal councils; let them recite their experience of the munificence of municipal councils in the fields of child welfare.

In Metropolitan Toronto, child welfare needs would be competing with draperies and furniture for the city hall. In other councils they will be competing with sewers and roads. In my township of Scarborough, the municipality categorically refused day nurseries or homemaker services—a municipality of over a quarter of a million!

Now, are we to assume, Mr. Speaker, that when you put the onus to the degree of 60 per cent on municipalities and allow them to set the overall figure as well that they can possibly comply? That part of the legislation is an almost unbelievably retrograde step.

That brings me to another point, because the ultimate folly of all of this is that only the children will suffer. We will play with our financial compilations, but it will be the children who will suffer ultimately.

That brings me to point six. As I said, the entire formula, Mr. Speaker, I suggest, runs counter to all other legislative trends; and that is really why I do not understand it. In health we just had an emasculated medical care plan introduced into this Legislature this afternoon; but there is some provincial programme involved, some provincial financing.

There are shared welfare programmes federally-provincially. The pensions programme has a federal-provincial emphasis; the Ontario housing corporation has just stepped in and taken over local authorities so as to give provincial emphasis. Education has an increasingly provincial emphasis. Throughout society, in the field of social services it is recognized that the senior levels of government should not only bear a majority of the cost but should at least have some rights to determine the total figure. But not here, not in this piece of legislation! That is what makes the financial provisions an absurdity.

I want to ask the hon. gentleman opposite, Mr. Speaker, directed primarily to the hon. Minister, and I am sorry for this conclusion, perhaps it can be explained to me; but I want to ask the hon. Minister: Is he out to break the children's aid society? Is he out to destroy the morale of the children's aid society? Is he out to cripple them, financially? Because that is what is going to happen in the area of protection and prevention.

Does the hon. Minister want to absorb them into a publicly run child welfare service? If that is so, well, let him do so. Why do we need this intermediate façade? Or perhaps the hon. Minister opposite wishes to further embarrass the municipalities, perhaps that is his ultimate objective. Even then I cannot possibly conceive of the rationale.

Everyone agrees with the principle of local involvement and local initiative. We hear it repeated ad nauseam in this Legislature, but to a large degree that principle is met by involving municipal councillors on children's aid society boards and by asking them to pay a representative portion of the costs, perhaps 20 per cent; but certainly not 60 per cent and certainly not the right to determine the total figure. That has never happened before and it should not be allowed in this legislation.

Again I say, if the hon. Minister says that is not what the legislation does, let me point out to him that the legislation supposedly guarantees money for the juvenile and family court, but when the chips are down, the municipality does not respond.

Well, says the hon. Minister, I really have it solved, we have this child welfare review board; and when the municipalities and the children's aid societies are at each other's throats, we will bring in the child welfare review board and we will arbitrate.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I find that board suspect from the outset. It has only one representative from the children's aid societies. It has a representative from the Treasury board; it has a representative from Municipal Affairs; it has one representative from Public Welfare and one representative appointed by the Minister from some accredited social work school.

It is essentially the same philosophy as exists when the hon. Minister goes to Ottawa to negotiate for shared programmes. It is the Treasury board people who come along and they work out a neat financial deal, but they do not work out any kind of acceptable welfare deal. Now this is not a department of labour which requires arbitration, Mr. Minister, this is a department of public welfare. We strongly urge that there be some major amendments to the various sections when this bill comes before committee of the whole House.

So much for the principle of Crown guardianship and fiscal responsibility. I want to spend a few moments now on the related principle of administrative units. The hon. Minister opposite will have anticipated this, and I am sure he knows that this is another crucial and profound weakness of the bill.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the advisory committee advocated almost anything other than that with which we are left, and there is no change from the previous Act. Now admittedly, the committee was divided on the precise size of the units and the chain of authority, but they were absolutely unanimous in their condemnation of the prevailing child welfare apparatus. But it is the prevailing child welfare apparatus to which the hon. Minister chooses to adhere. Municipal government, as it is presently organized for child welfare purposes, simply cannot do the job.

Now we go back to page 18 of the committee report, and I quote:

Throughout its studies the committee was made increasingly aware of the fact that the machinery of local government in the province is out of date. The multiplicity of units of local government, their inequalities of tax capacity, the wide variations of size and facilities and the unsuitability of many of them, under modern conditions, to be areas of administration, make it very difficult to assign any specified level or type of local government as these now exist in the province, as the most appropriate one to exercise responsibility for the development and maintenance of services to children.

The committee understood that fully well; so much so that they made the following recommendation in the report, perhaps their most strongly worded statement in the entire report, and I quote it to the hon. Minister:

At this point in time the committee recommends that the province, through mandatory legislation, create welfare authorities covering the whole province so that each area will be included by legislation in a stated authority.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister opposite chose totally to ignore that recommendation.

Now let us again be frank: Other areas which fall within the hon. Minister's department, such as county organization, have been abject failures. There is a 1948 welfare units Act on the statute books, but it has never been implemented by this government. So all the efforts at regionalization have failed, and yet the hon. Minister is willing to bring in this Act which totally maintains the status quo.

Even the people who dissented from the majority opinion in this Act would have gone much further. Father Bauer said that the solution offered:

—would tend to perpetuate those inequalities of services to children that currently exist within the province and which were repeatedly drawn to the attention of the committee.

And James Griggs, who dissented, made the same point and Miss Bessie Touzel, who dissented, made the same point. In other words, your advisory committee, after three years of study, said: "Here are a series of alternatives, Mr. Minister, choose one of them. But in Heaven's name do not maintain the existing apparatus, because children cannot be served within the existing apparatus." But the hon. Minister, as I may say, characteristic of his department, decided to maintain it. Again, it is completely against the trend of every other department of government.

Papa Louis is carving out a singular reputation for himself, not only in relation to care of children, but in relation to the administrative unit and to the financial agreements. In education, we have carved out regional units. In health, we are embarking on regional hospital planning. In economics and development, there are plans for regional planning. The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) is on record as subscribing to regional planning as part of a war on poverty.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): They are against sin, too.

Mr. S. Lewis: Some of us are sceptical, but it is on record and a municipal law select committee comes forward with the idea of regional government. Everyone is in step except Papa Louis, and it is a most disconcerting proposition.

Mr. Singer: Maybe he is the only one telling the truth.

Mr. S. Lewis: And it may be, indeed, that the hon. Minister of Public Welfare is the only man in the Cabinet who truly understands reality, and who recognizes that the inadequate and absurd status quo will continue to function under a Conservative government. I would say, Mr. Speaker, let it function in some fields, but wipe it out in the field of child welfare. It has no place, no relevance, no validity, no justice. You are undermining every reasonable principle in this Act by maintaining it.

There is another aspect about the administration of units which, this report reveals, is worth exploring. It talks about children's aid societies and the problems they have. It is worth knowing, in case some of the hon. members of the House have not read the report, that staff of children's aid societies in this province varies from three to 300, that the geographic area varies from 50 square miles to 150,000 square miles, that budgets vary from $20,000 to $3 million, and that populations vary from several thousand to two million. The report suggested amalgamation, and alternative children's aid societies sizes—but not so the hon. Minister. He chose to abandon that particular recommendation. The report also demonstrated that every children's aid society, in order to function adequately as an administrative unit, should have a minimum of 15 to 20 child welfare supervisors.

Mr. Speaker, of the 55 societies in Ontario, 43 have less than the required figure. Thirty-two have less than ten; 22 have six or under. In other words, almost half of the societies in the province do not meet even one-third of the requirements, and 80 per cent of them do not meet the generally accepted requirements. Again, absolutely nothing from the hon. Minister in this Child Welfare Act to guarantee that there would be some measure of staff training, of inducement, or of amalgamating the children's aid societies to make larger units, so that the administration to children in the province is effective. Not a hint, and I find that difficult to subscribe to, Mr. Speaker.

The next contributing principle is the one of regulations. I shall be short on this, except to say to the hon. Minister that we in this party plead for—nay, we demand—the regulations. We ask that they be tabled prior to committee stage in this Legislature.

I suppose everyone could guess, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister has a proposed draft of regulations. If I were to examine a crystal ball I would say that he probably met in private conclave with directors of some of the children's aid societies to discuss the proposed regulations. They are written and this House has a right to know them. We have the right to know them because all the salient features of this Act are contingent on those regulations. Listen to what is left to regulations:

Section D: Prescribing the standard of services that children's aid societies shall provide.

We have no idea as to the definition of services.

Section F: Defining operating costs for the purpose of section 8.

That is, the budget of children's aid societies. No definition is provided.

Section G: Prescribing the manner of determining the maximum operating costs referred to in sub-section 4 of section 8 that may be included in a budget.

That is all the moneys that were designed for protection.

Section 8: Prescribing special needs of children for which joint facilities may be established under section 14.

That, I suppose, is for emotionally disturbed or handicapped children, or similar categories. Again, not a single hint as to what the regulations contain—regulations fundamental to the substance of the Act. All of the major sections of the Act are contingent on those regulations, but the hon. Minister will not put them before us. I want to say this, Mr. Speaker, and I hope he can respond. At the very least, let us have some pretty significant and influential representation before the standing committee on health, education and welfare of this House. I assume that the hon. Minister will invite all the members of the advisory committee. They may not wish to come, but some of them may wish to, and present their thoughts. I assume he will invite the children's aid societies; I assume he will invite people involved in child welfare. After all, this is the hon. Prime Minister's reason for standing committees; let us hear what they think should be contained in regulations. Let us hear what they feel about the financial inadequacies or adequacies, as the case may be, of this Act. I assume that such notification can be made public knowledge and become part of the privilege of this House.

Mr. Speaker, yet another contributing principle involves the capacity of the child welfare branch of The Department of Public Welfare to do the job. Through the years, the child welfare branch has been the impoverished and neglected cousin of the department. Its few members have worked bravely—heroically, let it be said—in the face of adversity.

There has been inadequate numbers, inadequate training and qualification, low morale at times, astonishing turnover and shifts, possibly characterized by no other department. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister has argued that professionals are impossible to come by and that all is well. During the course of this session, I think things will emerge about the child welfare branch which can question certain aspects of that. I suggest to you that the branch requires a wholly new impetus and, indeed, a total transformation.

In case it be said that I am quoting the opinions of just one member of a political party, let me point out what the advisory committee said in its report:

The committee is convinced that some of the problems existing in the child welfare field in Ontario today would not be as acute if The Department of Public Welfare had sufficient qualified staff to provide, through the child welfare branch, more service and professional consultation aimed at setting and improving standards in the field and carrying out much-needed research.

Little improvement in service can be hoped for unless there is a substantial change in the numbers of qualified staff at the department and branch levels.

That is an advisory committee statement after three years of study. Advisory committee statements are always couched in dignified and delicate language; between the lines we know what they think of the way in which the branch is operated.

Back in 1954 the advisory committee on field services of the child welfare branch reported that to provide adequate service to children's aid societies and children's institutions, there should be ten qualified child welfare supervisors at the branch level. That was ten years ago. I would think anyone would agree that there should now be a minimum of 15, but as the committee pointed out, the branch has been operating frequently with less than five. Indeed, in a matter of recent memory, if I can mention his name in this House, when Douglas Gardiner was doing children's aid society supervision for the child welfare branch of The Department of Public Welfare, he and one other person at one point were supervising all 55 societies. That is within recent memory; two people for 55 children's aid societies in the province. Occasionally there were three; at times there were four; but the number has always been marginal. It is a reflection of some of the weaknesses that exist in the children's aid societies throughout the province. It is a reflection, not of their own inadequacy, but of the lack of direction and supervision given them; and of the lack of leadership and understanding given them by the child welfare branch of The Department of Public Welfare.

Only unbelievable dedication kept that branch going, and again I emphasize—as the committee pointed out—it has to be pulled together. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, let me say to the hon. Minister that I am aware—we in this party are aware—of the footwork behind the scenes. There is a frantic, patchwork branch brought together for the purpose of implementing this child welfare legislation; and it is not sufficient. There has to be a new solidity, a new set of qualifications and a new substance to the child welfare branch. All people in the field recognize that.

I will go one step further, Mr. Speaker. All the supportive services are equally in need. Day nurseries, homemakers, the mothers' allowance branch—the case load in mothers' allowance is one worker for 404 cases. Now, how can we possibly do any reasonable counselling, any reasonable guiding, under those circumstances? That figure, Mr. Speaker, is taken from the child welfare advisory committee report.

The essential weaknesses inherent in this legislation are a reflection of the weakness of the department and of the branch. I say nothing but "bravo" to the people who have sustained it this far, and I hope the hon. Minister will take steps to improve the quality of service.

Almost finally, Mr. Speaker—hon. members will be pleased to know—I want to discuss one of the other major principles of this bill, which is special homes provided under section 16 for these children with special needs; and it is a very sorry task to see that children with special needs are never defined. We do not know to whom the hon. Minister refers.

Take a look, for a moment, Mr. Speaker, at the financial provisions of that section. The hon. Minister opposite will make available 50 per cent of the costs or $2,500 per bed, whichever is the lesser—that ancient Elizabethan phrase with which he is enamoured—"whichever is the lesser." We know what happens under The Children's Institutions Act and other Acts when you have that "whichever is the lesser" formula. They do not get any grants to speak of, and one might ask the hon. Minister opposite where the extra 50 per cent is going to come from? Which municipalities are prepared to throw in 50 per cent toward construction costs for special group homes, for treatment centres? What we will be back to is the syndrome of public united appeals again, making children's aid society work contingent on the voluntary subscriptions, on the perilous foundations which have handicapped the work for such a long time.

Again they will be crippled through lack of rational planning and, of course, Mr. Speaker, nowhere in the Act is there any hint of operating costs or of subsequent personnel and their financing. All of this is left in the air and I say to the hon. Minister that that is not good enough.

I say it to him for this reason: As he knows, there are several communities in this province that have simply run out of foster home possibilities. There are no more foster home placements for some societies; they have exhausted them, and there are many foster homes that cannot handle the children with difficult problems.

Increasingly, we need short-term, group home care; institutional care for which this advisory committee endlessly pleaded throughout its recommendations. At the end of this document, Mr. Speaker, there was that significant Treen study—the Harold Treen study—of wards of children's aid societies. He pointed out that fully 80 per cent of the wards suffered from significant physical or emotional problems requiring some form of immediate treatment, and that 26 per cent of them had highly complex and serious psychological problems. For those children you need a shift in emphasis to group homes or to some kind of short-term institutional care.

Again the onus is, in effect, shunted onto the municipality. The call will not be taken up with vigour. The Metropolitan Toronto children's aid society, Mr. Speaker, now has 300 severely disturbed and retarded children for whom it cannot adequately provide. This bill gives no basis for the group homes that will be required across the province for emotionally disturbed and otherwise handicapped children.

I suggest to the hon. Minister that what will happen is that children's aid societies in the province, with some courage and some understanding, will resort to the course of action where they will bring the children to the door of Papa Louis and will leave them there. They will say, "Mr. Minister, they are your children, we cannot provide for them. You have no right to impose them on us; we do not have the facilities."

The hon. Minister is simply going to have to respond, because the province of Ontario is filled with "Jamies." The Jamies are not only in the detention homes; the Jamies or children of severe disturbance of a lesser kind, but still severe disturbance, populate children's aid societies and other areas. The hon. Minister has made himself responsible, but he has not provided the adequate resources for anything substantive to be done. It is a move, but it is not substantive.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, with some trepidation, I want to mention the religious factor in adoption—with trepidation, because I bow to the expert knowledge of my colleague from another party, the hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Eagleson), who will probably want to address himself to this topic. I want to suggest to hon. members that the legislation is clever—almost inscrutable—in terms of adoption. It is so ambivalent that maybe the hon. member for Lakeshore can clear the air.

The religion factor in foster home placement under the Act, can be ruled out if it impedes placement after a reasonable time. I do not know how "after a reasonable time" will be defined. It may be defined as the Americans define "with all deliberate speed," one never knows how these things will be defined. And we do not know whether it will also apply to adoption placement purposes. It might.

There is a provision in the Act for foster home parents to apply for adoption, so that it may apply. The religious factor in adoption may have been taken out, but if so the Act needs some clarity. It should not be left in its present hazy and confused way for court order to interpret. If the hon. Minister's intentions are to allow inter-faith adoption, then let him say so unequivocally. The vacillations and the reversals of the hon. Minister in the past do not help the situation any.

Now let me say to the hon. Minister that in summary I want to read the recommendations and show him how I came to my initial figures. First, the three proposals to which the government has agreed.

No. 1. That the Crown in right of Ontario be designated as to the legal guardian of children who are permanently removed by the court from the custody and control of their parents.

That is, in fact, done.

No. 2. That the determination of the residence of the child taken into care be simplified.

That is, in fact, done.

No. 3. That the protective and preventive services be emphasized to a greater extent.

Well, within that generous wording, Mr. Speaker, that is, in fact, done.

Now what about the partial implementations:

That the total budgets for all child welfare services be recognized in the financial sharing arrangements.

That is simply not so; that has only been partially implemented. Nowhere does the Act guarantee that preventative services will be part of the total budget. Certainly it does not guarantee that the municipalities will accept this overall approach, so that is just half marks.

And here is another recommendation:

That the cost of services to unmarried mothers be borne entirely by the province.

As I pointed out, that also deserves just half marks. The province is providing cost only for children who come into care.

Another recommendation:

That a definite system be established for the collection of funds from parents where such parents are ordered to contribute to the support of their children who have been taken into care.

Mr. Minister, I did not concern myself with this in the analysis I attempted; let it be said that costs from parents and costs from putative fathers, and so on, as outlined in this Act, are as inadequate as they have been in past Acts. Indeed, within this Act, reference is made to the fact that it will operate as payments to deserted wives operate! Every hon. member of this House knows what a ludicrous and empty thing payments to deserted wives is in this society. So that also merits only half marks. Then:

That more specialized resources to serve children in care be developed and utilized such as group foster homes, and constructive planning for each child for a permanent type of care be undertaken at the earliest possible stage and be carried progressively forward.

Well, the hon. Minister cannot accept full marks for that because there is no guarantee that municipalities or societies will find sufficient funds.

Now, where did the report entirely fail in the recommendations? Let me read those involved:

That local or regional municipal child welfare authorities be established to work in conjunction with the children's aid society in the area of jurisdiction or to be directly responsible for the administration of the necessary child welfare services.

Not a hint, Mr. Speaker.

No. 2. That the consolidation of all local welfare services as, for example, at the county level of administration, be furthered, encouraged and promoted.

Not a hint in the report.

No. 3. That the number of child welfare jurisdictions be reduced in favour of larger administrative units.

That was not done in the legislation.

No. 4. That every effort be directed toward the acquiring and retention of more graduate social workers for the child welfare field and the training of qualified personnel.

Nowhere is that guaranteed or undertaken in the Act.

No. 5. That every effort be made to co-ordinate and integrate legislation dealing with the welfare of children and family.

Nowhere is there the integration of family counselling or day nurseries or homemakers or the other ancillary facts which influence lives of children.

Mr. Speaker, we will support this bill on the basic principle that it enacts child welfare legislation, or at least corroborates the legislation which now exists, but as I say, we came perilously close to opposing it. This legislation chooses to cast a pall of uncertainty over all that is good in its intent. It has not been carried out in the expression of the law.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that the measure of a society's maturity lies in the services to its children. By that measure this government has in large part forfeited its claim to leadership.

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the comments of the two previous speakers, I must suggest to the hon. members of this House that the legislation presented in this bill is most progressive and that many of the recommendations of the hon. Minister's advisory committee, which reported last year, have been carried into legislation in this Act.

I can recall the comments of some speakers at that time, who indicated that the report having been handed down in 1964, we could anticipate some governmental enactment in legislation by 1984. Needless to say, we are some 21 years ahead of their prognostication.

I have spoken with several representatives of welfare agencies since the first reading of this Act, Mr. Speaker, and I must say that the enthusiasm with which the people to whom I have spoken have received this bill is overwhelming. Obviously, the hon. member for Scarborough West and I do not spend all our time in the same circle, even though we are close friends.

I have perused in a cursory manner welfare legislation in other provinces of the Dominion of Canada and in states neighbouring our province. And I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the bill presented here today will place our province in a very enviable position insofar as child welfare legislation is concerned. There are many important facets to this bill and I would like to comment on some of them.

Of greatest importance in my estimation is the fact that all neglected children who are made permanent wards will now become wards of the province. This will allow the province, and the Crown in the right of the province, to delegate or assign the child to the appropriate agency without worrying about the individual local jurisdiction. In addition, it will work to the advantage of the child in that there will now be no requirements to make the child a ward of this individual local society and each child will have a clearly designated and responsible guardian. This will, of course, be of great assistance to the child in this stressing and emotional time.

The Act also states that the province will bear the cost of services to the children of unwed mothers. In addition, the legislation provides that the Minister will have the power to enter into agreements with other jurisdictions for reciprocal payments for these services.

Suggestions have been made that there should have been an immediate reduction in the number of children's aid societies in the province. I would suggest to the hon. members that the Minister has the right under this Act to regroup these societies. In addition, I would refer the hon. members to section 86, subsection 3 of the Act, which is a new section in the Act.

This section requires each local children's aid society to submit to the director of The Child Welfare Act a report which would set out the adoption status of each Crown ward in its care, and of applicants or adoptive parents. In this way, the director will have at his fingertips all the necessary information to correlate an adoption area of more-parents-than-children and conversely areas of more-children-than-parents.

It will now be much more simple to transfer a child, say, from the Cochrane area to the Metropolitan Toronto area or vice versa if this should be desired. The fact that the children are wards of the Crown in the province of Ontario will make this transfer much more speedy and much more easy.

The new Act also has regard for the safety and protection of the abused child. I am sorry the previous speakers did not mention this important facet of the legislation.

The phrase "battered baby syndrome" has recently been used to great extent in describing this situation and this Act will require the reporting of such offences. Any information given to the authorities in this regard will be privileged and the informant will be protected unless his information is given maliciously or without reasonable cause. In this way, it is hoped that the general public in our province will see fit to report such offences, since the local agencies and society personnel cannot possibly cope with every situation that arises.

Two major changes have been made in the Act which refer directly to foster parents and foster children. The hon. member for Scarborough West commented upon them, but with respect, Mr. Speaker, I feel I must make some additional comments.

This Act will now allow parents who have been foster parents to apply for the adoption of those same children. Prior to this bill this was not allowed and the foster parents felt that they were discriminated against in that they were not allowed even to apply. This legislation will conceivably increase the number of foster parents available.

The hon. member for Scarborough West felt, in his statements, that more foster parents were needed in our province and I suggest that this will meet part of that problem because now foster parents will come forward to take foster children into their home knowing that ultimately, should they desire to adopt these children, they will not be forbidden to do so.

The second major change concerning foster homes will allow foster children to be placed in foster homes of different religious faith or of no religious faith. The child, of course, in our province has the same religion of his father if the parents are married, and the same religion of his mother if the mother is not married. There will be an attempt within a reasonable time to place the child in a foster home of similar religious faith, but failing that the society can apply to the judge for the waiver of the subsections dealing with religious faith. Thus there need be no denial of a foster home to any child because of the religion or lack of religion of the foster parents.

There are some who have suggested that this legislation is lacking because no similar phraseology in part 4 of the Act, which deals with adoptions, has been made. They have assumed that there is no opportunity for a parent to adopt a child of a different religious faith, and that it is impossible for an atheist or an agnostic to adopt a child.

I would point out that under the Act as presently written there is no such restriction. Speaking as a lawyer, I would suggest that the case to which I have referred on two previous occasions in this House—namely, that of Re Lamb—I would suggest again that it is valid law in our province. That particular case stated that with reference to adoptions, the judge has the right to use his discretion and ignore any religious classification insofar as faith is concerned in dealing with adopting children and adopting parents. As long as the judge on that occasion is satisfied that the parents will give a suitable home to the child, the adoption will be allowed.

The law is then clear that the local society can apply to the judge for such a determination and there can, in fact, be inter-faith adoptions, to use the phrase. This case is binding until overruled by a higher court in our province and as such no change in legislation was necessary.

Perhaps, as has been suggested, it could have been spelled out specifically that the new section dealing with foster homes could have been written into part 4, dealing with adoptions. I am satisfied, however, that the Act, as written, will be construed by the courts along the same lines as the Re Lamb decision.

The hon. Minister of Public Welfare requested the advisory committee to make recommendations on child welfare. This report was handed down in June, 1964, and now, in the first session since that report, the hon. Minister has presented this bill to this House. The legislation takes a giant step forward in the child welfare field, and I urge all hon. members to support this legislation.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I am going to say a few words on this bill. I assure you it will not be very many words because so much has been said and I do not wish to repeat. But there are one or two items I would like to emphasize in the importance of this bill, and one of the great weaknesses of this whole setup was in many ways emphasized by the remarks of the last speaker, the hon. member for Lakeshore.

He had pointed as a principle in this bill to section 86, subsection 3, where every children's aid society had to make a monthly report as to the status of their wards. Now, the one great weakness in trying to enforce the principle of this bill is the utter and complete lack of staff. Can hon. members imagine the children's aid society in Toronto, the problem they are going to be faced with making a monthly report to the Minister when in 1962, according to the report of the advisory committee, they had adoptions completed—5,109; permanent wards—9,715? Can hon. members imagine the paper work, especially when they have such a small staff compared with the amount of work actually required? Bearing in mind the Toronto children's aid society is highly organized heaven knows what the other 54 children's aids are going to do.

The speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa East, pointed out that the case load for a worker at the children's aid society in Toronto is 404; that is for a field worker, 404 per month. Most experts in this field will tell you that the maximum should be approximately two hundred a month. This is the field worker who does the work in seeing what kind of family allowance should be allowed, what kind of rehabilitation work can be done and so on.

So hon. members can see we in this province do not have nearly the staff that is required, and if you do not have the staff you cannot enforce the principle that this bill is supposed to bring about and make law. The tragedy of it is that very little has been done. I know a course has been set up at the Ryerson polytechnical institute, and I understand it is a good course. But even there, relatively few students are attending and a tremendous expansion is going to be required in this field. There has been relatively little emphasis, little effort by the government to overcome this weakness.

Again, even in the matter of prevention, of trying to help children who may possibly need guidance, there are the children of working mothers. Yet we know from one recent survey in Scarborough, made by the nursery education association of Ontario, that in one industry that employed women who are working mothers, they had 215 pre-school aged children; and only 25 of these children were found to have suitable day care.

So here is, in one small survey, 25 out of 215! So again you can see, Mr. Speaker, that our prevention services are woefully lacking and there is no evidence from the government that anything is going to be done to improve this situation. So that they can bring up fine bills, which are in many ways excellent in principle, but again it is the enforcing of the principle that is so weak. This is one of my main objections to this bill.

We have pointed out before the almost complete lack of psychiatric services for children. So what do you do here in the city for an emotionally disturbed child? It is almost impossible to locate that child. So again, I ask the hon. Minister, how is he going to enforce these great principles of prevention, or even if the child—if it is too late to prevent emotional disturbance—how is he going to take care of the child once the child is on his hands?

Instead of the hon. Minister being Papa Louis, he is more in a position of being a most improvident stepfather. I think it is time they did something in going much farther in improving this whole setup and taking care of children.

Now there are three main things wrong with this bill, and again I admit they have been emphasized before. I am going to say very briefly, the split of 60-40 between the province and the municipalities is stupid and completely unwarranted. The municipalities today simply do not have the funds to carry out the principles emphasized in this bill. The constitutional and the moral responsibility for welfare belongs with the provincial government and it should be paid for out of the taxes of the province as a whole.

Because if the initiation to carry out the principles of this bill is left up to the municipalities, then you are going to find in most cases that little or nothing will be done. It is not that the municipalities are not interested, it is simply that they do not have the funds. All you have to do is look at the assessment rates, to look at the tax rates, throughout the municipalities of this province to know that it is going to be a most difficult thing for the municipalities to carry out the principles in this bill.

Another reason, Mr. Speaker, is that the care of our children in this province is split among five departments—the Attorney General, Reform Institutions, Education, Public Welfare and Health—so that when you come to the Attorney General, Reform Institutions, Health, Public Welfare and Education you need to co-ordinate your efforts. It is often a mere matter of chance whether a child lands in the care of the children's aid or he lands in a training school. When we were discussing the estimates of Reform Institutions we, on this side of the House, emphasized the importance of The Department of Public Welfare to take over the training schools.

Child welfare should come under this Act, rather than under something that bears more of the stigma of being connected with crime; so much of your problem of prevention has to do with welfare when the child is very young.

Within the department comes the matter of inefficient administration. You have set up a welfare authority. Then you have the child welfare board. Then, in most instances, the child welfare board works through the various municipalities throughout the province and they, in turn, work through the children's aid societies. It has been said before that the trend is toward regional planning; it is far better to have a few good major units that are well staffed and have the many required services than to have a number of small units that cannot do the work properly. I think that at 55, there are too many children's aid societies in the province today. It is the responsibility and the duty of the Minister of Public Welfare to give the leadership that is required in this field, and not to throw the onus back on the municipality.

I think the hon. member for Lakeshore was wrong in defending this bill and agreeing with the government in regard to the matter of adopting children because of their religious faith. The hon. member for Lakeshore thinks the decision in Re Lamb will stand up. I hope it will. But why do you have to wait for it to go again before a judge, or to go through the numerous appeals that might be necessary? Why cannot we say in the Act that a child shall be given a good home regardless of its religious background? We know today that there are many good people, responsible citizens, whose religion is quite nominal, yet they make good parents and can make a good home. There are many people who might call themselves agnostics, yet are certainly responsible and good citizens. Why is not a situation like this covered? I know of many homes and of many citizens who might call themselves agnostics and who, in many ways, are just as religious, if we can use that term, as some of those people who wear their religion on their sleeve.

I think that the section which dealt with the religion of a child is insipid and weak; it should come out bluntly and put in our statutes the law as set forth in the case in Re Lamb; then we know what the situation will be. I realize that in section 38 they use the term "if they cannot find a home for a child of its religious faith within a reasonable time." As some of the other hon. members have said, what is "within a reasonable time"? I do not think the government has used common sense. I think it is really using weasel words when it deals with this problem of religion. I regret that it has lacked the courage to meet the problem as it should be met.

In summing up, I say that this bill does not go nearly so far as it should. It is typical Tory legislation pushed by public opinion against its will—it tip-toes and minces up to the problem and gives us the half-baked solution and, in some cases, makes good reading. But if we look behind the reading we know that the personnel is simply not there to carry out even the good principles that are expressed. So it is with many misgivings and regrets that a better job has not been done that we support the motion. Half a loaf is better than none.

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): Mr. Speaker, I have heard many experts in child welfare say that the child welfare legislation of the province of Ontario, and the child welfare services that flow from it, rank favourably with the legislation and services in any other jurisdiction in North America. Before my friends on my own side of the House clap too excessively about that I will have to be frank enough to say that I have not heard experts say that it was the best in any jurisdiction in North America. I have heard it said that it is the best in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, although that legislation and its services are good, it is certainly not as good as the government wishes. It was to improve the situation that the government and the hon. Minister chose to appoint advisory committees of experts, and give them free rein to advise and to criticize in every way they saw fit. This is only sound common sense, and if you can find criticism to quote within the advice given, that only indicates that you are getting sound advice from sound advisors.

I will not outline the advantages of the new legislation in any great detail. This is available to anyone who wishes to read either the report of the hon. Minister's advisory committee or, and better still in conjunction with it, the bill now before us.

I do want to comment, however, on some of the remarks made by some of the previous speakers in this debate. In the interesting and thoughtful remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa East, he stated that the costs of prevention services would not be met under this bill; he quoted Mr. Lloyd Richardson, the executive director of the metropolitan children's aid society, as authority for that statement. I did not see Mr. Richardson's remarks to which he referred, but I think from my own conversations with Mr. Richardson, that he does not feel that as a matter of certainty. I will deal with that subject when I am commenting on some of the remarks of the hon. member for Scarborough West.

Both the hon. member for Scarborough West and the hon. member for Ottawa East referred to some apparent lack of authority in this bill to reduce the number of children's aid societies. Indeed, I think in his usual colourful language, the hon. member for Scarborough West referred to it as one of the glaring deficiencies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would agree that the number of children's aid societies is too great, 55, I am sure there is no one in this House who does not agree. There is, however, machinery available whereby the hon. Minister can reduce the number of children's aid societies, perhaps in those ways which the hon. member for Downsview likes to grade as permissive and then persuasive and ultimately by mandate.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): That is the police commission.

Mr. Dunlop: The mandate arises from the sanction in the hands of the Minister to, in fact, extinguish a children's aid society. The children's aid societies can, by their own bylaws, as corporations, change their boundaries. If, for instance, this was suggested to them and they would not change their boundaries and other means of persuasion do not work, the Minister has the ultimate sanction to extinguish a society and create new societies on a temporary basis. The power to do this particular task of reducing the number of units is there and will be used, I am sure, with discretion and tact and firmness.

The hon. member for Ottawa East and the hon. member for Parkdale both referred in somewhat different terms to their regret that this Act did not integrate certain of the services for children. It does not provide for the integration of training schools and facilities for the mentally retarded, the emotionally disturbed and several other groups. I do not imagine that a child welfare Act, Mr. Speaker, is the place in which one integrates facilities; even if, indeed, the facilities should be integrated.

Mr. Trotter: Why not?

Mr. Dunlop: May I tell the hon. member? By and large, the object of The Child Welfare Act, other than its adoption provisions, is to provide for people who stand in relation to their wards and other children in their care, in the same relation that good parents stand in relation to their children. It provides people in loco parentis. We cannot, in creating good parents for certain children who by no fault of their own are without such, we cannot, in that process, also logically create all the facilities that parents need. Now those of us here who are natural parents were not created by any Act of this Legislature. But we depend for the services available to our children on the Acts of this Legislature in education, The Training Schools Act, and so forth. Similarly, these parents who are being created by Acts of this Legislature will turn to the Acts of this Legislature in other fields.

The hon. member for Scarborough West enumerated a number of what he referred to as glaring deficiencies. I do not want to try to deal with them and refute them in total, but I think the one that he dwelt on at greatest length was with respect to the formula for sharing the costs or the expenditures of the children's aid societies. He, too, suggested that preventive services were permissive in character. Let me deal with that point first.

Indeed, under section, I believe it is 6-2-G of the Act, it states that services for the guidance, counselling and supervision of parents and families for the prevention of neglect may be provided. And may, of course, is a permissive word. Now, he pointed out that this was in one sense contrary to the recommendations of the advisory committee, and indeed it was. They suggested that it should be mandatory.

It would be difficult, however, Mr. Speaker, to draft legislation at this point in time which could make the provision of these prevention services mandatory upon all children's aid societies on the same basis. Some exist in communities and have had a limited opportunity to develop staffs. This prevents them from immediately carrying out this kind of service in any efficient or worthwhile manner. These particular societies will have to be encouraged, developed and built, as will the resources in their communities.

Thus it is permissive with respect to the societies, but in the process of developing a society's budget, the very first step is that it must be submitted to the director of the child welfare branch. Now one assumes that the director of the child welfare branch is not going to approve a budget that does not include what is sometimes called prevention services of an adequate character and in accordance with the regulations for the children's aid society in any area where this can be done. By administration, I believe that this will be handled in a progressive and, I trust, rapid fashion.

Following from a discussion on this point, my hon. friend from Scarborough West then discussed the 60-40 formula and its dangers as he saw them. He suggested that the formula placed control in the hands of the municipalities. He said they—meaning the municipalities—will determine the expenditures to be made. And he asked the hon. Minister, "Are you trying to cripple the children's aid societies?"

Now I have not interpreted these sections in the same way as the hon. member for Scarborough West has done. I certainly make no case for the maintenance of continued substantial municipal participation in the financing of child welfare services. But as it is drawn in this Act, the determination of the total expenditure side of the budget of a children's aid society in the first instance is a matter between the children's aid society—having regard to the Act and regulations thereunder—a matter between the children's aid society and the director of the child welfare branch to approve that budget.

It is then submitted to the municipality or municipalities concerned. If the municipality concerned refuses to put up its 60 per cent on those expenses to which the municipality must contribute, which include prevention and protection as well as care and wardship, there is appeal by the children's aid society, as well as the municipality, and by the Minister to the board of review.

The hon. member for Scarborough West said, "It is the children who will suffer." He said, "I view this board with great suspicion." I would think it would be the municipalities that would view the board with more suspicion than those interested in the welfare of children, because three of the five members of the board may be presumed to have a bias in favour of children. The municipalities may suffer, but I am sure the children will not suffer. And whether the municipalities will suffer or not, really depends upon what we see when the budgets for 1966 of the children's aid societies are drawn up on the basis of the regulations to be announced.

Now in reviewing the recommendations of the advisory committee—which the hon. member for Scarborough West said had not been carried out in going through his rather entertaining scoring process—I submit that those which were not carried out and were of any significance were mainly ones which lie in the field of administration such as a recommendation that the child welfare branch should be strengthened and that it should offer services, advice, guidance, to local children's aid societies. Recommendations of a kind which are based on administration can rarely be embraced within the wording of a statute. If by passing good statutes we could ensure good administration, we would have identified a superb new principle of government that would bring about the millennium. The administrative competence of the department and of the child welfare branch will, of course, be subject to review when the estimates of the department are before this House this year and next year and for years to come. The child welfare committee's recommendation could not have suggested we put a section in this Act saying, "and please administer it well."

I think their substantive recommendations with respect to legislation were almost without exception embodied in the Act.

The hon. member for Parkdale, Mr. Speaker, had some concern about, really, matters of administration again and staffing. He is quite right that a larger staff will be required and a more able staff will be required among the children's aid societies and indeed, a larger staff in the child welfare branch. However, again one cannot put into an Act some pious phrase such as, "Let us have an adequate staff."

The government has put in sufficient to ensure that these agencies will have sufficient money to pay for staff—and to pay for in-service training of staff. It has also done much to promote the professional training of social work staff and is developing training at a technical or technological level of social work staff. One must not sit back and be afrighted by the storage of staff, one must proceed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish warmly to urge support of this measure in the confidence that it is going to be, as my friend, the hon. member for Lakeshore has said, a giant stride in the provision of child welfare services in Ontario.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in the windup of this debate, I wish to say first of all that I am reminded of the old French saying that "la critique est facile, l'art est difficile." I appreciate very much the remarks that were made here this afternoon by the different hon. members who spoke. I think they were all sincere in doing so. They have set out their positions very clearly, and I am quite sure that they were not intending to destroy anything but simply were doing so for the purpose of helping and at the same time advising everyone concerned they were aware of the reaction there would be to this particular bill. I am quite satisfied to think that the reactions have been very good. As a matter of fact, I can assure them that every remark that has been made here this afternoon, either in commendation or in criticism, will be taken into consideration and receive due study.

I can also assure the hon. members of this House that the fact we have chosen to implement, I would say in a very large part, the recommendations as contained in the report of the child welfare advisory committee, does not mean we have now discarded this report. We still have it with us. We still study it and we will still carry out in the best way we see fit the recommendations included therein. This is certainly not the last word.

This is what I take a bit of objection to. Any time a bill is brought before this House, regardless of where it comes from or what it intends to produce, we must always have the last word. Well, I do not think that this is a process, sir, of democracy. Democracy is a process wherein you have to deal with matters slowly. I am a great believer, like my hon. friend, the hon. member for Sudbury, who once used the words "festina lente—but surely" and this is one of the cases. If we go too fast, sometimes we might stumble and break our legs; and this is what we try not to do.

I hope that the people who have worked to this end will appreciate the fact that we have gone quite a long way in providing for better services for the children who are in the care of this province and for those who will be in the future. At the same time, it must be appreciated there are limitations, in more ways than one, which we have to meet, and we must also find out if we are doing the proper thing.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of this House, I did not believe at any time, nor did the persons involved in the preparation of this Act believe at any time, that we had reached the epitome of what we expect to do in the future. But I still believe, and I think that every hon. member in himself sincerely believes, that we have gone a long way on the right road. I trust that every hon. member will appreciate this and vote for this bill with a full unanimity.

On vote 202:

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) if he would answer the questions which I asked yesterday about the incidents of police brutality which had been referred to the Ontario police commission, and which had then been passed on by that commission for investigation by municipal police authorities. Also the number of incidents of police brutality which came to the attention of the commission in any other way.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, I would say generally that I do not have detail on specific instances at my fingertips; I was not expecting to be asked by the House for details on matters of this kind. But I would say this: the police force, as the hon. member for Riverdale knows, is governed by police boards in cities or by boards of police commissioners in towns and other municipalities, or by committees of the council, or by committee of the whole council. The discipline of the police force above the level of the chief, the constables or the officers who are in charge of it is, first of all, conducted at the level of the board of police commissioners or the committee of council which controls the board within the local municipalities. As the police commission report details to us in those instances where matters have been brought to its attention and required its attention at that point, the matter has been given study and consideration and I think the report—if I remember the word—is referred to the proper discipline authority:

Your commission ensures full and proper investigation of complaints of police brutality upon a person confined to police lockups and as referred to the commission by The Department of Reform Institutions through The Department of the Attorney General.

Other cases of police brutality, when drawn to the attention of the commission through press or public reports, are investigated through the channel of the appropriate police governing authorities and the resulting evidence placed before the proper tribunal or other authority, for remedial or disciplinary action.

There was detailed through the House yesterday, that the main reason for the substance of the investigation of the situation in the city of Sudbury—that is a recent one as the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) pointed out—was a complaint of police brutality. Apparently there was some evidence of a situation there requiring remedial action. The result was that, on request, an investigator—one of the advisers of the police commission—went in, made a report, and has now delivered it to the mayor, who requested it, and who acted, I presume, upon it. There is disciplinary action taken in police forces from time to time for various reasons, for various invasions of public right, for abuses of this sort which, I think I may say, fortunately are not numerous.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the hon. Attorney General will recall the series of questions I addressed to him concerning bylaws passed by police commissions. Substantially, I asked him if there was any report, or any records maintained by his department, relating to such bylaws; if such reports are received and records kept, how many such bylaws are in existence; the names of municipalities whose commissions have passed such bylaws and a brief summary of them; and do police commissions which have passed such bylaws have the right to keep them secret or deny the public the opportunity to examine them.

The hon. Attorney General advised that there are no such records kept by his department, so he was, naturally, unable to answer the second and third phases of my question, Mr. Chairman.

However, in reply to (d) part of that question:

Do police commissions which have passed such bylaws have the right to keep the bylaws secret or deny the public an opportunity to examine them?

an answer was given. It is the opinion of the hon. Attorney General that all bylaws passed by municipal police commissions or boards which affect public conduct should not be kept secret, and should be open to examination by the public. Then he provides a note:

Under the provisions of The Police Act, Revised Statutes of Ontario, chapter 298, a board may, by bylaw, make regulations not inconsistent with the regulations under section 62 for the government of the police force for preventing neglect or abuse and for rendering it efficient in the discharge of its duties.

There is no legal requirement for the approval or filing of such bylaws with the provincial authorities and according to section 11 of The Police Act, such bylaws shall be received in evidence by all courts.

I think it is a substantial admission, and a very frank admission by the hon. Attorney General, that where such bylaws affect the public they should be made available to the public. I am certain that the hon. Attorney General is as aware as I am of the incidents which prompted the asking of this question. This was the discovery by one of the newspaper columnists here in Toronto, of a series of bylaws passed by the Metropolitan Toronto police commission which seemed to be a very serious encroachment on the rights of citizens, particularly bylaws about the displays of signs and that sort of thing and parades.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, but were they complaining, may I ask, Mr. Chairman, was the complaint as to the ignorance of the bylaw, the fact that it was not known; or was it to the nature of the bylaw, that it was transgressing on what those complaining thought was an area it should not? I do not think there was any question, if I recall it, that the bylaw was hidden. The fact that—

Mr. Singer: Yes, sir, it was.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Its extent, its language was known, was it not?

Mr. Singer: No, sir.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, how could one complain about it if it were not known?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, both sets of complaints were very audibly voiced through the press. How it came to this particular gentleman who started to write about it I do not know, but he had an understanding that there were certain bylaws in existence, passed by the Metropolitan Toronto board of police commissioners, and he went down—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Will the hon. member allow me to interrupt once again?

Mr. Singer: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What comes to my mind, and it did in the answer of his question, is this. If one complains about the exercise of a power by a police force or by any authority, then the authority by the exertion of that power must be exhibited.

Mr. Singer: If the hon. Attorney General will just bear with me, I will—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All right, if the hon. member will bear with me. Once it is exhibited, that gets rid of the secrecy; and once it is exposed, then there is no question here but that these bylaws may be tested in the courts.

Mr. Singer: That is right. The hon. Attorney General is perhaps anticipating me, but I would suggest perhaps wrongly anticipating. It is six o'clock so perhaps, as the Chairman suggested, we should continue the discussion after supper.

It being 6 o'clock p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 202:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, at the time we adjourned I was discussing a rather important point that I felt should be raised under this vote, and I had just commenced my discussion of it really.

It concerns the question of the powers of police commissions to pass bylaws, the effect and force of those bylaws, and whether or not the public have a right of access to those bylaws. I was pointing out, sir, that amongst the questions I addressed to the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) was my question 69, when I asked this, and I think it is important enough perhaps, sir, to repeat it.

I asked:

Is there any report made and are there any records maintained in The Department of the Attorney General, or any other branch of government, relating to bylaws passed by municipal police commissions which affect public conduct? If such reports are received and records kept, how many such bylaws are in existence? List the names of municipalities whose police commissions have passed such bylaws and briefly summarize each such bylaw. And finally, do police commissions which have power to pass such bylaws have the right to keep such bylaws secret and/or deny the public opportunity to examine them?

The hon. Attorney General advised me, sir, that no such records are kept and accordingly that parts (b) and (c) to my question were not applicable. That is, how many such bylaws are in existence, he could not advise me; and the names of the municipalities who had passed them, he could not advise me as well. Finally, he stated, sir, that it was his opinion that all bylaws passed by municipal police commissioners or boards which affect public conduct should not be kept secret, and should be open to examination by the public. Then he goes on to quote the provisions of The Police Act, section 15, Revised Statutes of Ontario 1960, chapter 298, which allow police commissions to pass bylaws.

Then as I began my remarks the hon. Attorney General interrupted me and wondered whether I was addressing my criticism—and I suspect, sir, that this might well be—either to the secrecy or to the power of passing bylaws. I suggested to my hon. friend that it was going to be addressed on both facets; in other words, it is my sincere opinion and the opinion of my hon. colleagues—

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Where are they?

Mr. Singer: That is a good question. My only answer to that, sir, is that in quality we make up what there is in quantity on the other side.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is the most energetic effort of the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management that I have ever heard.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Thank you, sir.

An hon. member: He spent all supper hour on that one.

Mr. Singer: In any case, sir, it is the opinion of my hon. colleagues and myself that this whole question should be very seriously examined and the right of unelected bodies to pass bylaws which affect the conduct of the public generally, or the conduct of select groups, should be governed by certain rules and regulations.

We are concerned, in fact we are very concerned, about the idea of secret legislation being passed. We are very concerned that unelected persons can make a part of the law of the province of Ontario, rules and regulations for which they are not accountable. We are concerned that persons who can be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council—and the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, as you well know, sir, is the group that occupies really the front benches over there—persons who can be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and about whose appointment there can be no question, can pass rules and regulations which can seriously affect the conduct of certain members of the public, and on occasion affect the conduct of all members of the public, and then that these persons can say: What we do is our business and you have no right to call us into question.

As undemocratic as this may be, I suggest, sir, that every hon. member of this House should rise in protest about this sort of procedure, because as often as we feel that the government, all through their 77 members wrongly direct their energies, or wrongly put on the statute books things that we believe are not fair or not reasonable or not logical to the people of Ontario, there comes an opportunity at stated periods when the people of Ontario can express their opinion. But the class of bylaws that I am talking about are passed by and large by nameless and faceless people. They can come to conclusions in secret, that such and such a code of procedure should apply to select groups or to the general public; and in their wisdom, or their lack of it, they can say to the general public: You have no right to see what we have done.

This, sir, is my substantial protest.

When the hon. Attorney General interrupted me in my preliminary remarks before we adjourned at 6 o'clock, he asked me whether I was objecting to the secrecy or to the power of police commissions to pass bylaws. My answer to him then, as it is now, is that I am objecting to both of these facets. It is my sincere opinion, and that of my colleagues, that anybody who has the power and authority to pass bylaws that affect any of our citizens should have some public responsibility. It is my suggestion that these laws be open and available to the public, and the people who pass them subject to public accountability and a sense of responsibility. The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and all of his colleagues have to stand here from time to time and say: "This is what we have done and we believe it is right; if you do not like it then you can defeat us." Or they say at stated times: "We will go to the public and say this is what we have done and if the public does not like us you can defeat us." I think this same sort of role is a cornerstone of our democratic process and should apply to such bodies as police commissions.

I mentioned—the hon. Attorney General with all his problems across the province cannot be as aware of this metropolitan problem as I am—that in both aspects this concerns me. Let me read you a newspaper comment by Ron Haggart; he writes a column in the Toronto Daily Star. He started on this inquiry by writing to the board of commissioners of police for Metropolitan Toronto, asking them for copies of the bylaws that were passed by the metropolitan board of commissioners of police. On January 11 a gentleman named B. J. Schumacker, apparently the executive secretary of the board of commissioners of police, wrote to Mr. Haggart in reply to his letter of January 4. Mr. Schumacker said:

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of January 4 last, respecting the bylaws passed by the metropolitan board of commissioners of police. In compliance with your first request I am forwarding to you herewith a copy of bylaw No. 2 of the board of commissioners of police. I am also forwarding a copy of bylaw No. 215 passed on July 16, 1938, by the former police commission of the city of Toronto which forms the basis for our bylaws No. 2 and 12. With regard—

I think this is the important point and I am sure my friend, the hon. Attorney General will appreciate this:

With regard to your request to see copies of all bylaws indicated to you in my letter of December 2 last, it is the policy of the board to make available only its bylaws that affect the public. The following bylaws are presently in force:

No. 1. To establish a retiring age for police officers of the metropolitan police force.

No. 7. To establish a Metropolitan Toronto auxiliary police force, to make regulations for its government, for preventing neglect and abuse and for rendering it efficient in the discharge of its duty.

No. 11. To make regulations for the government of the police force of Metropolitan Toronto for preventing neglect or abuse and for rendering it efficient in the discharge of its duties.

No. 12. To regulate parades or processions on the highways for preventing the obstruction thereof during processions or public demonstrations.

Mr. Schumacker goes on to say that:

Bylaw No. 2 was repealed and replaced by bylaw No. 12, and bylaw No. 3, which was the original bylaw to make regulations for the government of the police force of Metropolitan Toronto for preventing neglect or abuse, for rendering it efficient in the discharge of its duties, was amended from time to time by bylaws No. 4, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10. The said bylaw No. 3 and amendments were consolidated by the passing of bylaw No. 11.

Bylaws No. 1, 7 and 11 do not apply to the public, and in accordance with the policy of the board I am not able to make them available.

Now let us review bylaws No. 1, 7 and 11.

Bylaw No. 1, which the board of commissioners of police of Metropolitan Toronto believe was not to be made available to the public in accordance with their policy is entitled: "A bylaw to establish a retiring age for police officers of the metropolitan force."

It would seem to me, sir, that those persons who might be concerned with all the intricacies of a retiring age for police officers of the metropolitan force, who might consist of the wives, or the families, or the relatives, or even the creditors, of police officers, could and should and would be most interested in what the bylaws establish relating to the retiring age for police officers on the metropolitan police force.

I ask the hon. Attorney General, Mr. Chairman, through you, what possible sense can there be in this sort of an approach, that a bylaw relating to the retiring age for police officers on the metropolitan police force should be denied to a member of the public? My friend, who wrote this letter of inquiry, to whom this letter in reply is addressed, is a member of the public. He is an inquiring member of the public, because he is a columnist in one of our leading daily newspapers.

Bylaw No. 7, which again the board of commissioners of police believe should not be revealed to the public, establishes a Metropolitan Toronto auxiliary police force, makes regulations for its government, and for preventing neglect and abuse, and for rendering it efficient to the discharge of its duties. Now, it may well be, sir, and I am sure it is, important that we have auxiliary police forces for a variety of purposes; for emergencies, for disaster, for all sorts of purposes which my hon. colleagues here in the House can well imagine.

But surely, sir, to instil in the minds of the public the importance and the validity and the purposes of an auxiliary police force, why would one think that the board of commissioners of police in Metropolitan Toronto should keep the rules and regulations governing such a force secret? What is the purpose of it?

Surely, one of the purposes of all law enforcement bodies in this province of ours is to instil in the minds of the public which they serve an idea of responsibility, an idea that they are doing reasonable things; the thought that what they are doing makes sense, that they are fair, that they are logical, that they are reasonable. Here we have the board of commissioners of police in our largest city saying, "In our opinion, a bylaw which we have passed and which the government of Ontario has given us power to pass, which governs the regulation for the establishment of an auxiliary police force in Metropolitan Toronto—our largest municipality, constituting a third of our population—for preventing neglect and abuse and for rendering it efficient in discharge of its duties, is none of your business."

None of your business, Mr. Columnist; none of your business, Mr. Citizen; how efficient the auxiliary police force is; how efficient and fair and reasonable its conduct is going to be; how logical its resolutions are going to be; and how logical the governing regulations concerning it are going to be.

And then bylaw No. 11—and this perhaps strikes at the real heart of the matter—bylaw No. 11 is a bylaw to make regulations for the government of the police force of Metropolitan Toronto for preventing neglect or abuse or rendering it efficient in the discharge of its duties.

Now, what does that bylaw mean? I am certain, Mr. Chairman, that bylaw must relate to the conduct of police officers in this large metropolis of ours. It must relate to the type of uniforms they wear, the respect in which they hold their senior officers, the sort of discipline to which they are going to be subject. The sort of thing that we in the army used to refer to as the King's rules and regulations which govern army conduct, and they were published and made available to anyone.

Perhaps, sir, the sort of thing that governs the discharge of firearms. Should every policeman in Metropolitan Toronto be prepared or be allowed to use his firearms indiscriminately or should there be strict rules and regulations? In fact, sir, I am advised that the parts of this bylaw that relate to the discharge of firearms by officers in the metropolitan police force here in Toronto are amongst the most sensible and logical of any jurisdiction in the whole North American continent; that they set down very strict rules and regulations; that they indicate very clearly to the police officers who are governed by this bylaw that when they use firearms they must be in real concern about the safety of themselves, the physical safety of themselves. That they are cautioned—not cautioned, but they are told—under severe penalty that they cannot go around indiscriminately firing their revolvers and so on.

Now, this is a good thing. Surely this type of rule and regulation, if made knowledgeable and available to the public would instil in the minds of the 2,000,000 people who live in the metropolitan area a respect and an honour for people who govern our police force.

But what does the Metropolitan Toronto police commission say in regard to this? They say it is none of your business, this is a secret. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, is there any right or reason to proceed in this way?

Finally, bylaw No. 12 regulates parades or processions on highways and for preventing the obstruction thereof during processions and public demonstrations. Now, that is a different one and they advise Mr. Haggart that bylaw No. 12 will be made knowledgeable to him and the various facets concerned in bylaw No. 12 are later a subject of discussion. They do make that available to him. There is a copy of it here and I am going to comment on that just in a few moments.

Well, sir, as a result of all this, there are further requests go forward and there is difficulty. There is very extreme difficulty, and this matter comes in a matter of substantial public discussion. It is discussed at meetings of the board of commissioners of police and His Honour the mayor of the city of Toronto, Mayor Givens; and he is quoted here in a news story in one of the Toronto papers, in this way:

Mayor Givens, who recently promised to remain a thorn in the commission's side until it altered what he described as its Star Chamber image, also hammered away at the commission's attitude to making bylaws public.

Then in quotation marks it says this, and again I surround myself with the caution that I perhaps exhibited last night when I was quoting from another report. If this is correct, this is what His Worship Magistrate Bick said:

Don't waltz me around, he shouted.

No, I am sorry, that is the mayor.

"Don't waltz me around," the mayor shouted at Magistrate Bick, the chairman, after Mr. Bick told the commission that bylaws are available to the public. "I know people who have tried to get copies of our bylaws without success."

Mr. Bick explained that he meant public bylaws are available.

The commission has passed four bylaws since its inception. One deals with parades, the other three deal with retirement age for police, auxiliary policemen and the rules and regulations governing the department and its personnel.

The discussion went on at substantial length. All three of the Toronto daily newspapers joined in their concern and expressed in strong editorial fashion their real concern about the passing of secret bylaws.

I have outlined, Mr. Chairman, what these bylaws the commission apparently refuses to reveal contain; it is my suggestion to you, sir, that there is no reason in the world why an unelected body should choose to keep this sort of bylaw quiet. That deals with the position of secrecy.

Then we have the question of bylaw No. 12, the one that deals with public parades. I have in front of me tonight editorials from all three of the Toronto dailies. The Star heads its editorial, "End Police Censorship." The Globe and Mail heads its editorial, "By Appointment Only." The Telegram heads its editorial, "Obstinate." They all say substantially the same thing. There is universal condemnation by the Toronto press of the approach that the police commission of the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto takes to the provisions of bylaw No. 12.

Here is what the Telegram says:

This is the dodge. The question of giving policemen discretionary power in the banning of signs—and that is one of the provisions of this bylaw No. 12:

—is one of censorship. It is either right or wrong. Mayor Givens thinks it is wrong to give the police such power. He is right.

The Globe and Mail says:

It is reasonable and acceptable that the police commission should make rules governing the operation of the police force, but when the commission assumes responsibility for laws which touch upon basic freedoms it goes too far. It should not have that kind of power. This belongs in the hands of people who are answerable to the electors directly.

And the Star says:

But this issue should not depend on the fate of a private member's bill.

Some of the hon. gentlemen here have bills on the order paper touching on this point.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) has.

Mr. Singer: I give you the same credit as you gave us when you stole some of our resolutions earlier on. Some of the hon. members have resolutions which have not been called as yet. If they want to get up and identify themselves later, that is up to them.

But the issue should not depend on the fate of a private member's bill. The Robarts government should make sure that police commissions are denied the power to pass any bylaws except those which deal directly with the functioning of the police force. There is no reason why any police body should also take on the job of a censor.

Mr. Chairman, in summary, my points are these. If any unelected body is given the power to pass bylaws, surely it makes abundant and clear common sense that those bylaws should be available to all members of the public. I am not too sure that any unelected body should be given the power to pass bylaws which affect policemen, auxiliary policemen, their wives, their children, and their families, and certainly should not be given the power to pass bylaws that affect the conduct of the public generally. That is point number one.

The second point is that surely no unelected body should be given power to pass bylaws which affect the conduct of the public generally, neither should it be allowed to delegate to policemen on the beat the right to be censors as to what kind of sign could and should be carried in a parade. The hon. Attorney General is undoubtedly going to say, as he started to say earlier this afternoon, that as for the validity of the bylaws in question, let us take them before the courts. I suggest to my hon. friend that this is not the answer. If this government is going to provide leadership, it should lean over backwards to convince the people of the province of Ontario that those who are entrusted with the powers to pass laws are, beyond any doubt, going to be reasonable, fair and equitable; that there should be no secret laws; and, above all, that unelected persons should not be able to pass laws which are going to affect public conduct. Surely there can be no great secret attached to the code of discipline that is going to apply to the policemen in Metropolitan Toronto? The ground rules should be abundantly clear to everybody; in making those rules clear, if they make sense, they are going to instil in the minds of the people in Metropolitan Toronto, and throughout the whole of the province, that the people responsible for controlling police forces are acting in a reasonable and logical manner.

I am not suggesting, sir, that any or every case of discipline be aired in public, but surely it makes good sense to suggest that the rules are there, and are obvious, and available for examination by everyone, as the King's rules and regulations for the government of our armed forces are made available. The trial and disposition of offences under these rules, on occasion, should perhaps be a matter of private hearing, but surely the rules and regulations, and the occasions on which policemen are entitled to use their firearms and when they can commandeer public property, should be well known, and made completely available to all members of the public.

I object, sir, to the secrecy that surrounds this whole procedure which produces no purpose except to stir up distrust in the minds of the public.

The second and equally important phase is this. I do not believe that any unelected body should be allowed to pass bylaws which would give them permission to delegate to policemen the right to be censors. I call as no better witness the unanimous editorial opinion of the three metropolitan dailies. It is not too often they agree, but they agree that this sort of thing should not be entrusted to an unelected body. The wisdom, or lack of it, of the bylaw we could argue about. But if this sort of judgment is to be made, at least let it be made by the elected council who can be called to account at the next municipal election. Let it not be made by a body appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, remote and completely removed from the people of Ontario.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might be permitted, sir, at the opening of my remarks, since Mr. Speaker is not in the chair, I note that the galleries are filled tonight with persons who are interested enough to come out and observe the debates and proceedings of this Legislature. I have learned that they are, in the main, persons of the riding of Armourdale.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on a point of privilege, on this, the riding which I used to represent before 1963.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: A constituency, Mr. Chairman, which I have just learned used to be represented by the hon. member now for Downsview, but now represented by the outstanding hon. member who sits in the far corner to my right across the aisle (Mr. Carton), I should like to take the opportunity,

I am sure on behalf of everyone, of welcoming these persons, and to say that it fortifies me greatly to know that they are not only in front of me, but also behind me tonight.

An hon. member: Behind you is most important.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They are all with me.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to deal in brief, if I may, with the comments of the hon. member for Downsview. He referred to the question he asked, No. 69, in the long list of questions which I received with interest from him. The question read: "Would the Ministry advise if there are any reports made and are there any records maintained by the Attorney General's department or any other branch of government relating to bylaws passed by municipal police commissions which affect public conduct?" The answer we gave him to that, which he has announced, was: "No, there is no record kept of municipal police board bylaws or police commission bylaws." The bylaws which are passed by local police boards and police commissions or committees of council are their own business. They keep the records of them and there is no legislation, no arrangement, for the keeping of records. No record is kept.

The question proceeded: "Do the police commissions which have passed such bylaws have the right to keep such bylaws secret and deny the public the opportunity to examine them?"

We answered that straightforwardly: "It is the opinion of the Attorney General that all bylaws passed by municipal police commissions or boards which affect public conduct should not be kept secret and should be open to examination by the public." And then, as the hon. member was good enough to recount, we cited him the law as the backing for that opinion, that "bylaws which affect public conduct should be not secret, should be open to the public." That is our opinion and by that we stand:

Should any member of the public be affected by such bylaw or by the exercise of it, such member of the public or someone on his behalf, perhaps his municipality, has the right to attack that bylaw, to call it to question, in the courts of this land.

That is where it should be tested and tried. Some time during this session in this House an hon. member posed a question to me before the orders of the day, "Does the Attorney General intend to test the bylaw of the board of police commission of Metropolitan Toronto with respect to the prohibition as to parades?" something to this effect, and I answered, "No, the government does not intend to get in the position of testing each and every or any bylaw of a municipality or a police board of a municipality of this province." But the right is there, the bylaw should be open, it should not be secret, it is open to testing in a court and I think that is the short or the long answer to this question.

I must say to my hon. friend that I think his criticisms up to this point throughout this debate on the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General have been extremely tangential and have shied off at all angles. They do not impinge directly on the department and I find myself roaming far afield in order to answer them. But I do not mind if that is the approach he tries and intends to take.

There is nothing in The Police Act, at present, which gives this department the right to interfere, if I may call it that, in the police administration of municipalities to the extent of saying, "Produce your bylaws, record them with us, record them with the government or let us pass on them or let us assess them as to their validity."

Mr. Singer: The hon. Attorney General is most astute, he has gotten to the point of my argument. It should be there.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And I do not think it should be there.

Mr. Singer: I disagree very strongly.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not think it should, not at this point at any rate. Every board of police commissioners in this province is designed and constructed along the same lines, including that of Metro Toronto. The Police Act defines the construction of a board of police commissioners: the head of the municipal council, be it town or city or whatever, a judge of a county or municipal court and one other person—now that is the general rule.

Usually that one other person is the magistrate, so that you have in almost every instance throughout this province, in every municipality, a board of police commissioners, where there is a board, consisting of the mayor or reeve, the county or district judge and one other person, usually the district or local magistrate. In Metropolitan Toronto, by virtue of the fact that it is a large and complicated metropolitan organization, we have the mayor, the head of the council, and an additional representative from the council of Metro Toronto, the chief magistrate of Ontario, Judge Ian Macdonell, and Magistrate Bick.

Now I will admit to you that you have in that organization, an organization which is not representative in the sense that it is elected, in the majority. You have the mayor and an elected member of the council of Metro Toronto and only those two elected—

Mr. Bryden: There is only one elected.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, all right, one elected, but you have a judge, a county court judge, the chief magistrate of this province and Magistrate Bick. I submit to you, that while not an elected body, it is a competent and capable body and it is drawn on the pattern of police boards throughout this province which have, through a good many years, served in a very capable way and with a very good record of experience behind them.

Now it may be—and I am quite prepared to consider the suggestion of my hon. friend—that perhaps in the Act of this province, since we make the appointment—the Lieutenant-Governor in Council makes two of the three appointments, or three of the five appointments in Metro—that perhaps we should take onto ourselves some power, some additional power and control. But I think that by and large you are prepared perhaps to admit with me that there has been pretty good governance of police bodies, in their disciplines and in their conduct and in their procedures, in this province of Ontario.

Mr. Singer: Probably there has, but let us boast about it, let us make it all public.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, as I say, I am prepared to take into account the suggestion that perhaps we might find the reason to place in our hands, as the Legislature, the overall governing body of this province, some additional powers to exercise certain controls, if you feel that they are so badly necessary as you would make out in your submissions here in this House. I have not come to that conclusion at this moment. And the Act which I have introduced this year does not contain such provisions.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Bryden: We do not get a chance over here.

Mr. Sopha: I want to say that the last remarks of the hon. Attorney General further aggravated a very distressing day, which started with that dreadful piece of legislation introduced by the hon Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond).

I am saddened, I am truly saddened and depressed when I hear the hon. Attorney General enunciate the things that he has just taken the occasion to do. And I say to you, you Tories, you are always talking about tradition, calling on this tradition and that, introducing Red Ensigns and preserving the grave of Sir John Graves Simcoe.

An hon. member: Tell us about your traditions!

Mr. Sopha: I will. I wish you would remember some of the traditions of freedom and liberty that we have in this country. Those are the traditions that count.

Now let us read this bylaw, the appropriate part of this bylaw, into the record passed by this metropolitan board of police commissioners:

No parade or procession shall be held or allowed upon a highway unless or until:

(a) a written application for permission to hold same is filed with the board at least seven days prior to the day on which it is proposed to hold such parade or procession;

(b) the application states the place of assembly, hour of starting therefrom, the proposed route, the destination, the approximate number of persons forming the procession, designating in detail the number on foot, the number mounted—the number mounted — I must interpolate there; everybody has a horse I suppose these days:

—the number of bands of music and the number of vehicles;

(c) a permit has been issued on the prescribed form.

Now, if that silly metropolitan board of police commissioners were the board of police commissioners in my community, I would be very restless to be under the governance of that board because I say to the Attorney General through you, Mr. Chairman, that my right to demonstrate against organized power, the government—whatever level that government be, let it be municipal or provincial or federal—that right cannot be interfered with by a bunch of fools like these people who passed this bylaw. May the day never come when the environs of this Legislature are barred to people to come and protest proposed or enacted legislation of this House; and when they can only come at the sufferance of the board of police commissioners of Metropolitan Toronto.

I would hesitate to think that those several hundred pulchritudinous nurses that came here—

An hon. member: What does that mean?

Mr. Sopha: To you that means they are pretty girls. Pretty girls to you, pretty young ladies that came here as a result of the lethargy of the hon. Minister of Health or perhaps the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree.)

May the day never come that those young ladies could not come and assemble outside here and harass the hon. Minister of Labour and the hon. Minister of Health about their failure to enact legislation that they want.

An hon. member: It is not the case.

Mr. Sopha: I was always under the impression that boards of police commissioners existed to regulate and administer police forces. That is what I thought they were for.

I must interject and say that the hon. Attorney General stands and he talks about the assurance that we may draw from the fact that a judge is on the board of police commissioners. Well, for his information, before he came to this House the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), when he occupied the chair, took the judge out. He took the judge out against our protests.

First, he took the magistrate out; then he took the judge out as being mandatory members of the board. The only person we left in who is a mandatory and automatic member of the board is the elected representative, the head of the council. So that is the faith your predecessor but one had in the judge.

At that time we had a long and bitter argument—I recall it up in committee room three—we had a very acrimonious argument with him. That year, I can say with assurance, he had a thing for judges. He was taking judges out of positions all over the place that year. We protested that it was necessary to have a senior judicial official on the board who did not have daily contact with the police forces.

My friend from Essex North (Mr. Reaume) in the six years I have been here, I can recall—all I have to do is close my eyes and think—and I can recall the eloquence with which he spoke against the disgraceful situation that existed in the county of Essex. They had the head of the council, they had a magistrate and they had the Crown attorney on the police commission and that was unique in the province.

An hon. member: And an old woman!

Mr. Sopha: Well, I will not say that, you can say that yourself. I will not say that.

That was the decision of this government, but I say this: My rights, which I share with every citizen in this province, to demonstrate my protest against government or otherwise, comes from custom and usage. I reminded this House that your political ancestors on April 25, 1849, demonstrated their displeasure over the rebellion losses bill by burning down the Parliament buildings in Montreal. They did not have a permit from the board of police commissioners to do it! Now, in order to burn these down, they would, presumably, have to go and get a permit.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): How did they all get out?

Mr. Sopha: Throughout the whole of British history which we cherish so greatly, and the difference between you and I is that I do not pick and choose traditions—

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): Between you and me!

Mr. Sopha: I do not pick and choose traditions all over the place that suit me; symbols, graves, the dust of the dead. I pick the living ones, those of liberty and freedom; those are the ones that I adhere to. One of the greatest traditions is the right to protest.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): You spoke differently a few weeks ago about that.

Mr. Sopha: You can go through the history books and you can find innumerable examples of protest by people marching; they have changed the course of government by their marches and by their protests. Then let it be added, so the record will be complete, that in respect of this one—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Are you marching now?

Mr. Sopha: In respect of this one, and I do not think the hon. member for Downsview mentioned it, but in respect of this one a group challenged them. They challenged them on it and they informed the police that they would have a demonstration—I think it was on Wellington Street, if I am not mistaken. They said, we will not show the police what is going to be on our placards before.

Mr. MacDonald: What was the group?

Mr. Sopha: You can tell what the group is, that is your department. Maybe on the placards they had such things as: "We love Ringo Starr"; or something like that, I do not know.

Mr. Singer: "We love Donald MacDonald!"

An hon. member: And Ringo Starr!

Mr. Sopha: Yes, "We love Donald MacDonald." That is almost impossible to conjure up; but they might have had that.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: The police did not interfere with them; the police did not accept the gauntlet that had been thrown. That brings the law into disrespect, that shows how foolish this board of police commissioners is.

Then I want to give that personal example that I have referred to before. When we were subject to the autocracy of Osgoode Hall—several years ago now, in 1950—we marched from the law school over here down to Osgoode Hall. We demonstrated outside it against the inequities in legal education. We had no permit from the board of police commissioners! I hope I never live long enough in this country that nonsense like this will be enacted by any responsible body to interfere with the citizen's democratic right to make his protest against government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I really must say to you that while I always enjoy listening to the hon. member for Sudbury—whose riding is almost contiguous to mine except for the intervention of the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin (Mr. Farquhar)—I love to hear him talk, but here again we are wasting time.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: But he never says anything.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We are wasting time—

Mr. Singer: Are we?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. We are talking about a bylaw of the board of police commissioners of Metropolitan Toronto, which I said could be tested in the courts, which I said should be published, which has been tested, which the public can prove has validity or has no validity; this has been done.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think we are wasting time. I did not in my remarks mention the word tradition, but since my hon. friend has brought it up, I believe there are certain virtues in tradition on which to build and then go forward into the modern day.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think it is regrettable that it is so difficult to convey to the hon. Attorney General some of the most elementary principles of democratic constitutional government. His constant evasion of this issue is unfortunate. By taking a technical, legalistic interpretation of his duty, I suppose he can evade the issue.

He has successfully evaded it up to now, just as his predecessors evaded it in previous years when some of us in this House, including myself and the hon. member for St. George (Mr. A. F. Lawrence), as I recall, were raising a similar issue with regard to the licensing commission of the city of Toronto. But surely it is a basic principle of democratic government that laws should not be made except by people who are accountable to the people; that is a basic principle.

Now the hon. Attorney General says that the board of police commissioners in Toronto has made certain laws. There is no harm in that, he says, those laws can be tested in the courts. The laws, I would suggest to him—he is a lawyer and I am not—but I would suggest to him that the laws that they have made can be tested in the courts only to the extent of determining whether or not they have the power to make them.

That is the only extent to which they can be tested. If they have the power under the law to make those laws, then the courts cannot intervene. That surely is elementary. I am suggesting to the hon. Attorney General that they should not have the power to make those laws; they should not have the power to make any laws. If you want to look at The Municipal Act of this province, you will find about a dozen pages of powers that unelected bodies have with regard to the making of laws. It is interesting to note that such powers, in the cases of towns, villages and townships, are entrusted to the local elected councils, but in some cases, in cities of 100,000 and more the powers are not given to local councils but to non-elected bodies, namely, boards of police commissioners. In the smaller municipalities, the elected people make the laws, but apparently the elected bodies in the larger municipalities are not competent to make laws. Thus these powers are given to people who are accountable to nobody—absolutely nobody.

In the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto; we are particularly afflicted because we have not one, but two—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Would the hon. member permit me to say that the persons appointed to boards of police commissioners by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council which is the government, an elected body, are removable by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council? So there is an accountability to the public—

Mr. Bryden: You told us a few minutes ago that you do nothing whatever to review what they are doing; that you do not consider it your business. Now you cannot—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I never said I did not consider it my business—

Mr. Bryden: You said that you did not review, that you did not know what they are doing. How can they be accountable to you when you do not even know what they are doing?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They are accountable; they are appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and may be removed by him.

Mr. Singer: Have you ever removed anyone?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, who has the floor at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member for Downsview asked if there were several police boards in this province from which members have been removed or asked to resign. This happened recently to appointments of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am dealing with the specific matter of the powers of these non-elected bodies to make laws. I believe it is a sound principle that a body of this character should be in charge of the administration of the police force—a body that, to a certain degree, is removed from politics. I believe that is sound, but this is not the principle that I am objecting to, nor is it the principle to which I have objected on previous occasions. The principle that is objectionable is that these people should have the power to make laws and that the laws they make are not subject to review by anybody, provided that they are operating within the powers delegated to them by the laws that we passed in this House. They are reviewable by the courts only to the extent of determining whether or not they acted with proper jurisdiction.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: I know that my hon. friends over to the left do not give a hoot about democratic principles; they will carry on indefinitely here with their constant barracking and yakking—

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): Nobody gives a hoot for anything except you.

Mr. Bryden: Last year, when this question arose in a somewhat different context, the hon. member for St. George showed a considerable interest it. But I was saying, before the last interruption, in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: These gentlemen do not even care about the rules of this House; that is how little they care about the rule of law.

Mr. Walker: You sound like a duplicating machine.

An hon. member: You butt in on everybody else, but you do not like anybody butting in on you.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Bryden: I trust that the level of the comments coming from here are being well noted—

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): Getting down to your level for a change.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Bryden: The brilliant witticisms, Mr. Chairman, must no doubt be savoured by everyone.

Mr. J. R. Knox (Lambton West): Go ahead; say what the other two speakers have just said ahead of you.

Mr. Bryden: In the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto—as I started to say about five minutes ago; I have had difficulty saying anything since—in this municipality we are doubly afflicted in that we have two of these irresponsible bodies. When I use the word irresponsible, I use it in the sense that they are not accountable to anyone. Two of these bodies inflicted upon us; one is the licensing commission which exercises some of the powers set forth in The Municipal Act; the other is the board of police commissioners. Mr. Chairman, I would say from my observation of them, and it has been fairly substantial especially with regard to the licensing commission, that in the exercise of the legislative powers which we have delegated to them, they are arbitrary, autocratic and bureaucratic. They thumb their noses at the public; they do not care a hoot about the public. The board of police commissioners passed a bylaw which, in effect, purported, among other things, to give the police the power to censor placards that citizens may wish to display. The council of the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto expressed its disapproval of that bylaw, or that particular phase of it, and the board of police commissioners, in effect, told them to mind their own business.

The elected people, the people who should have the power to make laws, have no effect at all on this body that holds itself accountable to nobody. I will not deal with the licensing commission, but I will say that it is even more arbitrary and autocratic. It has passed laws that quite intimately affect the welfare and livelihood of citizens. I was present at some of its hearings when it deigned to listen to the protests of these citizens and it paid no attention to them at all.

No elected body would ever act in the way those people do, because elected members know the day of reckoning comes when they have to account to the electorate. That has a restraining influence on them; it is a desirable and necessary restraint in a democracy, but these bodies hold themselves accountable to nobody. What is even worse is that there are members of the judiciary who are members of boards that make laws. In some cases, a citizen can be hailed before the same member of the judiciary charged with a breach of the law in the making of which that member participated. How an Attorney General can justify such a principle—that a person can be involved in the making of a law and then can try a person who is charged with a breach of that law—I cannot understand. Yet this is the situation that exists in the municipality of Metro Toronto and can presumably exist in any city of the province of Ontario; the principle is the same in all the cities. The boards of police commissioners have these licensing and other regulatory powers to make laws. It is not sufficient to say that their bylaws can be reviewed in the courts; it is not the function of the courts ever to pass on the policy content of legislation. That is the job of elected representatives. I have proposed to the hon. Attorney General, to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) and the government generally on a number of occasions that if it is considered desirable to give some of these powers to make regulations to unelected bodies, at least the regulations should be subject to the approval of the elected councils. But we cannot get that principle accepted either.

I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that the whole question of delegated legislation is becoming a serious and difficult problem in democratic society, in the amount of legislative power that is exercised by people who really are not accountable to the elected representatives. It is too big a problem to be appropriately discussed here, but I would say that the most virulent and dangerous form of delegation is that of authority to bodies like the boards of police commissioners in the various cities of the province and in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, and to the licensing commission in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, which not only are not elected but which include judicial personnel who can try people and convict them on charges of breaching the very bylaws they enacted. I could hardly believe that the hon. Attorney General would support that principle, and yet that is exactly what happens regularly in the city of Toronto.

I can tell from the reaction of the hon. Attorney General, that it is going to take a long time to correct this serious abuse which has been permitted to arise because of legislation enacted by this Legislature in past years. I can warn him, however, that as far as I am concerned, I will not miss an opportunity to bring the matter to his attention, and to urge that he should reconsider the whole principle involved. I feel encouraged to do that and to continue to do it and to make a pest of myself in doing it, if necessary, because there is no doubt at all that what is involved is one of the basic principles of democratic liberty, a principle that I enunciated at the beginning of my remarks.

I would suggest to the hon. Attorney General that he should not content himself with narrow legalistic evasions such as the claim that the bylaw, if objected to, can be appealed to the courts. In other words, somebody has to place himself in jeopardy. That is what the hon. Attorney General is saying. Somebody has to violate the bylaw and run the risk of having a penalty imposed upon him, in order to have it tested even to the point of determining whether or not the board of police commissioners has the power to make it. If the board has the power to make it, whether it is just or unjust, it will stand. There is no doubt about that.

That sort of an answer is not good enough when we are dealing with basic democratic rights. I would recommend to the hon. Attorney General that he should consider the matter in terms of its broad implications for democratic government by free people.

Mr. Chairman: Is the vote carried?

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, this is a serious matter. A democratic right is at stake here. May we hear from the hon. Attorney General how many boards of police commissioners there are in this province?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: How many?

Mr. Sopha: How many are operating?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I cannot tell the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, off-hand, but wherever there is not a committee of council or a whole council acting, in every city there is a board and in those other municipalities outside the cities, wherever there is not a committee of council, or the council itself conducting the police governing, then there is a board of police commissioners.

Mr. Sopha: Well, probably somewhere in the neighbourhood of 100?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Possibly.

Mr. Sopha: Because in the case of most townships, they do not have a board of police commissioners. The police body comes directly under the council.

Now, in the case of the hon. Minister of Highways, in respect to many bylaws, the bylaw does not come into effect until it is approved by him. Similarly in the case of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs: Many bylaws have to be submitted to his department for approval before they become validated.

What is wrong with the concept that all bylaws passed by boards of police commissioners be submitted to the hon. Attorney General before they become valid? Now, I ask this question. I want to go on and I want to add this, so I will make my position very, very clear. I have the assurance in my own mind, and I am sure that it is widely shared in this province, that the people in this Legislature who are concerned about freedom and liberty, are the people that sit in the Opposition benches here, including our friends in the New Democratic Party. I feel so strongly about this, that I would go this far. If the police commissioners in my community passed a bylaw like this—the kind of foolish thing that has been read into the record—and I, in an effort to obey the law went to that police commission and asked for a permit to hold a parade and I was refused, then I say in the interests of my democratic rights that come to me through custom and usage, I would hold the parade anyway, in disobedience of the law. I would do it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And so would I.

Mr. Sopha: I am glad to hear the hon. Attorney General say that. That makes our case complete. I said that I would defy the law and hold a march in protest and the hon. Attorney General said: "So would I." All right, then if we are in common agreement, let us amend that Police Act, to require bylaws to be validated by the consent of the Attorney General. And let us go one step further, let us quash this bylaw. Let us quash this bylaw that is singular in this province. It is the only example of which we know. Then let us do a third thing. No bylaws may be passed by boards of police commissioners in secret, but all bylaws passed, shall on the payment, let us say, of a minimum fee—that is fair—be open to public inspection.

Some hon. members: Is the vote carried?

Mr. Singer: No, Mr. Chairman, I think that the t's should be crossed and the i's dotted. I think it is most significant that when the first law officer of the province says, in agreement with my colleague from Sudbury: "And so would I," and when he says to me in answer to my question that there should not be secret bylaws about matters of public concern, for goodness sake what are the people on the government benches doing when they make these public admissions yet cannot enact them into provincial statutes?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, there is another matter that I wish to raise under vote 202. During the past year, a number of rather disturbing cases have come to public notice of people being arrested and jailed, who apparently were drunk, but were found afterwards, and sometimes in tragic circumstances, to have been perhaps suffering from—what shall I say—a more serious disturbance. There was a well publicized case of a lady in Toronto. I believe she hardly ever touched liquor in her life. She died, as we know, and it was found she had suffered a stroke, I believe.

There was a case in Lindsay a few months ago of a man who was taken and put in confinement in a police cell because it was thought that he was drunk. He had been found unconscious but it was later discovered that actually he had suffered from a collapsed lung and he had died without medical attention.

There have been one or two other cases like this. I believe that the board of police commissioners in the city of Toronto—I do not have the precise information in front of me—but I believe that they have issued an instruction to police officers in Metro Toronto that a person who is apparently ill or unconscious should be taken to hospital rather than to a police cell, I think that is the best place to take such a person. Even if the cause of the person's disability is acute alcohol poisoning, I would suggest that a person who is unconscious or acutely ill belongs in hospital and not in a jail cell.

Sometimes, as we have noted, mistakes are made and the person has not even touched liquor. But even if he has, let us say he is what we call "dead drunk," a person who is dead drunk is in a dangerous condition. His condition could readily be fatal. I think that such a person should automatically be taken to hospital. As I say, I am not entirely familiar with the regulation in Toronto, but I believe it is if the import that people who appear to be very ill or are unconscious should automatically go to hospital, not to jails. I am wondering if there is any thought on the part of the police commission for Ontario, or of the hon. Attorney General to make that sort of policy generally applicable throughout the province.

Let us take sick people, whether the cause of the sickness is alcohol or anything else, to hospital and not to jail—in the first instance at any rate, until the extent of their disability has been diagnosed.

Has this matter been under consideration? Has any action been taken, or is it contemplated that any action may be taken?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am aware that there have been throughout the province or across the province in the past year a very few cases—I have noted them in the press, reports of them—where some person dead drunk, as the hon. member says, or suffering really from alcoholic poisoning or an excess of alcohol, and in one or two cases persons who are ill from some other form of disease have unfortunately been taken to the lock-up, the jail, and succumbed through ignorance of their condition or through the lack of perception on the part of the police that they were ill and the watching of them through the hours of the night.

This is something that has come to our attention. I think it is a situation that is not entirely new and has existed; perhaps it is more prevalent today with the increased use of alcohol which seems to be a fact. We have not contemplated the passage of any regulations or laws or rules with respect to this, but I think we are entitled to rely on the local governing bodies of police which I think exercise care and conscientious consideration of these matters, and on the good sense of police officers generally in all our police forces. I think that anything you might do in the way of legislation—perhaps one could meet the situation by passing a law saying that any person picked up unconscious should be taken to a hospital. Now, whether this is sensible or not would certainly be open, I think, to debate, because I am sure the hon. members are aware that any person who, of their own free will indulged to tremendous excess in alcohol and makes themselves unconscious and passes out, are we to then say that those persons must be taken by the policemen when he picks them up to a hospital where—let me say, knowing some little bit about hospitals—it is very difficult even if you are really ill, really suffering, to gain entry. Does the hon. member suggest that we pass a law of this nature? I say I think we may rely upon the common sense of our police governing body and on the good sense of the police officers who give us the service of policemen throughout this province.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have the most complete confidence in the good sense of police officers, but as to their capacity as medical diagnosticians I have no confidence at all.

I am suggesting to the hon. Attorney General that a person who is unconscious is sick and quite possibly dangerously sick. Even if the cause is alcohol poisoning, he is still sick and he may be dangerously ill, and of course there have been cases where a person found unconscious had not had any alcohol at all, the cause of his illness being something entirely different, as in the case of the man in Lindsay who had a collapsed lung.

Now the reason this tragedy arose—at any rate, the reason the man died in the police cell with no medical attention at all, perhaps he would have died anyway—was that the case had been left to the good sense of the police officer concerned. I am sure he used his good judgment to the best of his ability but he had no capacity as a medical diagnostician at all.

I do not think police officers should be put in the position where they have to try to diagnose the cause of unconsciousness when they find a person unconscious. It is far better to take the person to the hospital. If the hospital considers the man's condition is not dangerous and that he could, shall we say, sleep it off in a police cell; fine! But let that be determined by a medical practitioner in the first instance. I do not think it is a matter of passing a law, although I suppose this is a quibble, I think it could be a matter of policy, of regulation, a policy directive to police officers relating to the conduct of their duties.

As I understand it, this is now what has become the policy in the city of Toronto, that such people are to be taken to hospital. I think we have the most acute shortage of hospitals of any major municipality in the province, but apparently here the board of police commissioners considers that it is feasible to require that anybody who is unconscious must first of all go to the hospital. I think the policy used to be that he would be taken first to the police station. Then if the police really got worried they took him to the hospital, and sometimes it was too late. When they found it was a real cause of worry it was too late—the person was beyond help.

Now, as I understand it, the opposite policy has been adopted. It seems to me a sensible policy. True, our hospitals are all overcrowded. That will be an occasion for a debate on some other time. But they still will handle emergencies. If an emergency case comes in they will look at the person, and if he needs treatment, they will give him whatever they think is necessary.

I think the hon. Attorney General might consider the same sort of policy that has apparently been adopted in Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am willing, Mr. Chairman, to take the matter under study and consideration.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): While we are on this subject, Mr. Chairman, the former Attorney General of this province, now the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, once told us that he felt that drunks should not be treated as criminals but they should be out on a farm, that this was the proper way to handle drunks, that we should consider those who drink too much as sick people. I know we get speeches to this effect every once in a while, but I wonder if there is any possibility of the hon. Attorney General having any definite policy in this regard.

First of all, where someone is sick they would not end up in jail if they did have such a policy. There are many instances where drunks should be sent home in a taxi, if the police would show some common sense instead of putting them in a cell, because let us bear in mind that 60 per cent of the people who go into the Don jail usually have something to do with liquor. A large proportion of them are drunks, and it is my contention that the vast majority of them should not be there.

I realize that part of this is the criminal code and may in many ways affect the federal government, but certainly there is a responsibility upon you as the Attorney General of the province to bring about the change in a federal law and it certainly affects the administration of justice in Ontario. I think it is long overdue, that the whole approach to intoxication should be changed, that it is ridiculous to call it a crime.

In the vast majority of cases people are sick, and when I use that term "sick" I mean from drinking too much. I was wondering if there was any possibility of the hon. Attorney General setting up a commission or a committee to go into this problem to see if a reform could be made in the law. We talk about it year in and year out, but nothing is ever done. It is long overdue for a change. I would like to know the views of the hon. Attorney General on this matter.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, it is not, if I may say with some respect to the hon. member for Parkdale, it is not a matter of federal law. We have in our Liquor Control Act now—I cannot recite the number of the section—there is a power in the Act for a judge or a magistrate; a magistrate particularly assessing a penalty in case of drunkenness, if in his opinion, he decides a sentence may be imposed of a sufficient length to afford the time and opportunity for a cure, he may impose such a sentence. Now, whether he does or not, I think—I see the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) is not here, but I am sure he would support me in this if he were—whether the magistrate imposes such a sentence or not, if he imposes a term of 30 days, 60 days or 90 days or something of this nature, the person who receives such a sentence I think almost invariably is examined, and he is assessed from two points of view or two evaluation points.

One is whether he is desirous—he must have the desire, the attitude that he wishes to have treatment—and secondly, and this is also just as important, whether in the assessment of those competent persons treatment is likely to be effective. If this is so, to the extent of the facilities that we have—and I must confess they are not, in my view at least, adequate for treatment of alcoholics and persons who are habitual alcoholics—then such person is given the opportunity and the treatment is applied to him. I must tell you that in many cases it is found that even with that assessment and that evaluation of his attitude and of the possibility of treatment being beneficial, it is found after a short time that the attitude is not conducive to the treatment being any good, and the prisoner is returned and he serves his sentence, less the reduction he gets for good behaviour or on an application for clemency.

It is a tremendous problem, the alcoholic problem. I do not know the answer standing here. I just do not know what the answer is—perhaps some special type of institution, whether it is treatment or whether it is containment or whether it is some sort of activity, something of this nature. But as it is today, we are day after day sending the habitual drunkard to jail for 30 days or 60 days or 90 days and he is on the country during that time. Attempts are made to treat him in many cases and in a great majority of cases treatment has no effect whatsoever.

It is not a matter of changing the federal law, it is a matter perhaps of finding a new system, a new method of treatment, and copying the best, the most effective methods which have been found elsewhere in providing facilities which will afford us the opportunity of dealing with this tremendous problem in the best way.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, does the hon. Attorney General take the view that this matter comes under vote 202? I have some points I would like to raise with regard to it but I was under the impression that it probably would come under vote 206.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It really comes under The Department of Health and The Department of Reform Institutions, quite frankly.

Mr. Bryden: No, the hon. Attorney General's department is involved.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, and I am very interested in it and I think it is a matter for study; it is a matter for study certainly with my colleagues, the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions and with the hon. Minister of Health. Only in this way, by a study of this nature, and a very deep study, can this problem be solved. That is my view.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, now that the matter has been raised we might as well deal with whatever we have to deal with. I would suggest to the hon. Attorney General that the government opposite has been saying that it is a matter that has been under study for as long as I can remember. I can remember when the hon. gentleman who now holds the portfolio of Lands and Forests was Attorney General, he presented to this House quite an ambitious-sounding and promising-sounding plan of special treatment centres for chronic alcoholics. Unfortunately, the press, through a curious lapse, contrived to label the treatment centres that the then Attorney General had in mind as "drunk farms." This became a short form for headlines; I think a most unfortunate expression.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): I did not say that.

Mr. Bryden: No, I know you did not, it was the press in its headlines that kept referring to "drunk farms" that the then Attorney General was going to set up. It was a most unfortunate use of words.

By and large, such treatment centres never did get off the ground. I think perhaps one that has a very limited capacity got into operation. I think there is a treatment centre in the mental hospital at Mimico, but as the hon. Attorney General has indicated—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It is not a mental hospital.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. What in the world has this got to do with the Ontario police commission? We have really caroused all over for the last three or four hours, but drunk farms do not seem to fit into the Ontario police commission. That is my point of order. How about it?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am quite prepared to leave this until vote 206. That is where I had intended to raise it, but the hon. Attorney General and the hon. member for Parkdale had already started discussing it, so I suggested to you, and heard no objection from you, that perhaps we might as well clean it off now. That was while the hon. member for High Park was asleep.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, on a point of privilege, this member has been sitting here right along and I have listened to all the debate on the police commission and this is away out, this is away off. That is why I raised the point and I think the point was well taken because he admitted it was on 206.

Mr. Bryden: I ask the Chairman for his instruction.

Mr. Chairman: I thought we were going to have it passed, that is why I let the member go ahead. I thought it was just about passed.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, just a minute. The point I raised here under this vote relating to people being picked up in an unconscious condition had nothing to do with the treatment of alcoholics. It was perfectly in order under 202. I certainly am not finished with the matters I want to raise with regard to the treatment of alcoholics but I am quite prepared to accept whatever ruling you want to make, either to clean it up now or wait until 206.

Mr. Chairman: We will do it on 206.

Mr. Bryden: Okay, fine.

Vote 202 agreed to.

On vote 203:

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on vote 203, it has been very difficult for me to prepare a reasonable criticism in view of the lack of answers I have had to two of my questions on the order paper—questions numbers 7 and 37. Question 7 asked for a detailed list of the legal work done by persons outside the government for various government departments and boards and commissions. Question 37 asked for a listing of those legal persons who are employed by all boards and commissions and departments of government.

Had this information been available in advance of these estimates then it would have been a very simple matter to discover quickly and authoritatively just how many outside lawyers had been hired to draft statutes, to prepare regulations and to do the sort of things that I would have contemplated the legislative counsel's branch of government should be doing. I have the greatest respect for the abilities of Mr. McTavish and Mr. Alcombrack and Mr. Stone in that branch. There may be others there whom I am not familiar with, but I have come into contact, substantial contact, with these three gentlemen, and I think they are very able. However, it is completely impossible to discover from the government just the extent to which outside help is required to do the work that I think properly lies within the legislative counsel's branch.

I recall, for instance, just a year or two ago that either my colleague, the hon. member for Sudbury, or I asked the question and discovered that a former civil servant who had gone into private practice had been retained to draft an Act and had been paid the sum of some $20,000. He was a very fine man, and a very able man, but he had seen fit for reasons of his own to leave the government service and he had gone into private practice. The government had him for a while at a sum considerably less than $20,000 a year, but he had gone into private practice and then had drafted a statute for the government and sent it a bill for $20,000, which it paid. I would like to know how many dollars the government paid in this way in the year 1964, but we have not got that sort of information available.

There may be a half dozen or a dozen persons of this type who have had to be called upon because the time of people such as McTavish, Alcombrack or Stone just has not been available. If this is so, I would think it would be of substantial importance to determine how many dollars this has cost the province of Ontario. If it has cost above the average going price for a senior lawyer, I ask the hon. Attorney General, and I can only guess because we have not the facts and figures here, I ask the hon. Attorney General why he has not hired several senior lawyers and put them in to the legislative counsel's branch.

The other thing that concerns me very much is the necessity apparently that exists in government to hire outside counsel to act as counsel for commissions. I do not know what these outside counsels would ask per day. I know there is a very able young man who acted as counsel for the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts. I would be very surprised if his bill to the government was less than $100 a day.

There is a very prominent counsel, one of the leading counsel in the province of Ontario, who has acted as counsel to the committee on youth. I would be very surprised if his bill was less than five times the amount of the counsel on the committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts has been.

Can the hon. Attorney General tell us why there is not available within government service, within this branch, within the legislative counsel division, sufficient strength and sufficient ability in counsel to assign personnel employed by government to these committees? The legislative counsel's division is a non-political group, they are here as advisors to the whole House, to all the members of the Legislature. I, as most of the members of the Legislature, undoubtedly have had occasions to call on them for their services and their services have been of inestimable value. They are confidential, they carry on in the true traditions of their services. Now why should not the legislative counsel's division have available within its strength, personnel to assign to the select committee on aging, the select committee on youth, the select committee on company law that is about to be set up, or any one of the other select committees?

Should it be necessary or should it be that important that the government must spend thousands of dollars—and I say thousands of dollars designedly—to hire outside counsel? It may be that the duties of the select committee on youth and the select committee on The Municipal Act and so on, are that important that the leading counsel in the province of Ontario should be brought in and be paid a per diem rate commensurate with their services. But it would seem to me that this has become the rule rather than the exception. It would seem to me that the retaining of outside counsel of the highest calibre available should be the exception. There may well be occasions, Mr. Chairman, when the best available counsel in the province should be assigned and should be paid for his work—and you are not going to get him unless you pay him for his work—should be assigned on a particular task that only he can do.

But going back to the select committee on municipal affairs—when this committee started off, as the hon. member for High Park knows, the first lawyer who was assigned to it was a very junior young man who had just been retained by The Department of Municipal Affairs, just fresh out of law school. And the first job that was given to him was to be counsel to the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts. This was the first legal job he had. And he did such a fine job and he gained so much experience in a year's time that one day he picked up the Weekly Notes and he saw an ad that in the town of Fort William they wanted a municipal solicitor. He applied, he went to Fort William, and doubled or earned two and a half times the salary that he was being paid here.

It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that if in the branch of the legislative counsel we were prepared to pay good enough salaries to attract lawyers of seniority and ability to surround Messrs. McTavish, Alcombrack and Stone and others with colleagues of equal ability, that we would be performing a very great service to the people of the province of Ontario. We would be performing a very great service to all the hon. members of the Legislature. We would have available to all departments, competent counsel to advise insofar as statutes are concerned, to advise about the drafting of regulations, to advise committees, to advise the standing committees.

I would think that every standing committee should have a permanent secretariat and we could get into a great sort of discussion on the rules: the standing committee on legal bills, the standing committee on private bills, and so on. Each could and should perhaps have a permanent secretariat consisting of a representative of the legislative counsel division. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in this very important branch the government has fallen far short of providing the service to the people of Ontario that it should. The detail, the extent to which this is true, unfortunately I cannot provide, because the answers to questions 7 and 37 have not been provided.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, this is a comparatively small vote. I note that the increase over previous estimates is $11,000, resulting from the annual increments of salaries, salary revisions and reclassifications.

I must agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that it is proper and good policy, a policy to which I subscribe, that where possible, in every case where it can be done with justification we have our own counsel in the department to look after matters on the legal side for government. I think I may say to him that it is a rule that only in the exceptional case where some matter of special import, or where there is outstanding counsel specializing in such field of law available, do we seek and obtain such counsel.

This is a policy followed by business and to do otherwise, to retain on staff in the government counsel of that nature, a specialist, to retain him all the time on staff would be a mistake and would cost far more than it would be worth to do so. Not in a single case where we have been dealing with legislation in The Department of the Attorney General—I cannot speak for all other departments of government—have we seen fit or have we found it necessary to consult outside counsel to advise on legislation presented to this House in any branch of the law being handled by The Department of the Attorney General. I am not sure that pertains to or obtains with other departments of the government, but I think this is pretty much general. We advise counsel—and I give the legislative counsel credit—we advise all departments of government; some of them have certain legal counsel at their call and on their staff. I am not sure whether Mr. McTavish is present, but I know that I may say this, because I am aware of his attitude, that he has on his staff, sufficient and capable counsel to do the work properly and competently which is assigned to the branch of the legislative counsel of this government.

When you come to the vote, which I think is perhaps 205, on the civil law division, I shall be able to enlighten this House with something of the type of work done by the legal staff which are in my department, as distinct from the legislative counsel. But I think that here we have a situation which is very satisfactory—very competent counsel. They tell us, and I think I may accept their word, that they are sufficient unto the task and my own observation is that the task is very well done.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: May I say this, I regret that my hon. friend has not in his hands the answers to questions 7 and 37. I may say that there has been a great deal of work—

Mr. Singer: Yes, I appreciate that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There has been a great deal of work and I am at the moment handling certain of the material, which is not yet complete, with respect to question 7, and which runs into several pages and which still requires, since it is a matter of payment, checking by Treasury and the officials there. This entails a great deal of work. I do not have 37 in front of me, but I would ask—

Mr. Singer: Thirty-seven is simply a request, a listing of all the—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. Well, I would ask my hon. friend not to lose hope. I think I may yet get them in his hands very shortly.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on the same theme, unless you want to get on, I just want to finish very briefly. Mr. Chairman, I can appreciate what the hon. Attorney General says and I share with him his very high esteem of the three gentlemen I have named. This, I think, is an efficient branch, but how many times have you had to go outside, as of a couple of years ago? There is no point in naming who did what Act for $20,000. It is there and the facts are available. How many times that had to happen! The thing that concerns me very much is that we have to call in outside counsel for select committees.

This decision does not appear to have been made by the hon. Attorney General's department. It appears to have been made—well, on the committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts, it appears to have been made substantially by the chairman of that committee. There does not seem to have been any consultation with the hon. Attorney General's department, and back to a theme that my colleague from Sudbury and I have enunciated over the six years we have both been here, we believe that the hon. Attorney General should be all of the law to all of the departments, and I do not think he is today.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would like to isolate the problem as I see it, under this particular vote. The hon. Attorney General has indicated that the legislative counsel feels that he has adequate staff to carry out the functions as he sees it of the legislative's counsel's division of The Department of The Attorney General, but this, to my mind, indicates the failure of the hon. Attorney General to assume the responsibility in terms of the function of the legislative counsel's division to make certain that this House gets at the proper time the detailed regulations which are provided for in practically every statute of importance which comes before this House. Now, this matter has been dealt with on a number of occasions. The questions are almost rhetorical because the government is not prepared, apparently, to do anything at all about providing a method by which this assembly, either assembled as a whole in committee or by one of the committees of this assembly, can scrutinize carefully the regulations which are an integral part of each statute of importance passed by this legislative assembly.

The only way in which this can be done is if the legislative's counsel's division is enlarged so that when each bill is presented to this assembly or presented following second reading to committee for detailed examination, the regulations will be available at the same time. Now, let no one underestimate the importance of the area covered by regulations. I am certain every hon. member of this House could pick out one statute where the actual power contained in the statute for the government to pass regulations, far exceeds the powers actually contained in the body of the statute itself.

One of the latest that has come before this assembly is the provision in The Training Schools Act of 1965, where elaborate provisions are set forth for the committal of juveniles to the training schools by appearances before the judge, with all sorts of criteria established under which that committal may take place, but on the other hand, we find in section 28 of that bill, that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the conditions under which children may leave training schools.

Now, in my opinion and the opinion of our party, it is equally important to provide, either in the statute or by specified regulations which are scrutinized by this assembly, the rules under which a person who has lost his liberty and is incarcerated or under detention in a training school can, in fact, be released. It is no answer to this party to say that, "Well, of course they can have final resort to the prerogative writ of habeas corpus"; that is a ridiculous and extreme example of the way in which such writs should be used.

But at the present time, as we sit here in this Legislature with The Training Schools Act having been passed and I believe now in force in the province of Ontario, we have not seen the regulations which prescribe the methods under which any child may be released from a training school. There is no recourse as I see it today, sitting here, no recourse available except by writ of habeas corpus, which is completely out of keeping with the provisions of The Training Schools Act and with the way in which it should function.

Now, as I say, there are many other examples. I would ask the hon. Attorney General to answer us tonight in this Legislature, whether any thought is given to the possibility of making provision for these regulations to be made available in the House as and when bills are introduced for consideration by the House. The hon. member for Woodbine has on other occasions in this House suggested that there be a committee of this Legislature sitting year round, if necessary, so that if it is not possible to draft the regulations and have them available for discussion in this House, at least there be a committee of this Legislature which would sit on a year-round basis to scrutinize regulations before they are published and before they are filed with the registrar of regulations. This, to my mind, is the sum and substance of the vote of the legislative counsel's division and I would like to have the answer of the hon. Attorney General about what he is going to do about this important question.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think the commentaries of the hon. member for Riverdale are very pertinent and very much to the point and certainly worthy of the utmost consideration. I think the difficulty has been this: This is the problem which is still there; perhaps it can be met. When one is drafting a law, when one is drafting an Act, a piece of legislation, there are principles, rules of conduct or procedure which must be followed. These can be, with some fair success and with the help of the hon. members of the House in committee of the whole House or in the various committees, shaped into form and serve reasonably well. When one comes to the matter of regulations, which accompany an Act, they should be and I think they are generally designed to be the rules which are the practical—not the principles—but the practical rules which are to be applied in the administration of the Act, in the carrying out of certain acts, functions, things which should not properly be written in as principles of legislation, in a bill.

Therefore, in order to arrive at new regulations, to devise them, to frame them, to fit the picture, it is almost necessary in many cases almost to have some practical experience in the working of the Act. For instance, I can think of—at least, no instance comes to mind quicker at the moment than the recent piece of legislation passed at the last session and through the intervening months of last summer brought into form with appendant regulations, The Used Car Dealers Act. In order to try out and assess a set of regulations which we felt would work, as to the actual detail of the working of the Act to fit the principles laid down in legislation it took some weeks—yes, I would say some months—to find regulations which we felt would be practical, which would work in practice.

Now this may not be the case in every Act and not every Act is a completely new start such as The Used Car Dealers Act. I can think of an Act in my own department, amended slightly this year, The Registry Act. I am not sure whether that amendment at this moment requires one or two regulations to match the principle of legislation which I am asking the House to enact.

But it is not always possible to bring in with the Act, the provisions of the sections, the regulations which fit it. I am prepared to say to the hon. member that I think it is a problem that should be capable of being met. I like the idea, because I think the more complete we can make our legislation while we sit here together and discuss it, while this is our business, the more help we can get from all sides of the House the better. If there is something I can do, and I think perhaps there is, in meeting this problem, I certainly shall be glad—and I have made a note of it—to take it under consideration and see if it can be worked out.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, two matters of information more than anything else: What is the item of $30,000 for law revision and other committees' expenses?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have a note in my estimates, Mr. Chairman, that this item of $30,000 applies as estimates for law revision and other committees' expenses which are included in this division. This vote, this year, and this appropriation is required to provide for service and expense of committees to consider and recommend law revisions in the administration of justice.

The actual expenditure during the current fiscal year for the 10-month period ended January 31, 1965 amounted to $17,753.05. Some of the typical payments which were made in that expenditure during that year were as follows: The joint committee on legal aid expenses, advertising in various Ontario papers, public hearings, was an item of $943.61. The cost of reporting and transcripts of meetings—that is in the legal aid committee—$4,310.88. There were travelling expenses of the committee to various locations, $4,357.26. There were travelling expenses of the committee re medical evidence, which report I tabled a few days ago, for $819.94. Payments to Queen's University re the seminar on the persistent offender, which was a study, $2,136.20. And there were miscellaneous and unanalyzed items which I have in my notes here of $4,783.83.

Mr. Renwick: Thank you.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, item 5 of this vote is conference on the uniformity of law. There is a small sum there, some $5,000, set aside for this. I would presume that this portion of this vote is directed to conferences designed to bring uniformity of law as amongst the provinces.

I am sure the hon. Attorney General is as familiar as most lawyers are with bulletins such as the Canada Trust bulletin that come out from month to month, by and large, I suppose, to the legal profession and to trust officers and that sort of thing. But bulletin No. 178 of Canada Trust dated February, 1965, I thought, was most pertinent to this particular vote in this item.

Just quoting two paragraphs or three paragraphs from that bulletin, it says this:

Our attention is naturally directed towards laws governing estates and trusts. The law of intestate succession is another example of the diversity between provinces in dealing with the same set of circumstances. In Quebec a widow with children receives one-third of her husband's estate if he dies without a will. In Ontario and Alberta she would receive the first $20,000 plus a portion of the remainder. While in other provinces she would receive the first $10,000, plus a portion.

This kind of disparity—and this is in italics, Mr. Chairman:

—among provinces extends over a wide range of statutes.

The bulletin goes on to say:

The rapid communication systems which allow business generally to be conducted at national as well as local levels and the mobility of the Canadian working force along with the economic affluence have caused a tremendous change in our way of life.

Thus the need for the uniformity of law is more pressing than at any previous time in our history.

And the hon. Attorney General nods in agreement as I thought he would.

Differences in the provincial statutes should be eliminated so that Canadians can be sure in the knowledge that wherever they reside in Canada, the law will be the same.

Well, perhaps that is the real ideal, but could be as similar as possible.

A major step in this direction was taken a few years ago when all provinces except Quebec introduced uniform legislation governing life insurance.

Then the moral of this bulletin is in this paragraph:

Is it expecting too much from provincial legislators to organize an effective representative committee for provinces to review existing legislation and develop uniformity of the law? As Canadians we should all receive the same advantages under the statutes of any province in which we might choose to reside.

To this sentiment I say, "amen," and I am sure the hon. Attorney General does, too. I wonder how far the $5,000 that he has in this vote will go along towards that end.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, it goes a long way, Mr. Chairman.

This is a continuing committee, a continuing study of the legislative counsel. Our department is very active in it and the expenditures last year, I think, actually, according to my memorandum here, ran something over $7,000. The conference this year is, I believe, at Niagara Falls. Much has been accomplished and as I say, this continues and each year some progress is made. My hon. friend has mentioned one area in which legislation was achieved. I think there is room for this in the securities field.

Mr. Singer: Succession duties!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Succession duties and the reciprocal field of legislation is an approach to it. This is a work which I think is very important. Perhaps I should have asked for more funds, but I am glad to have this generous attitude expressed and indicated. That is all I would say.

Vote 203 agreed to.

On vote 204:

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on vote 204, again I run into the same difficulty because I have not the answers to questions 7 and 37. It is very difficult to criticize or even to know too much about the personnel branch if we do not know how many lawyers there are employed by government.

This is sort of an inside administrative body of the hon. Attorney General's department and as such I would imagine—certainly I have not come into very great contact with it—I would be surprised if too many hon. members of the Legislature other than the hon. Attorney General himself have come into contact with it.

One of the indicators as to whether or not we have enough personnel in the hon. Attorney General's department, I suppose, would be in the statistics which would be shown in the answers.

I suppose, in asking the hon. Attorney General what this administration and finance branch does, we are going to just get sort of a general answer that they administer and look after the finances. But to give us some sort of insight into the internal functioning of the hon. Attorney General's department I think it would be well worthwhile if the hon. Attorney General could elaborate perhaps to some extent on what this branch under its executive director actually does.

Mr. Sopha: Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, it is a new vote; I take it. I looked in the public accounts for the fiscal year 1964 and I could not find any vote under this heading. Perhaps that is a reflection of the reorganization of the department.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am sorry.

Mr. Sopha: I say I looked in the public accounts for the fiscal year 1964 and I could not find any vote that was comparable to vote 204.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think probably the answer is—and that is what I was looking for—the reorganization which I mentioned in my remarks in the introduction of the estimates to the House. There has been a very substantial reorganization to bring departments together which are performing the same or similar services, and to organize them so we can effect economies and efficiency in the organization of the department.

So this is quite possible—this may not be found for comparison purposes in any single department of a previous year's estimates. But I think the detail which is shown here is before hon. members in the estimates for the department.

There are the salaries which do not need too much explanation, and travelling expenses, which are pretty much standard items; you may question me on the amount.

And then we come to "maintenance" and then we observe items: "Exhibition expenses," we make a display at the Canadian national exhibition on behalf of this department to try to—it is rather an educational effort to show what services The Department of the Attorney General renders on the public protection side and in the administration of justice and the enforcement of law, emergency measures and so on—fire included, police and so on. That is an item of $25,000, the same as the previous year.

"Workmen's compensation board," a very small item which I think needs no explanation, for our employees; "unemployment insurance," an item of $3,000; "fidelity bonds" for employees of the department; then "compassionate allowances"—if any one would like details of that I can give them; they are actually reduced by reason of the fact that certain persons who were entitled to them have passed on; "training and development"—I may have to look at that; it has a relation to probation services and to provide bursaries in that field; then we have an item of $5,000 for "conferences and conventions," and then the "Attorney General's law library," an item of $5,000.

I think, unless there is some specific question of detail which I would be glad to answer, that is all I would offer at the moment.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if this is the present extent contemplated of reorganization. The hon. Attorney General did comment in his opening remarks on the speech I made in the Budget debate on February 9, where I put forward several suggestions as to a very substantial and perhaps different type of reorganization of the administration of law in the province of Ontario. Is what is contained in this vote 204 the extent to which the hon. Attorney General at present projects the organization of this department, or are there any new plans for organization?

The hon. Attorney General commented in his opening remarks, as I recall, that he listened with interest to what I had to say on February 9, but I think that is about as far as we got. Does he think that there is merit in what I said? Is he going to adopt any of the ideas, or is he satisfied that the present setup for administration of finance under these 12 votes and these 12 branches is really all that is needed for the moment in his department?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I will give some credit to the hon. member. I think I said in my remarks that I had accepted and adopted certain suggestions made from all sides of this House, not the least, I said, from my hon. friends in the Opposition and I quite frankly say that I appreciate those suggestions. I think that it is the duty and function of Opposition to offer them constructively and critically and I am glad to have them. But I think I have anticipated my hon. friend in many areas, and I outlined the reorganization which has taken place in this department. Again much credit is due to my predecessor, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass) who instituted this, and which I have simply carried on.

I think we have associated together—and surely I do not have to repeat; by now it is in Hansard, in any event—the seven major divisions of The Department of the Attorney General resulting from this reorganization, which have brought together those functions and those areas of the department that have to do with certain features of the administration of justice, the enforcement of law, the protection of the public, and so on. I have set them all out. Some of the ideas of my hon. friend will be found there; he will find them incorporated and I give him full credit.

This division is the one that ties them all together and sees that—if I may say so—they are properly run in an administrative sense, and sees to the funds that are necessary for that purpose.

Mr. Singer: To be a little more specific then, has the hon. Attorney General any plans to become all of the law for the province of Ontario? Has he plans to take on to himself responsibility for the legal branch of my good friend, the hon. Minister of Highways? He has some six lawyers in there. Has he some intention of taking on to himself the responsibility for the legal branch of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs? All the other lawyers who are tucked away in various departments or cubby holes—does the hon. Attorney General agree with me that they should be his responsibility?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I am quite prepared to give my hon. friend a categorical answer. I think it is a very interesting thought. Perhaps if I were a personally ambitious man, I might like to say that I would like to be all the law, but not that I know of, and I am only being perhaps a little facetious in saying it.

I think I can tell my hon. friend this, that insofar as the legislation which comes to this House is concerned, every single, solitary bit of it comes through the department of the legislative counsel, which I like to regard as in the aegis of my department.

My colleague, the hon. Minister of Highways, has some legal gentlemen—

Mr. Singer: Six.

Hon. Mr. Wishart:—and I was talking with the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) today. We were chatting in a rather jovial way about some question of law and I understood that he has at least one adviser over there. I do not know—

Mr. Singer: Municipal affairs, three or four.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would say this—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, if I may make myself heard, I would say this: I am not sure it is the wisest or most efficient thing to do, to have all the lawyers, all the law, entirely under the control, the thumb, of the Attorney General. I think there is a field for lawyers to advise departments, but when legislation comes forward I think in order that it may have the same approach, the same view and be correlated, then it is good that it come through the department of the legislative counsel and this is being accomplished at this time. I am still quite open to think about and consider the suggestion of the hon. member for Downsview but at the moment I am not quite all the law in the sense that he likes to think about it.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I am going to rise here and if the order of the evening is to ask questions, although probably this is more appropriately the role of the official Opposition, I think I will ask the hon. member for Downsview a question that might have something to do with the point he raised.

I ask the hon. member to consider this, if he would be fair enough to do it. He has made reference to the fact that the branch of The Department of Highways comprises a director of legal services and—probably he is quite right—a staff of six—it is no less than that, it is probably more. Would he not think that it is sensible and appropriate to locate legal people in a department that has certain specific legal functions to perform, in close association with the very functions of the department involving legal services—to place them there under the direct jurisdiction, shall we say, of the department and the administrative control of the Deputy Minister, rather than assign them all to one department, as he says, to make the Attorney General all the law?

I think this is so probably in terms of legislation, Mr. Chairman, when, as it has been stated by the hon. Attorney General, the legislation advanced in terms of any department for consideration by the House is considered by legislative counsel, and probably written in terms of all its requirements by legislative counsel. I am not knowledgeable in the legal field. I ask the hon. member, in terms of practical common sense, if this is not good business and if it is good business in The Department of Highways, if he is prepared to admit that, is it not good business in terms of any department where the specific functions of a department have certain connotations and overtones with the legal requirements of the department, not only legislative, but all the legal performance, and all the legal pursuances, if you like, of a department? Is it not sensible, that the legislation be examined carefully before it is submitted to the House for approval by officers of the Crown under the jurisdiction of the hon. Attorney General? I ask him to examine that and think sensibly about it before he proposes to the hon. Attorney General that he should be all the law.

Mr. Trotter: He did not say that.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Oh yes, he did say that. Those are the very words he used. Just think about it a little bit. I simply propose that in terms of a question, because I think it is worth some sensible examination, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am delighted that my friend, the hon. Minister of Highways has asked that question and other than his last phrase, I will not even dwell on that. He just sort of added a little icing to the cake.

I would think that if the hon. Minister of Highways thought about this problem for a moment he would recognize that the theory, and it is not a new theory, that we have been advancing—my hon. colleague from Sudbury and I have been saying this for the six years that we have been here. We are not suggesting that there should not be legal advice available to the hon. Minister of Highways. Maybe you need six lawyers or maybe you need ten lawyers or maybe you need 25 lawyers to do your job properly, but what we do suggest is that those people should be the hon. Attorney General's lawyers and not your lawyers, not the lawyers of the hon. Provincial Treasurer, or the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), or the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

This does not mean that you have to put your hat and coat on and go over to his office any time you want legal advice, but it means that the end responsibility for getting legal advice is the responsibility of people assigned to you by the hon. Attorney General, who is their boss. Now, what we have today is an entirely different thing. You and your deputy are the boss of those six men and—oh yes, you are, and you can shake your head from today till tomorrow—those people are hired by you, they are hired by your civil service, they are responsible to you and from time to time they get into serious disagreements with other departments, and I will not mention them. I have got one specific example in mind and I have no intention of bringing this up.

I know that there is one solicitor on your staff who feels very bitter about advice that another department gave him in a legal matter. Now I do not think this should be so. I am not concerned about the issue, whether he is right or somebody else is right. That is not the point. The point is that there should be one source of legal authority and legal responsibility advising government, and if this year you want another lawyer, then you tell the hon. Attorney General that you want another lawyer and he will assign him. He may take a lawyer that has been in The Department of Highways and next year put him in The Department of Health, so that eventually you build up a broad civil service of legal advisors who know the field of government and know it well. But they are the hon. Attorney General's lawyers. They are able to bring independent minds to their tasks when they advise your deputy or yourself. They are able to say, "We are sorry, Mr. Minister, even though we know you want to do that, we are forced to tell you that legally you cannot do it."

Now, it takes a pretty brave lawyer who is hired by you to put himself in that position, whereas if he was the hon. Attorney General's lawyer, he could do that and he would do that. That is the point, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That is your point.

Mr. Sopha: Then in addition, it ought to be pointed out that the hon. Minister of Highways is not content with the six he has on full staff; six are not enough for the legal work that he must do in his department. He spends hundreds of thousands of dollars of public moneys in hiring lawyers downtown.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Indeed?

Mr. Sopha: Yes, and up until recently we hear the rumours bouncing off the walls, he had a special favourite of one law firm downtown and the largesse bestowed by him and his predecessor, the dairyman from Dunnville and others in the department, on this particular firm is magnificent to behold. I really hesitate to conjure up the total sum that that one law firm has been paid.

Now, the point made by my hon. friend from Downsview and which has been reiterated every year by us, is that we consider it to be a distressing thing when the government of this province is represented in the courts or before public tribunals by lawyers who are carrying on private practices. When the government is in the courts, when the rights of the Sovereign are being tested, when the public interest is involved in litigation, the person who should be there is the representative of the Attorney General. I say again, you profess mightily to look to Great Britain for inspiration, but you choose very carefully. In Great Britain, the Attorney General is all the law.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): How about Ottawa?

Mr. Singer: And in Ottawa too, my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Take a look at the estimates of the House of Commons—

Mr. Sopha: In Great Britain the Attorney General is all of the law.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: All right, I am not going to repeat that statement.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: —and where it is spread around, and how it is spread and to whom. Take a look at that.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I myself—could I get a word in?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: And the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson), knows all about it, too.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor, could I get a word in? I was hired by the Diefenbaker government at one time, to show you how fair he was.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Highways should not be in danger of busting a gasket. I will send him a tranquilizer, perhaps.

In Great Britain the Attorney General's lawyers are called Treasury counsel and he has a large band of them. Whenever a matter goes to court, the government is represented by one of the Treasury counsel. They do not come under the Treasurer or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that is an historic term applied to them. On the contrary, they come under the Attorney General. Now a great Attorney General, the Rt. Hon. Sir Douglas Hogg, had this to say at one time:

Whenever, therefore, the rights of the Sovereign as the guardian of the interests of the public are affected, they must find their protection in the presence of the Attorney General.

Another person said that it has been said of the office of Attorney General "what is everybody's business" in the sense that the whole of the body politic is affected, "What is everybody's business is nobody's business, it is the business of the Attorney General."

Now, I think it is a distressing thing that when the government is in the courts and perhaps we are spilling over into another vote, when a prosecution is launched on behalf of the government, I think it is a distressing thing that a lawyer in private practice is hired to carry on that prosecution. There ought to be, it seems to me in ordinary common sense, there ought to be a band of lawyers in The Department of the Attorney General, who go into the courts as his direct representative. They are there as counsel for the Attorney General.

Again, in Great Britain in all the major cases of litigation, in all the big ones, who is in the court on behalf of the government? The Attorney General himself. The Attorney General goes to court. We have only one instance in modern history of the Attorney General appearing in court in this province and I referred to it the other day, and I am not going to reiterate it. I do not expect that the practice will be resumed but what the hon. member for Downsview and I do plead for is that when the Sovereign is in the court the Sovereign ought to be represented directly by a person from the department. And what I would do had I the responsibility, I would have—which I may never have—but I would do, and I put it forward as a constructive suggestion—I would have a band of lawyers under the direction of an experienced counsel, a senior man, under their direction, and have him directly responsible to the Attorney General. And so far as the litigation was concerned, affecting the government and therefore affecting the people, I would have that man hold a daily meeting of the lawyers, the counsel, appearing in the court, to thresh over the cases, to discuss them, to get together and collect the ideas of all of the counsel in order that the conception would be scattered abroad that government counsel, the counsel of the Attorney General, in the courts were to be feared and respected. After all, those counsel appear on behalf of the people.

I have referred in respect of the hon. Provincial Treasurer. I do not think he ever understood the criticism. What a terrible thing I thought it was that the prerogatives of the Crown, those historic rights that attach to the Crown, should be bundled up and sent down to the offices of the lawyers for insurance companies, as we see happen. The Crown in suit now can be sued more readily under The Proceedings Against the Crown Act. The Crown insures itself. When a suit is launched, counsel for the Attorney General does not appear. No, it is a counsel for an insurance company.

Mr. Bryden: The insurance companies are taking over—

Mr. Sopha: Yes, indeed. And the insurance company appears in the name of the Crown, the insurance company appears in the name of the hon. Minister of Highways, for example. Or may appear in the name of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell). Now, the hon. Attorney General, as the chief law officer of the province, does not even know who these lawyers are, he is not acquainted with them, he is not acquainted with their ability, they could be strangers to him.

I merely make this plea: Let us make a fresh start, let us make a fresh start now, and let us hire within your department a sufficient number of lawyers at an attractive enough salary to keep them, so that when the people, when the sovereign body, the people, are involved in litigation, they are represented there by a counsel who truly is the agent of the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I must briefly say to my hon. friend that surely he is aware that the title, particularly the function, of the Attorney General in Great Britain is vastly different from that of the Attorney General in Canada. And particularly in this province of Ontario. I am sure the hon. member is aware of this. He did mention that the law side or one of the chief officers of the Attorney General in Britain, is the Treasury counsel. I do not think he would find the namesake of this Attorney General standing up in the Houses of Parliament at Westminster and carrying on the type of debate that it devolves upon this Attorney General to carry on in this Legislature.

This is not his function at all. His functions are entirely different, are vastly different. Part of the functions are carried on by the Home Secretary. He has the Treasury counsel, he has—as I mentioned, I believe—the Solicitor General. And in Scotland, where I like to look occasionally for good examples, there is the Advocate General.

When the hon. member talks about the persons who prosecute down through all the courts of this province or up through all the courts of this province, there are the officers responsible to the Attorney General, the Crown attorneys, some 71 or 72 of them. When we come into civil matters and when we come to the vote on the civil law division, I will be able to tell you something of what is done by those lawyers on the civil side who are in my department and who assist in the competent and capable way that they do and something of the extent of the work that they carry on.

I have already expressed some views and my colleague, the hon. Minister of Highways, has also expressed some reasons why perhaps there is good justification for, in our system here at least, for the present, having close to the department and familiar with the specialized work of the departments of this province, which is no small dominion, solicitors who are familiar with the work of the Minister and who know his aims and objects and can advise him. When it comes to the legislative deal only, then they come through legislative counsel.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I will name three cases. Will you tell me why Mr. William Bowman, director of public prosecutions, or Mr. John Austin or Mr. Rod Cormack could not have appeared on behalf of you in the courts in the three cases?

We had two scoundrels who were stealing from the Minister of Highways in Haileybury.

That is one case. The second case was the prosecution of Ralph Farris. The third case was the one conducted by Mr. Milligan, who is presently chairman of the Ontario police commission—I forget the nature of that case.

Now, will you tell me why the three people that I have mentioned could not have been in the courts? Why should it be that you pay a $7,000 legal fee, for example—that is the only case that I know the fee that was paid—in respect of those two people at Haileybury?

Mr. Bryden: That is not the full fee.

Mr. Sopha: No. The hon. member for Woodbine says that is not the full fee, but we found out the information, and to date you have paid $7,000 in respect of that prosecution. I said at the public accounts committee that the offence was so serious—stealing public money as they were doing, perhaps I spoke loosely—I said the person who should have been there prosecuting them was the Attorney General himself. And in Britain, of course, that is precisely the person who would have been there. But the hon. Attorney General quite properly pointed out the difference in the characteristics of the office. The Attorney General in Britain is a very junior member of the Cabinet. He is almost purely administrative and his advice is not sought on matters of high policy. He does not sit in the inner Cabinet as the Attorney General does here. But our system has reflected this: In periods when we have had strong Attorneys General like this one that we have now—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sopha: —the advice and counsel of the Attorney General has been sought by his colleagues and that is properly so. The other members of the Treasury benches ought to approach the Attorney General for his advice and counsel. So it was that we had a strong Attorney General when the present chief justice—I was not here in the House but he was a very able lawyer; he was Provincial Treasurer at one time—

Mr. Singer: Minister of Education!

Mr. Sopha: —Minister of Education—and he occupied the post of Attorney General and he sat on the right hand of the Prime Minister and he was a very strong political personality. I just throw that out; I ask you to tell me why any one of the three lawyers in your department—very able men, all three of them—why do you have to shop downtown with Tory lawyers—

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): To pass the money around!

Mr. Sopha: Yes, because you never hire a Liberal; I know that. You never hire a Liberal lawyer, and I will go this far—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: I was hired by the Diefenbaker government, so I do not complain. I will go this far, that I know from my personal experience that it is a very disgraceful business how these Tory lawyers fight over the patronage; how they fight each other. There is almost a cannibalistic characteristic to it. They are jealous of each other over the work from the public trustees' office, from the official guardian's office, from The Department of Highways, and they even go so far as to come down here to see the hon. Attorney General and complain that Joe Blow down the street, who is three millimetres less an ardent Tory, is getting more work than they are and they want an adjustment—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I must rise here because nobody comes down, I must tell the hon. member, to see the Attorney General to get work for political or any other reason, and if they come for that reason, they get very short shrift. I do not know the politics of lawyers who are hired or engaged or retained, or whatever the word may be, for legal work, and I can tell the hon. member that insofar as The Department of the Attorney General is concerned, not one outside lawyer or member of the legal profession has been retained for a case in the time that I have been Attorney General. The only exception to that would be counsel to a commission and I have had some part in securing counsel to Royal commissions.

Some of the cases that the hon. member referred to, I have no knowledge of. I think he must be referring to something before my time. I do not say that as an excuse, but I think there were good reasons why eminent counsel were obtained for the specialized cases which they were asked to conduct. In the prosecutions which come to my mind in The Department of the Attorney General, we used one of our eminent Crown attorneys, Mr. Milligan, in the Larocque case, Mr. McCullough in the Farris case, Mr. Bowman and Mr. Austin.

You ask about Mr. Bowman. He does not take, and it is not expected of him that he go into, the trial court. He is an appeal counsel; Mr. Austin likewise. Mr. Bowman's duties further extend, as director of public prosecutions, to the supervision, guidance and advice to the Crown attorneys throughout this province, the 71 or 72 of them, and I do not expect nor ask him to go into court in the trial area. There are other cases I could recite where quite eminent and important persons have been prosecuted, but they were prosecuted by the Crown attorneys of my department and we did not seek outside help, so that in that sense we were complete with the lawyers which we required and the counsel, eminent and capable in the law, to conduct those prosecutions.

Mr. Sopha: What we want you to do is get eminent and capable counsel in your department.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I have them.

Mr. Sopha: You have some—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I was just telling you that on the criminal side I have not sought outside my department, and when you come to the civil law vote, I will tell you something of what we have done there.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, with great respect to my friend the hon. Attorney General, we are back into the difficulty that maybe what he undoubtedly says that he does within the confines of the four walls of his department is correct. Here is what The Department of Highways does.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Again we are getting a little bit tangential, if I may use the word.

Mr. Singer: That is a good word. Unfortunately, since the beginning of the previous vote, it is difficult—and I repeat it this time—it is difficult to analyze properly the extent of this because we have not got the answer to question number 7. If we had the answer to question number 7, we could give you facts and figures.

There was $50,000 in outside legal work given out by The Department of Highways in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964—$50,000 in one department.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is not a lot, you know.

Mr. Singer: Oh, come. With the department you have six lawyers there already. By the time you add it up, mark my words, you will be well over $500,000 and close to $1 million.

If there is a different answer from that, let us hear it, but in the two or three years that my hon. colleague from Sudbury and I have put this question, the figure has come well up to $500,000. This is not the way to run this business, unless you are doing it for patronage purposes and it is obvious that that is the way it is being done.

Vote 204 agreed to.

On vote 205:

Mr. Singer: On vote 205; I understood the hon. Attorney General wanted to make a broad statement on the civil law division. I would like to hear it, but as we get into 205, 206 and 207, in order that we do not get too “tangential,” I would like to have some ground rules established, Mr. Chairman, as to what comes into these specific votes, because there are a number of headings that theoretically could go into any one of them. If the hon. Attorney General would lay down the ground rules within these three votes, we could abide by them.

What do you consider is in votes 205, 206 and 207? The civil law division could cover a multitude of sins, or practically nothing.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I must say that I think the words “civil law division,” which is 205, as opposed to 206 which is “criminal law,” are pretty much self-explanatory, surely.

Mr. Singer: Do you want to talk about court organization under 205, or do you want to save that for 207?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We go to 207.

Mr. Singer: Do you want to talk about court reporters under that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That will be under 207.

Mr. Singer: Do you want to talk about the law of family relations under 205 or under 207?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That would be 207.

Mr. Singer: What do you want to talk about under 205, just so that we will know what it covers?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This, Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the hon. member, I should say is my main office—civil law, the conduct of civil law in the office of the Attorney General. It is the whole body of civil law, as we conduct it there. I can expatiate on that; I have quite a few notes here. May I tell you something about it? It will only take me a moment.

Mr. Singer: Okay; go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps I might read the notes I have made. Mr. Chairman, the functions of this division—that is, the civil law division—fall into two general areas.

The first covers representation of the government of Ontario in all civil and constitutional matters—and this is what we were talking about a moment ago—the representation or the representing of the government of Ontario in all civil and constitutional matters before the supreme, the county and the division courts of the province, and the Supreme Court of Canada. In addition, counsel from this division represents the government where requested before federal administrative boards, such as the national energy board, and the board of transport commissioners for Canada. This division also supplies counsel to provincial boards and agencies, such as the Ontario police commission, the Ontario securities commission, the Ontario energy board, the Ontario pension commission, and so on. That is one division—the representation as counsel from out of my office, my personnel, on the civil side before courts of all grades, boards and commissions, and so on.

The second general area of activity is the providing of legal advisory services for the government. The activities in this area can best be illustrated by the fact that in 1964, 105 formal legal opinions were given by this branch to other government departments and agencies. This is where we are asked for opinions on generally quite important matters of law. These opinions are furnished in a formal manner and delivered to the departments which request them, and on them the departments base their judgments and go forward with their policies and into litigation matters too. So this is a field where we serve departments of my hon. colleagues, in areas where they may be involved in litigious matters.

In addition to these opinions, solicitors from this branch advised and consulted with the solicitors and other senior personnel of other departments on innumerable occasions. They also dealt with 432 inquiries made from the public at large to The Department of the Attorney General. In matters of litigation, five Supreme Court of Canada matters were dealt with and disposed of, and I may say to you, very satisfactorily. Twenty-four Supreme Court of Ontario matters were completed. These were by people within the department, not people downtown. Forty-three county court and 346 division court claims were finalized. There are presently pending two Supreme Court of Canada matters and 42 Supreme Court of Ontario matters, in addition to 46 county court and 104 division court claims.

Mr. Sopha: What in the world would they be in the division court for?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: For small, generally small property damage claims.

The solicitors from this branch also represented the Queen's Proctor on 52 motions in the supreme court for judgment absolute. The division provided counsel to represent the Attorney General of Ontario before the national energy board, counsel to the Ontario securities commission, the Ontario police commission, the Ontario human rights commission, in matters before those agencies. The division will also be providing counsel to represent the government of Ontario in the Bell Telephone application before the board of transport commissioners of Canada, which is being heard now, as a matter of fact. And I may say to the House that we have a watching brief securing information from all sides and being prepared to be knowledgeable in case it is necessary to make a submission.

Counsel of the department of the civil division undertook four prosecutions at the request of The Department of Labour for violation of The Industrial Safety Act.

With reference to the supreme court matters handled by this division it should be pointed out that in most instances they are cases of complexity requiring a great deal of research and involving a lengthy trial.

I have a number of cases which I could cite. I will cite one, the case of Clark and Creba, Miller and the Attorney General for Ontario, was 21 days at trial.

Three constitutional matters were disposed of in the Supreme Court of Canada, each of which required a great deal of research and the implications of which were very broad. Judgment in two of these cases has been reserved by the court, one for a period of six months. In many of the Supreme Court of Ontario matters, interlocutory proceedings are necessary and additional attendances in court required.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a brief summary, or a brief outline at least, to give some idea of the work of the civil law division of The Department of the Attorney General.

Vote 205 agreed to.

On vote 206:

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Vote 206, Mr. Chairman, and it may be time that a new voice was introduced into this debate tonight. The hon. member for Downsview has certainly demonstrated that he is doing his homework very effectively, and the hon.

Minister is also showing that he is doing his homework just as well.

At the present time, there is being held in this city a trial of the alleged murderer of one, Jack Blanc, who was shot in Bathurst Manor some time ago when he was assisting in the apprehension of a bank robber. The man now on trial was apprehended later on.

Mr. Sopha: The case is at the bar, is it not?

Mr. Young: I am not commenting on the case. What I am asking the Attorney General is: In a case like this, many of us have felt for a long time that there is a necessity for compensation for people like this, and for the dependants of people like this, who assist the law enforcement officers in the apprehension of criminals. Now, in a case such as this one I have mentioned, and I am not prejudging the case in any way, I simply say that there is a wife and family left in this situation, without too many resources. The public has responded to raise some funds to help out.

In other cases we have read where people stand on the sidelines while the police action is taking place and where the police are having a difficult time. Or perhaps some crime has been committed, as we often read about, and yet people hesitate to interfere because of the danger which is there, and the fear that if something happens to them, their dependants may be left destitute. So for a long time there has been thinking regarding some compensation in this regard. Some jurisdictions have already set up funds of this nature, where compensation of varying amounts is paid under certain circumstances. I would ask the hon. Attorney General if any serious thought is being given by this government for this sort of action, where a compensation fund of this kind will be set up so that people who do assist in law enforcement activities, people who may not be in the police force itself, may expect to have some protection in case their dependants may be left destitute or if some serious accident may occur to maim or wound, or incapacitate, these people-taking part.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the recent interest in this matter and I think it would suffice for me to say that we were turning it over in mind and wondering what might be done to apparently focus some of the interest which is in this field when the matter was referred to the commission on civil rights, headed by Mr. McRuer, and I have no doubt he will come forward with a recommendation from that commission very shortly.

Mr. Bryden: Well, it will be a long time, Mr. Chairman, before the commission headed by Mr. McRuer will be reporting. Surely this is not a matter on which the government needs to wait for advice from that commission. In fact, I would say it is only marginally within the terms of reference of the commission. Chief Justice McRuer, as he was, certainly is well qualified to investigate the matter but he has many other matters under consideration. It seems to me this is a matter that merits a policy by the government long before one could reasonably expect that the McRuer commission would be reporting.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would just say this, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it is a matter that needs to take a long time and for that reason, I would expect, I cannot require or urge the commission on human rights to give the government a report in haste, but I should not think this is a matter that is going to require a long time.

Mr. MacDonald: Are you expecting interim reports?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is not my commission. The law reform commission does report to the Attorney General and I have referred a number of things to it and I am aware of the body of its work, but I am aware that the commission on civil rights has this matter in hand and I should not think it would be long, and I think it is a matter of courtesy that we might wait for the recommendation of that commission.

Mr. Young: So we wait for legislation next year!

Mr. Wishart: At the same time, I am quite prepared to say that the government would be capable of making up its own policy, of making up its own mind, and taking some action.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, we get into a very serious point of principle at this stage. There is a resolution on the order paper—I think standing in the name of one of the hon. members from Hamilton—about compensation for the victims of crime. This is why I suggested quite seriously just before we embarked on this vote, that perhaps we should have some ground rules.

Now, if my friend from Yorkview is right and the question of the compensation of the victims of crime properly comes under this vote, I have some rather extensive remarks that I want to make, either in these estimates or when the resolution is called. I am not satisfied, merely because the matter has been discussed before Mr. Justice McRuer, that we have to sit in anticipation of his report. He may or may not choose to deal with any of a hundred different subjects that deal with civil rights, but in order to avoid writing out the proceedings of this House at undue length, if the government would tell us, do they propose to call these resolutions—the one on compensation for victims of crime; the one on divorce and the one on administrative procedures, and so on—all these things—and the bill standing in my name on ombudsman?

If these are going to be called and they will be called in reasonable time to allow proper debate, then perhaps they do not come up here, but if they are not going to be called, then they should be discussed somewhere and perhaps my hon. friend from Yorkview is right—let us have a full-fledged discussion right now on the whole problem of compensation for victims of crime. Let us hear from the government what the policy is; are you going to call these resolutions and these bills; or do you want them debated on these estimates? Now, I have my material here and I am prepared to go on to these things right now and I am sure there are other people in the House that are, too.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, may I speak to this matter? It is my intent that these various bills be called. There are quite a few of them there that have been discussed at one point or another during the course of the business of the House to date, but I can assure you that we will get to them.

All I would ask—and I think it is not an unreasonable request—is that we not discuss them all twice.

Mr. Singer: I quite agree. It is up to the hon. Attorney General; and the hon. Prime Minister's statement that he will call these and I will put—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: But let us not miss it, that is the only point!

Mr. R. G. Hodgson (Victoria): Mr. Chairman, might I bring to the attention of the hon. members of the House that we dealt with the matter of compensation to those who assist peace officers under Bill No. 31, An Act to amend The Workmen's Compensation Act, just recently. Section 7 of that bill reads:

For the purpose of this Act every person who under clause (c) of sections 1, 3 and 10 of The Criminal Code of Canada is required to assist in arresting any person for disturbing the peace shall be deemed to be an employee of the Crown in the right of Ontario and his average earnings shall be deemed to be the same in amount as his average earnings at his regular employment but in any case not less than $30 per week and not more than $6,000 per annum.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Victoria believes that this is the whole issue, then let us have the debate as quickly as possible, particularly for his edification; there is so much more involved in this that he does not even understand that the quicker we get on with the debate on compensation for victims of crime, the better.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on vote 206 there are four or five matters on which I would like some information from the hon. Attorney General. I would prefer to deal with them one at a time which might be the most expeditious way of handling them.

Would the hon. Attorney General, first of all, tell us what the number of—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: May I interrupt the hon. member and point out that it is now 11 o'clock and he has several matters to raise.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the House rise and report certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before moving adjournment of the House, with respect to the bill dealing with the milk industry, I would like to call second reading of that bill on Thursday so that we can have a debate on it, then it can go to the agricultural committee on Tuesday next and the various bodies that are interested will be informed. Tomorrow we will resume these estimates.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11:00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, MAY 12, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome as guests to the Legislature today, in the west gallery, students from Crestwood secondary school, Peterborough and Deer Park senior school, Toronto.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE MEAT INSPECTION ACT (ONTARIO), 1962-1963

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Meat Inspection Act (Ontario), 1962-1963.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the amendment to The Meat Inspection Act provides for humane slaughter in The Ontario Meat Inspection Act. It is necessary to add this to our Act because in drawing up the previous Act, we felt that the meat inspection would be carried out by the federal government under The Canada Meat Inspection Act, which provides for humane slaughter. Now that Ontario is carrying it out on its own, it is provided in this amendment.

THE SEED POTATOES ACT

Hon. Mr. Stewart moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Seed Potatoes Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The fact, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is being introduced today is no indication of the time of year. It simply means that The Seed Potatoes Act is transferred from the crops branch to the inspection branch of our department.

THE FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

Hon. Mr. Stewart moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Farm Products Marketing Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, by word of explanation here, I would say that these amendments to The Farm Products Marketing Act simply put into practice procedures that are now presently being performed without being spelled out in legislation. They also provide for the protection of members of a local commodity marketing board and the farm producers marketing board, from personal suit being launched against them when they are carrying out the intents of the Act in good faith.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister if the protection against personal suit would have a retro-active clause?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, I have not really given thought to that particular aspect, Mr. Speaker, but I would assume that it would have.

Mr. Nixon: That it would have?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would assume so.

THE JUDICATURE ACT

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Judicature Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

REGIONAL DETENTION CENTRES

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to provide for the establishment of regional detention centres.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Speaker, this bill provides the authority necessary for two or more counties to co-operate in establishing and operating a joint jail or regional detention centre board.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The twenty-third order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 206:

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last evening on this vote, I had four or more matters on which I would like to obtain information from the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart). I would prefer, if it is agreeable to him, that we deal with one item at a time in order to deal with them as expeditiously as possible.

The first item of information that I would like to have is the number of persons who were charged during the past year as habitual criminals and the number of persons who were convicted of that charge.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, this is the type of question, where specific answers are required in numbers, on which I might reasonably expect some notice.

However, I can say to the hon. member that I am not aware of any person convicted in Ontario in the last year as an habitual criminal.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, the second item, on which I will comment very briefly, is the question of fingerprinting. Is there any provision made so that if a person, having been apprehended and fingerprinted, is subsequently acquitted of any charge that has been made against him, is there any provision for an order of a magistrate or the judge acquitting him to direct that the fingerprints of that person be destroyed? Or do his fingerprints remain as a matter of permanent record with the police authorities throughout the province?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of any legislative authority for destroying such records. I think, although I cannot be certain of this, that they are sometimes returned on request where it is established that they have no significance in any proceedings.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General if he would consider whatever amendment is necessary to grant to magistrate and judges the authority to order the destruction of the fingerprints of persons who are acquitted of criminal offences in the provincial courts.

The next item, Mr. Chairman, is the question about the length of time people are detained in jails in the province awaiting appeal from their original conviction. Undoubtedly the hon. Attorney General has seen the article which appeared in the Ontario Magistrates' Quarterly in January of this year, "Imprisonment Without Trial," in which the suggestion is made, and certainly one which we hear endorsed, that a court of criminal appeal be set up for the summer months so that at no time is there a protracted period during which a person, who has been convicted and who is appealing his sentence, will be delayed or held unduly long in a jail without having recourse to a court in which his appeal can be heard, and be heard promptly.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the matter of bail pending appeal, there is no delay inherent in the facilities which are available in that any judge of the high court can hear, throughout the year, applications for bail from persons in jail on conviction and making application for appeal. I do not know whether the hon. member is referring to the actual hearing of the appeal or not.

Mr. Renwick: Yes, the actual hearing of the appeal.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: On that I can only say that application has been made to the department that our high courts sit now throughout the year and I have referred the matter to the chief justice of the high court, to the chief justice of Ontario and to the law society of Upper Canada—this was in the last three weeks—for study. I have had response that the matter is now receiving study from the law society and from the chief judge of the district and county courts, and I am awaiting word from the others. The whole matter is under study.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on the question of persons who are held in jail, every now and then we are exercised, and certainly a lot of people are concerned, about the report that persons are held unduly long in jail without having been brought to trial. I would ask the hon. Attorney General if he would not give consideration to some method of a daily, twice weekly or weekly, return of the persons who are held in the city and county jails throughout the province—a return to be made either directly to the Attorney General or to the Crown attorney in each of the jurisdictions throughout the province so that it would no longer be possible that a person would be held for any lengthy period of time without the law officers of the Crown being specifically aware of the length of time for which a person has been held and the related question of whether or not bail has been set or application been made for bail.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have the matter raised at this time. I do not really believe it is as serious as the occasional report would appear to make it be. I think the fact is that justices of the peace visit the jails and the lockups frequently—certainly in all parts of Metropolitan Toronto—and do make themselves available there. The governors of our jails have instructions to make certain that Crown attorneys are notified promptly of all persons who are there awaiting trial. I just cannot believe that—for those reasons at least—anyone is held in jail for any length of time. However, I am glad to have the matter brought to my attention and I will give it further study.

If the hon. member has instances where this is factual, I would like to have them.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, I might add, for the edification of the hon. member, that since the problem arose regarding the “hold” orders by The Department of Immigration in Ottawa, we have introduced into the department a daily record of all inmates of all of the institutions across this province. They provide a daily record of every person who is there and the purpose for which he is there; whether he is on remand or whether he is serving a sentence and for what purpose. If there is any undue delay at all we ask for an explanation. To date, as far as I recall, there has been no instance in which there did not appear to be a good and reasonable reason for a person being held for any particular period of time.

Mr. Renwick: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The final matter on which I would ask the hon. Attorney General's views is whether or not his department considers that they have any responsibility for the investigation of matters within the jurisdiction of bankruptcy legislation, but which may very well have a criminal law connotation such as conspiracy to defraud or actual fraud. We are all aware of the large number of bankruptcies and the large number of dollars involved in the bankruptcies which have occurred throughout the country in the last several months, and we are also all aware of the investigations which have been undertaken in the province of Quebec in matters relating to bankruptcies. We here have the impression that the hon. Attorney General's department does not accept any direct responsibility for investigating bankruptcy matters, even though it is part of the law of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, that is not correct as the hon. member states it. The matter of bankruptcy is, of course, a federal matter and The Bankruptcy Act is a federal Act, and I think everyone is aware—certainly hon. members of this House are aware—that there are what appear to be grave loopholes in The Bankruptcy Act and rackets, if I may use that expression, being carried on within the confines of The Bankruptcy Act which do not seem to be very confining.

We are interested. We have had conferences with the hon. Minister of Justice at Ottawa about the matter. Representations have been made that The Bankruptcy Act does need revision and steps must be taken to tighten the provisions of it with respect to the area or phase of bankruptcy where it reaches into what appears to be a racket where people are taking advantage of what is a federal Act to bring about situations where they fail, but fail with money hidden and money that has been obtained through a period of business, ostensibly honest and proper.

We are investigating; the Ontario provincial police have instructions. The attention of the racket squad is directed to all of these instances where we have any suspicion and considerable work is being done in this area and prosecutions have taken place.

Under The Bankruptcy Act, a trustee or a creditor has the right to refer suspected fraud to the bankruptcy judge and that judge may, if he is satisfied, direct the Crown attorney to investigate and prosecute. This has not been done, I am told, in any of the five Metro areas in recent years. But the power is there and on our own initiative we are investigating.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I would say this to the hon. Attorney General, that another phase of this matter that he might look into is one that he could take up with his colleague, the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Allan). I think part of the difficulty arises because of our very lax companies laws. It is unduly easy to get an incorporation, and this is the way in which these people can conceal their assets. They have a dozen, two dozen, three dozen companies, none of which are really truly limited liability companies. The directors are dummy directors. A man can carry on business in the name of one company but get all the profits into another company and get his assets so completely lost in his network of companies that it facilitates this type of abuse as well as many others. I would suggest that this is a matter that the government could look into as well as the other matters that the hon. Attorney General has just mentioned.

Mr. Chairman: Is the vote carried?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, if that particular topic is now disposed of, there is one other matter to which we referred briefly last night under another vote—and as you pointed out properly, under the wrong vote—to which I would like to make a brief reference at this time; and that is the question of the treatment of alcoholics under our present laws.

I notice that at the introductory stages of these estimates—I think it was last Thursday evening, May 6—the hon. Attorney General made a number of comments as to the difficulties that he personally, as Attorney General, encounters with regard to the administration of the law dealing with chronic alcoholics. I am reading from page 2668 of Hansard, the words of the hon. Attorney General:

There come across my desk quite frequently, applications for clemency, many of them for persons who have been convicted for drunkenness, and repeating and repeating and repeating—foolscap sheets full of convictions over a period of a few months or a year. These things cause me great concern. They are convicted and given $10 or 20 days, $10 or 30 days, or $20 or 60 days, and then the magistrate sees the list lengthening out, repeated and repeated and repeated. And the ten days are up and on the eleventh day there is another conviction, $10 or 30 days, and the 30 days are up and the conviction follows, $10 or 90 days, which is the limit. Then they appeal, "Let me out, I have got a job to go to." And I investigate them; it is a great effort to refuse an appeal for clemency. But the magistrates' courts and the police, the Crown attorneys, when I investigate, say to me, "If you let him out our experience is that he will be back. The police will just be dragging him in tomorrow night." And I know that in many cases—in many, many cases—this is so.

Those were the words of the hon. Attorney General and I can certainly appreciate the emotional stress that he must feel in dealing with cases of this kind.

But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this experience which apparently is not uncommon with him, should lead him to see the futility of the whole process. What happens, in effect, as the hon. Attorney General so graphically put it, is that a man is up on a drunk charge and gets $10 or 20 days. He probably has not got $10 so he goes to jail for 20 days. And so he works up the scale. Finally he graduates, cum laude, $10 or 90 days. That is as far as the procedure can go. So the man does 90 days and then he is out again; and the next thing you know, he is back in court charged with being drunk and disorderly. So I do not know what the magistrate does then. Maybe he starts down at the bottom of the scale again, down in grade one, $10 or ten days, and works up again to $10 or 90 days. But what is being accomplished by all this—outside of our jails being overcrowded with people who, in my opinion, do not properly belong in them at all?

If a man suffers from diphtheria, we may find it necessary to isolate him from the community for a certain period of time, but we certainly do not put him in jail. And if a man suffers a mental illness we may, unfortunately, in some cases, put him in jail, but not because of his mental illness. It will be for some other reason. But if a man is sick because of chronic alcoholism, one of the most terrible of all the diseases that afflict men, he goes to jail and he goes repeatedly because the jail does not cure his sickness; it has very little effect on it. This is what we do. We put sick men in jail, and I venture to suggest that half of the people in the Don jail at this moment are sick men suffering from chronic alcoholism.

I realize, as the hon. Attorney General and many others have said, that there is no easy answer to this problem. It is not easy to treat alcoholism, and I understand from the authorities that it is totally impossible to treat it if the victim of the disease does not himself want to be cured. This is one of the great problems, to produce the proper motivation. I realize all that and I know that even if we provided treatment to all these people we would have a tremendous record of failure, although I would hope it would be a declining rate of failure.

I still say that these people should go to some other kind of institution for treatment, if they can benefit from treatment, or for custodial care if that is all that we can give them. I understand from articles I have read in Addictions, that a great many of the older alcoholics are really people who are, shall we say, totally inadequate personalities; they have long ago given up trying to cope with society. Really, all they need and all they want is custodial care.

In a sense, I suppose a term in the Don is not really severe treatment for them. They are probably happier in the Don than they are out on the street, where they just do not know what to do and where their only recourse is to try to cadge enough money to buy a bottle of wine. But even if it is just a matter of custodial care, surely there is a better place to give it than at the Don jail. Moreover, there should be places where such care could be provided more economically than in the Don jail.

I mentioned the other night that the former Attorney General—two removed—now the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), had a plan a few years ago for what I understood to be a quite substantial number of treatment centres and perhaps custodial centres for chronic alcoholics. That plan, unfortunately, never really did get off the ground, and I think it is now time that the government gave serious—well, I was going to say “serious consideration.” I have no doubt they have been giving serious consideration to the problem, but I think it is time they started to do something about it.

I think our laws should be changed entirely. It is ridiculous to put a magistrate in the position where about the only option he has is to sentence a man for 10 days, 30 days or 90 days. He may, I believe, direct that the sentence be served in a treatment centre, if there is a treatment centre to which the man can be sent, which is rarely the case. But even in that happy situation, the magistrate has really limited discretion, he must give a specific term. He has no discretion to direct that the man should be committed, shall we say, for a period and then subjected to re-examination, and possibly committed for a further period.

That is what we do in regard to mental hospitals. We commit a person for a period and the period can be extended until it is felt that the person is capable of returning to society. I am not suggesting that we should put alcoholics permanently in institutions, but I think that the magistrates should have far greater discretion than they have now in committing a person to an institution for, shall we say, a rather elastic period of time in the hope that treatment may be of some benefit to him. They are almost entirely lacking in discretion now. Alcoholism is treated as an offence, which is wrong; and what is even worse, it is treated as an offence with respect to which the magistrate has very little discretion. I think the magistrates should be allowed to exercise much more discretion than they do now; they should have much greater access to the advice of people expert in the field, in dealing with individual cases. And, above all, they should have centres to which they can send people who are convicted of this crime, as it is called, of being sick.

As I say, I was very heartened a few years ago by the fine announcement made by the Attorney General of that day, and I have since been gravely disappointed by the government's failure to take any really aggressive, constructive action in implementing the plan that the then Attorney General announced.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, the other evening we were discussing the use of electronic devices by police officers in relation to certain activities that they carry on.

I received certain information this afternoon by telephone, concerning the case we discussed in the House at that time. It being unconfirmed information and of a very serious nature, I took the occasion just immediately before the House convened this afternoon, of communicating my information to the hon. Attorney General.

Before I address any remarks in regard to it, I want to be sure, and I am sure the hon. Attorney General does, that the record is the same as the information I have received. I asked the hon. Attorney General if he could obtain for me and for himself a copy of the transcript of evidence taken at the preliminary hearing of this particular trial. He undertook that he would. The only reason I mention it at this point is that the hon. Attorney General has suggested that this matter be brought up under the OPP vote, which is the twelfth vote in these estimates. This will be fine; I am quite prepared to discuss it then but I am somewhat concerned that we might reach the twelfth vote before the transcript is available. In the event that happens, I would ask the permission of the House—I suppose this is the only way to do it—to reserve discussion on this particular aspect until we have what may prove to be a very important piece of additional information before us. This is a matter of very serious import, Mr. Chairman, and certainly I have no intention of discussing the information I received unless I am satisfied that the information is, in fact, correct.

The hon. Attorney General and I discussed it in this way and he agreed that he would try to obtain the transcript as quickly as possible, and if this is agreeable, I am quite content to leave this issue at this point.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I confirm, of course, what the hon. member has said, and I will institute the necessary steps to get the transcript. I want it for my own purposes in any event and I shall have it soon, I expect. I doubt if we can get it before we have disposed of the estimates of this department unless those files in front of my hon. friend—

Mr. Singer: No, I do not have it. If I had it here, I would go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: However, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say this, that immediately at the end of the sittings, on May 10 in this House, when this matter was first raised, I at once, when the session rose that day, spoke to the commissioner of the Ontario provincial police and on May 11 I obtained from him such information as was immediately available through his office and from his inspectors there. I had that material; there was no opportunity to present it as we went on in the estimates yesterday and I felt I should therefore retain it until we reach the OPP vote.

Mr. Singer: That would be fine. There is no point in taking bits of this story—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I just wanted to make it clear, that I had stepped into the matter already.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the point that I wanted to discuss at somewhat greater length under this vote is the whole question of bail. The hon. member for Riverdale touched very briefly on one aspect of it. But I think this whole subject deserves a much more serious and lengthy discussion than it has received here as yet.

I was very pleased to see that Mr. Common's committee, set up to investigate legal aid, did stray from its terms of reference and examined at some length and commented at some length on bail, arrest and summons procedures. While, as I say, I could not find that this particular subject was in their terms of reference, I think their study and their report on this important aspect of the administration of justice, is well worthwhile. It is contained on pages 197 to 209 of the second volume of that very comprehensive report of the joint committee on legal aid.

The fact that Mr. Common and his colleagues on the committee came to the conclusion that this subject was of sufficient importance to warrant their departing from their specific terms of reference speaks for itself, I think. Mr. Common, as a very experienced lawyer and as a very recent senior law officer of the Crown, certainly would be aware of and concerned about our procedure insofar as granting bail is concerned.

A number of studies are going on. I understand that Professor Friedland who, I think, is associated with the University of Toronto law school, is completing or has just about completed a book on the subject, which is about to be published. While I have no idea what it contains, I am sure that a most exhaustive study of systems in this jurisdiction and other jurisdictions has been undertaken and I would hope that Professor Friedland will be able to make available certain concrete recommendations which could very substantially improve our system, which is so badly in need of improvement.

In the meantime, I think too that I recall the hon. Attorney General saying that this whole question had been generally referred to the committee on law reform—am I correct in that? I think that one day, just in a passing reference, there was that sort of a suggestion. In any event, there is now—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think probably I was under the impression it was being studied by the Royal commission on civil rights, but I did not refer to the law reform committee. I have some comments that I could make after the hon. member is finished.

Mr. Singer: Well, we have several sorts of catch-all depositories, if I can call them that. I hate to call Mr. Justice McRuer a catch-all depository, but it seems to me that when we get into so many of the fields concerned with the administration of the law, there is the comment made that Mr. Justice McRuer is studying this. And we all know Mr. Justice McRuer and his abilities and we are all satisfied that he is going to make a very serious and important study in regard to a great number of matters. But I just wonder how any one human being is going to come down with a report within days or weeks or months or even within a year, that is going to solve our problems insofar as bail is concerned, together with bills of rights and ombudsmen and codes for administrative tribunals and appeals for administrative tribunals, and all the other myriad things that have been presented to him, and which he is considering.

I have no means of guessing how complete or how lengthy his report is going to be, but this whole bail question is an obvious point on which immediate attention should be turned by the government, and as I say, it was of sufficient importance to indicate to Mr. Common and those associated with him in this study, that they should depart from their terms of reference.

It is well known that if a minor offender is arrested—and notwithstanding the remarks of my hon. friend, the Attorney General, in reply to the hon. member for Riverdale, I say it is still well known—that when a minor offender is arrested by the metropolitan police late at night, the chances are that he will have to spend the rest of it in the “pokey.” It is almost impossible to locate a justice of the peace quickly or in a reasonable time. And what can be more denigrating to a person who has, let us suppose, been out on an evening’s party, has had too much to drink and is hauled off to the cells? He is not a criminal, but he has committed an offence and he is going to be punished, and must spend the whole night in some miserable cell—and we have a lot of miserable cells here in our jails throughout the province of Ontario—be denied the ability to communicate with his friends or his family; be unable to advise his employer. Perhaps, in many cases he is so embarrassed that the last thing in the world he wants to do is tell his employer what has happened to him. He goes through the mill and then about 10 o’clock in the morning he appears in one of these drunk courts, dishevelled, hung-over, dirty, unshaven, embarrassed, to plead guilty to an offence which he has undoubtedly committed. What ends of justice are being served in this? The man has committed an offence; surely to goodness there should be a method of bringing him into court without going through all this unnecessary proceeding.

Mr. E. Letherby (Simcoe East): Take him home to bed and tuck him in.

Mr. Singer: My hon. friend here makes a suggestion that I think has a lot of merit; maybe he should get home to bed.

But our system just is not geared to this thing, and anyone who practises law in a city like this one comes across these cases frequently.

The offence is drunk, or occasionally, ability impaired. There is no question of a man who is a family man, who has a stake in the community, who has a job, who owns his house; there is no question of him running away, he will be there. He will be there when he is tried; he is not happy about it.

But why does the process of the law drag out this whole procedure and force him to appear in court in this condition; force the family heartache that undoubtedly results and pose very serious danger to his method of earning a livelihood?

It is my suggestion—it is my very serious suggestion—that immediately we have to start looking at our system of bail and at our arrest procedure in regard to this type of man. The same sort of thing happens on a weekend. He is in real difficulty if he gets picked up on a Friday or a Saturday. He can spend a whole weekend in jail.

There were comments I notice, from Chief Mackey of the metropolitan police made to Justice McRuer, that within six hours it would be reasonable to expect that a justice of the peace would appear.

It may be reasonable to expect, but I know no cases where this does happen.

Justice McRuer, when some of these comments were before him, remarked that arrested drunks on sobering up, and others held on charges that are not grave, should be released even without the formality of having bail. This comment from a man of his stature and experience should give the hon. Attorney General cause to modify the system and the practice of police and peace officers.

There is the additional case of people being kept in jail because they cannot afford bail. If a man can raise money for bail but cannot get a justice of the peace to release them immediately, that is bad enough; but if he cannot raise the bond, or cash, and has to spend a couple of days or weeks in jail; as sometimes happens, until his case is disposed of; in addition to all his other problems he is placed at a very substantial disadvantage. In fact, I think we could say with some real logic that bail, in many cases, means jail for poor people.

The purpose of bail, I would think, is to try to ensure that an arrested person turns up for his trial. The hon. Attorney General must be aware that most persons who are arrested are not professional criminals and do not need the threat of $200 or $500 bail money to force them to appear. The studies that have been done in England and in New York, and even to some extent in Metro, indicate that this is abundantly true. In New York, the Vera foundation conducted a long-term project of interviewing arrested persons and immediately reporting their backgrounds to a peace officer and recommending the release, without bail, of those considered unlikely to flee and menace the public. The interesting conclusion to which this commission in New York came was that of those released on their own recognizance, only one per cent failed to show up for trial. Three per cent of those released on bail by these formal procedures, in fact skipped out, so that apparently the man who was released on his own recognizance—as I am suggesting should and could be done almost immediately if he is arrested—is a far better risk than the ones who put up the substantial bail bond.

Dropping bail requirements for minor offenders will not in itself prevent citizens from being kept in jail needlessly overnight or for a weekend. A justice of the peace still has to be found and I am suggesting that we will deal with justices of the peace—I think I am correct, Mr. Attorney General, in saying that we will deal with justices of the peace under vote 207, or do you want them here?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It really comes under 207.

Mr. Singer: OK, we will save the comments on justices of the peace for vote 207.

But finding a justice of the peace—and I am going to have a substantial criticism about the system of justices of the peace and the way in which they operate—a justice of the peace still has to be found to authorize the release. Improvement may require—and I am going to come to some substantial suggestions on that—more justices of the peace or better trained ones; or working on shifts and being available 24 hours a day; or devising a satisfactory method of bypassing the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace entirely in this sort of thing.

The simplest means of dealing humanely with many minor cases is not to make a formal arrest. My hon. friend from Simcoe East says that they could be sent home and the summons could follow the next day, or make sure that he gets home. It seems to me that the OPP does this in many cases, Mr. Chairman.

They do it far more frequently than some of our municipal police forces, and this is something that I think has to be looked at very carefully.

Our bail system as it is today works very grave hardship in many cases. I do not think that it is being properly administered and I do not think our whole approach to dealing with people who are charged with offences, the time they might spend in jail, the use of summons procedure and so on, has been properly investigated and brought up to date. I think this is something that needs far more immediate attention than just our waiting anxiously for Mr. Justice McRuer to rewrite all the laws of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make it clear that we are not just waiting for Mr. Justice McRuer, either from the law reform commission side or the commission on civil rights. We are moving without waiting for suggestions or recommendations.

In the matter of bail, I am not going to indulge in a discussion with the hon. member for Downsview as to whether being put in jail is a good experience and whether this has a cathartic effect or whether it is a purging experience or not, but I would make a few comments.

There are some alternatives to putting a man in jail. One is, if he is a drunk, to send him home drunk. I am not always sure that is the right thing to do. He may not want to appear before his wife and children drunk. He may not be the type of person who should be turned over to the care of the little woman in a drunken state. And perhaps he would rather not go home in that state, before his family.

I do not believe that the delays which arise from bail are quite, in general, so bad as some of those cases which have been picked out have made it appear. I had the transcript of the Herrell case which the hon. member mentioned the other day. He was arrested at night, he was before the magistrate in the morning.

Let me say this, however. I know that there has been a change in thinking. But what you mention of our system, of the New York system, which follows down the British tradition and what we have learned from the motherland from whence our system came, is that they have taken a new look at bail. Our committee on legal aid went, as you say, perhaps a little wide of its terms of reference.

Mr. Singer: I am glad to hear that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have looked at this point and I think that we have realized that today, with so many more people, comparatively, in court for very minor crimes than used to be the case in the old days, that bail in the sense in which it was originally devised, the purpose for which it was devised, has outlived that usefulness for the small, the petty crime of the respectable citizen who gets himself in trouble. We have moved to try to correct that.

I must say to you that the procedure again is a federal law and it is the criminal code. The code says, under section 451, referring to a justice of the peace or a magistrate:

A justice acting under this part may order that an accused, at any time before he has been committed for trial, be admitted to bail . . . upon the accused entering into his own recognizance in form 28 before him or any other justice in such amount as he or that justice directs without any deposit.

Here, the justice, the magistrate, has complete discretion. He has had it all these years. All he has to do is exercise it.

What we are trying to do and what we have been moving toward is to educate—if I may use that term—to encourage our magistrates who sit in our courts to get away from this old shackle, which seems to have shackled them all down through the years, and I think we are getting a different approach. We are doing this in our conferences on uniformity of sentencing, in our conferences on procedures, and in our general conferences, where we get our Crown attorneys together—particularly those involved in the cases where persons are convicted before magistrates—and instruct them to say to the magistrates, “This person could very well go on his own recognizance.” To the magistrates in their own experiences, we have brought to their attention the result of the findings of the New York committee, which studied the system there, the British system and what has come from our legal aid study. I think we are getting our magistrates and our magistrates’ courts to the point where they are adopting an attitude which is in line with what the hon. member has put forward and with whose comments I generally agree on this subject.

I could refer, just as a matter of interest, to the procedure which obtains after conviction. I read section 451, when the person comes before the magistrate before trial and before conviction. The other section is 463 and the provision is exactly the same.

The judge or magistrate may, upon production of any material that he considers necessary, order that the accused be admitted to bail on entering into his own recognizance before a justice, in such amount as the magistrate or judge directs without any deposit. That means simply an undertaking, “I will be back.” There must be an amount in the penal sum of $1,000 or $500 or $200 or whatever, but he signs that recognizance and goes free to return for the next appearance before the court.

We are reaching this. We are moving to it and we are not waiting for a push. We are aware of it and I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, just one brief word in summary. I appreciate—and we will get into this more thoroughly under vote 207, I guess—the process of education of—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I was going to say, let us not get into this again.

Mr. Singer: No. But in some of the information I was gathering in preparation for these estimates, I noticed that within the last year or two, I think it was Mr. Wilson of your department, was given the task by one of your predecessors to “educate”—we will put quotation marks around the word—justices of the peace. He held a couple of meetings around the province and I would presume, knowing Mr. Wilson as I do, he prepared a very competent and able presentation for them. But it seemed that he was unable to attract even 50 per cent of the strength of justices of the peace in the areas into which he went.

I do not know if the educational system has been picked up again for justices of the peace and/or magistrates. I think that since these people are the Attorney General’s appointees, and if it is felt as I believe—and I think the hon. Attorney General believes that it is—necessary to educate, then there should be some method of making sure that the people who are to be educated come and get their lessons. As I say, we will go into that phase of it a little more fully on vote 207. But I did notice some comments about this school for JP’s that Mr. Wilson had set up, which was something less than well attended.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Attorney General how many part-time or assistant Crown attorneys there are in the province, and are a part-time and an assistant Crown attorney the same thing? Are they synonymous?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: While I am getting the answer, could I ask for the last part of the question again? Is part time synonymous with what?

Mr. MacDonald: Are part-time Crown attorneys described as assistant Crown attorneys, or are there assistant Crown attorneys who are full time?

Mr. W. E. Sopha (Sudbury): The answer to the second part is yes, of course. Is it not, Mr. Attorney General?

Mr. MacDonald: There are assistant Crown attorneys who are full-time?

Mr. Sopha: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Are there assistant Crown attorneys who then can carry on private practice?

Mr. Sopha: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, the answer to that question is, there are 26 full-time assistant Crown attorneys on salary. They are assistants—that is, the work in the area is sufficient to demand the help of an assistant Crown attorney, but he is full time, devotes all his time to it, is paid on salary and assists the Crown attorney of the county or district.

There are 35 full-time Crown attorneys and 26 assistants. There are ten Crown attorneys who do work on fees, not on salary. I believe they are full-time Crown attorneys, but paid on a fee basis. I may say to the House we have been seeking for a time to get to the salary-only basis and we are approaching that.

There are certain Crown attorneys, and I do not know that I have the number exactly, who are part time and paid on a per diem basis when they assist. They are lawyers in the community who assist the Crown attorney when he needs them. In our view at least, the work is not such that an assistant Crown attorney should be appointed to be on the job and be paid in that way, but from time to time, a Crown attorney, a lawyer in the community may be asked to take a case and he is paid on a basis of, I think it is $35 a day. I could get that figure. There are a number of these in various areas of the province.

Mr. MacDonald: Is the assistant Crown attorney, whether paid on a fee basis or on a salary basis, full time to the extent that he is precluded from private practice?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The assistant Crown attorney is on a salary; he is a full-time assistant Crown attorney. That is his job. He is just the same as a Crown attorney except that the other is the senior man and he is an assistant. The two of them carry on the job. There are some assistant Crown attorneys who are on fee and in those cases some of them are entitled to carry on some practice along with their work.

Mr. MacDonald: Is it considered ethical to advertise to the extent of indicating on your letterhead that you are an assistant Crown attorney, for example, when you are engaging in private practice as well?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would say immediately, Mr. Chairman, that I would not think it so. I would not think it ethical. A lawyer or an assistant Crown attorney doing that type of work on a fee basis or on any other basis, where he is still allowed to carry on some practice, I should think would be very much out of order in putting on his letterhead the fact that he was an assistant Crown attorney. I should make it clear that there is nothing illegal about that, but I think that if the law society were to learn of it, it would quickly tell him to get that off his letterhead or quit practising.

Mr. MacDonald: Perhaps the society should send a letter to Bruce Payne of Guelph—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And so would I if I knew who he was.

Mr. MacDonald: I give you the name of Bruce E. Payne of Guelph forthwith.

I raise the whole thing, Mr. Chairman, because almost every year I run into another case such as this—Bruce E. Payne, BA, barrister and solicitor of Guelph, assistant Crown attorney in the county of Wellington.

I raise it for this reason, that every year I run into a case of people who write in feeling—and maybe their sense of grievance is imagined—that they have not got justice in the courts; and they have not got justice because they have to contend with a man who is at one time acting in his capacity as a lawyer, and on another occasion he is acting as a Crown attorney.

I remember a case a number of years ago where there was a part-time or an assistant Crown attorney up in northwestern Ontario and part of his regular work in a professional and individual capacity was as solicitor for one of the pulp and paper companies. When the union struck, or got into some difficulty, some of the members were charged. The man they had to contend with in court was the man who normally was on a full-time retainer with the company which was charging them. Now, I repeat, maybe this was an imagined sense of grievance in what they thought was an injustice in the courts, but it seems to me that such a lawyer has a conflict of interest; to the person charged there does not appear to be justice, even though there may be.

And the same thing—without going into the detail of it because the man involved admits the case was decided in court, there is not enough money involved now for him to pursue it through appeal—but he has this sense of grievance that on a letterhead that he gets from the lawyer he had to contend with is the designation that he is an assistant Crown attorney. This should be clarified for all those who are in this position by either the hon. Attorney General or the law society.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I have one brief comment on bail. I found the figures of a project which was carried on in New York city interesting in regard to bail and the releasing of persons on their recognizances. The Manhattan project, which has been in operation for some three years on the study that was conducted, shows that there were 3,505 people released on their own recognizances and 98.6 per cent appeared to stand their trial, which means that some low number of 75 persons failed to appear. I think this is a very good indication of the kind of study which could well be made here if it is intended to institute a programme of reducing the number of cases on which bail is set.

Mr. Sopha: I wanted to add a few comments on this subject of bail, a subject which has always interested me very much for it is well known when you get into the realm of bail it is the area which is most susceptible to comment that there is a law for the rich and a law for the poor.

Now, I would suggest these ground rules in respect of bail in this process of education of magistrates that the hon. Attorney General is happily embarking upon. I would think that in the case of quasi-criminal offences under provincial statutes, that only in the most exceptional circumstances should there be an arrest, that in all provincial offences it ought to proceed by way of summons only and the question of bail in that case would simply never arise.

In respect of indictable offences and offences under the criminal code and other federal statutes of a criminal nature, I would think that the magistrate ought to approach the problem before him of granting bail from the point of view of the personality and history of the offender who is before him. It would be difficult to conjure up any tears for the refusal of bail or the setting of a substantial bail for the person charged who has a criminal record.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I wonder if while the hon. member for Sudbury is discussing this matter, Mr. Chairman, he would be good enough to reflect. He said that no provincial offence should be a matter of custody or arrest. There has been considerable discussion recently, with a little urgency towards The Department of the Attorney General, that even offences such as speeding on our highways, which can create considerable danger, be arrestable. I would like to have his thought while he is discussing this matter, and perhaps on the offence when it verges into what is known as dangerous driving.

Mr. Sopha: Of course, dangerous driving is an indictable offence under the criminal code, section 225 or 224 of the code.

The question of speeding: We do not want to get like the jurisdictions of Georgia and Alabama and some of those southern states that one hears about, that when the state highway patrol apprehends the Canadian who is speeding he is immediately taken to the local bastille and locked up, sometimes for several hours or a day until the judicial officer comes around to try him for the offence.

It would not at all distress me that perhaps a few Americans or residents of some other provinces of Canada did not answer the summons and left for their native habitat. We could not get at the American perhaps, but we could certainly, under the compact between the provinces, we could get at our fellow Canadian citizens in other provinces. But I just set that out as a general ground rule, that in quasi-criminal offences I think the summons is certainly sufficient.

Now I have passed over into the offences under the criminal code, and I had said that the person with a record ought to be required to put up substantial bail if the offence with which he is now charged before the court is a serious one. If he cannot put up the substantial bail, well my own view is that it is just a pity that he has to wait in jail until his trial comes. That individual that I posit, my hypothetical individual, is the one who has demonstrated that he has been content to live by anti-social behaviour.

However, they are the great minority of people who pass through our courts charged with offences under the criminal code. When we bear in mind that there are several hundred offences under that statute, I say with some assurance that the great majority of those charged with breaking one of the sections of the criminal code are probably first offenders, and it is only the minority of the hardened criminal type that are tried in the courts.

Then I say in respect of the citizen who is first time in the courts, that the terms of the bail should be very reasonable. The way I like to see a magistrate approach the problem is this: That on the first appearance he will ask the Crown what bail that he thinks is appropriate for the offence; and the Crown fixes a figure, he says, $5,000 cash, $10,000 property. All right!

The person and his counsel and his relatives try for two or three days and are unable to get sureties to come forward and put up that amount. Then after two or three days of bona fide effort, the counsel comes before the magistrate again and he says: Your Worship, we just cannot raise that amount of bail. Fine! It is reduced to $3,000.

Then they try again, they repeat the process for two or three more days and the counsel then appears and by this time, of course, with the aid of an onion, he's weeping a bit into a large handkerchief, and he informs the magistrate that they cannot raise that amount; so the magistrate now reduces it to $500.

Most people are now within the realm that they can get a surety that is worth $500. Even in some cases the individual cannot raise the $500; then I would be content, bearing in mind the very few number of Lucien Rivards that we have in our society, if the magistrate then said: Fine, I will let you go on your own recognizance.

It is better that we risk two or three out of one hundred who do not appear at all in answer to the charge when they come on for trial, it is better that we risk those two or three than that 97 be kept in jail unreasonably. I think I am correct, and I hope I am correct when I say, and I am relying upon memory, that the Canadian Bill of Rights has a statement about bail:

That bail shall not be denied unreasonably.

I think that is in the statute, and unfortunately—in the jurisprudence that has now surrounded it—the statute has not come to mean a great deal. It has not conferred many rights because the judges have approached the statute from the point of view that the rights existed before Mr. Diefenbaker got the idea of passing a statute and making it a part of the body of the law of the land. Of course we have no bill of rights in the province at all, although a good many people would like to see one passed and become even part of our Constitution.

But I hope we have set out clearly the approach that ought to be made to bail, and I want to record that I am happy that in my community the way I have recited it is the way it works. That is the approach made by the magistrates and I think in all fairness it ought to be said that this new approach comes from meetings the magistrates have had under the sponsorship of the hon. Attorney General and where they have discussed this problem.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Very glad to hear that.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, I hope it becomes uniform across the province.

But the great danger we are in is that we go through periods of public consternation and anxiety reflected in the attitudes of magistrates. Rivard escapes, somebody else fails to turn up at his trial, and the judges and the magistrates get all upset as if that is an epidemic. They tell me that down in the court of appeal, after Rivard took off, it was a virtual impossibility to get bail pending appeal.

The hon. Attorney General, of course, always opposed it—well, Attorneys General always appear to anyway, and I venture to say that in most cases they oppose it pending appeal. I hope you will correct me if I am wrong. I was under the impression that the Attorney General's attitude is that it is opposed pending appeal, because the burden of proof has shifted. The accused is now guilty and he must prove his innocence.

Perhaps I should not have got into that question at all because my own experience is that in some cases the Attorney General does not oppose it, but I thought that in the overwhelming number—is that so, sir?—bail pending appeal is opposed?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All I can say to the hon. member is that I have never laid down such a policy.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I have a post-script to this bail question. There has been the suggestion—and I have heard it often enough to wonder whether or not it might not be with some basis of fact—that there exists in this municipality a system of professional bondsmen. On the odd occasion when someone has skipped—we have not had Lucien Rivard here—but when someone has skipped, it happens occasionally—

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): He was not on bail.

Mr. Bryden: He was not on bail.

Mr. Singer: All right, when someone has skipped, it does not really matter.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: It seems to me that the person whose bail is about to be estreated has had a very remote connection—almost untraceable connection, as I have read the newspaper reports—with the accused. As I say, I have heard rumblings often enough to wonder whether there may or not be in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, quite improperly a system of professional bondsmen being set up. I would think as the hon. Attorney General gets into it, he should pay very close attention to this suggestion, which is gossiped about, and to find out whether or not it is going on. If some of the steps are taken that my hon. colleague and I have suggested to you, the use of the professional bondsman by and large is going to disappear in any event. But it has been rumoured about, and if it is in fact true, it is a most disturbing suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I might just say, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. member that where we have had suspicion of this, and we have had occasion, we have immediately investigated. I think right now we hope to make that profession so uninteresting and so unprofitable, it will disappear.

Mr. Singer: That is right, that is right; if you clean up the system there will not be any need for that.

Vote 206 agreed to.

On vote 207:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Halton.

Mr. Kerr: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments and observations regarding vote 207. Before I do, I would like to refer to the hon. member for Downsview's reference to lack of courtroom facilities and a backlog of cases on various dockets in the province.

It is my understanding that one of the main reasons for the delay in hearing cases is because of lawyers not being prepared to go on with their cases and continuously asking for remands and adjournments. One county court judge, for example, has said that it takes nearly a week of actual sittings to dispose of approximately one day's case-load, over a three-month period because of this situation.

In many municipalities the backlog and delay taxes our courtroom facilities. There is also the critical shortage of judges in the province, which we have heard something about, and the fact that too many of them are active in other duties off the bench.

Most of the introductory remarks of the hon. member for Downsview were concerned with the conduct of one or two magistrates. Certainly, the transcript revealed some rather shocking facts which should be brought to the attention of this House. However, the lack of any new or real criticism in the hon. Attorney General's department after such a prolonged pre-estimates fanfare indicates the ability, and the co-operation, sincerity and hard work of the present Attorney General. As members of this House know, Mr. Chairman, the mortality rate of this post is rather high. However, I predict that the attitude of the present Attorney General will assure him of a long tenure.

More than any other department, this department, must to use a rather loose phrase, be above politics. The respect and dignity of our courts and the administration of justice in this province must remain at a high level. A great deal of responsibility for this rests with our hon. Minister and the department. Surely the situation in Ottawa places a greater onus on this government to this end. Our hon. Attorney General is aware of and accepts this responsibility. I think, for example, Mr. Chairman, where we have a police commission report tabled and the same week a bill implementing many of its recommendations, that that is evidence of the department's new look.

The hon. members of the Opposition dwelt at some length on the reference in the report regarding amalgamation of police forces. The report refers to a general survey and it seems that the survey has not as yet been completed. The hon. members of the Opposition called for mandatory legislation to force amalgamation now. However, the report does not necessarily recommend such a step at this time. It recommends permissive and persuasive legislation.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, as the hon. Attorney General has pointed out, a major step such as the amalgamation of forces requires certain preparation, such as the extension of our intercommunications network, training facilities and courses, a more uniform standard of training personnel, trained personnel in our municipal forces, the establishment of more boards of police commissions; the extension of OPP jurisdiction in small villages and towns, and so on.

It is easy, I think, Mr. Chairman, for those who sit in the Opposition to demand mandatory legislation. The hon. members in the Opposition naturally have the duty to criticize and to offer constructive suggestions. However, it seems that whenever we introduce good legislation, usually after a great deal of study—such as The Training Schools Act, The Child Welfare Act, amendments to The Workmen's Compensation Act and The Police Act—there is always the same comment, the same frantic criticism: "It is too late; it is too little; it does not go far enough."

When we realize that not one of the hon. gentlemen who sit in the Opposition, except the hon. member for Grey South (Mr. Oliver), have ever had the privilege to govern the affairs of this province, it is perhaps understandable why their suggestions and remarks are not always based on logic.

However, it is important that legislation is acceptable and that it will work. The government has its responsibilities. In the meantime, do not be too critical of a police force because it is small. I predict, Mr. Chairman, that if no voluntary amalgamation takes place in the next 12 months in many of these forces, particularly in areas where they are most needed, we shall see a more persuasive type of legislation enacted.

A moment ago I mentioned Ottawa. Right now I can think of three spheres where the federal statutes closely affect the course of justice in this province. The most noticeable, of course, is The Matrimonial Causes Act. This ancient statute, with its ancient, limited and almost sadistic provisions, prevents this House from introducing reform in the divorce field. There is, of course, a constitutional problem which complicates and restricts us here.

Then there is the criminal code, with its archaic provisions regarding lotteries and petty games of chance. I am tired of being asked to salvage the Monday night bingo at the local church.

Bail has also been mentioned. I agree with many of the criticisms regarding bail and I welcome the hon. Attorney General's remarks in this field.

But more important, Mr. Chairman, is the matter of convicting first offenders. The criminal code should be amended, and should have been amended years ago, so that the record of young, first offenders upon conviction of a minor offence under the code could be suspended or expunged after a period of time.

In dealing with vote 207 and probation services, I may be ahead of things here a bit, but I would like to discuss possible amendments to The Probation Act at this time. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to have the hon. Minister's views on whether or not he thinks it could be amended so that a young or first offender could be under the provisions of the Act prior to conviction.

We have a situation in many counties whereby the magistrate refuses to convict these young, first offenders on some minor charge under the code and he will not accept a plea of guilty because he feels that this boy or girl will have a record and will carry a stigma for life. The obvious solution, of course, is to amend the code. The amendment could provide that after such a person is convicted, if for a period of three or five years no further offence is committed and the offender has a satisfactory report from a probation officer, the record could be expunged.

Under such provisions, conviction is not such a serious matter. However, I think frankly that our lakes will overflow before the federal jurisdiction will again get around to making substantial amendments which are long overdue in the criminal code.

In most cases, magistrates request a pre-sentence report, particularly in respect to a young offender. However, under our present Probation Act, the magistrate must first convict the accused. Many of them are reluctant to do so, but at the same time would like to have the advantage of such a pre-sentence report. This is the case, for example, in Halton county, because our magistrate is not registering convictions he does not, therefore, as of a few weeks ago, have the facilities of provincial probation officers to get the information he wishes about the accused. The good magistrate at the present time is using local clergymen to fill this role.

I was wondering, Mr. Chairman, if it would be possible to amend section 3 of The Probation Act to make it possible for a magistrate to request a pre-sentence report prior to either registering a conviction or otherwise dealing with the charge. There is no question that this provision could be used in extraordinary circumstances, such as I have mentioned. It would be in a situation where the magistrate is satisfied in his own mind that the young accused is guilty, but prior to registering a conviction he wants to know more about this young boy or girl.

The section of the Act to which I refer could be amended so that the facility, assistance and direction of the probation officer could be used to the advantage of the young accused who may find himself in deep trouble because of nothing more than a prank.

I admit that this method may be second best, Mr. Chairman, but it would help eliminate the ludicrous situation where we have magistrates in this province who, because they do not agree with the law as it exists, are in fact frequently flouting the law in their personal effort to reform and rehabilitate the offender.

Mr. Bryden: Vote 207 covers a great many important matters. There is one that I am particularly interested in that I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Attorney General. That is the question of the maintenance of deserted wives and mothers.

My experience in trying to help women who have been left in this unfortunate situation leads me to the conclusion that this must be one of the most unsatisfactory fields of the law of the province.

I noticed an item in one of the Toronto newspapers not long ago, reporting that a special investigation unit operated jointly by the city and the province in the past three years, has caught up with more than 2,600 husbands who had deserted their wives and children. That appears to be quite a record of achievement, but then the same news account goes on to say, and I will quote a paragraph from it:

In a report to the city's committee on public welfare, fire and legislation, the commissioner showed that while the 239 husbands were directed to pay—this refers to 239 husbands who were directed to pay maintenance:

—that while the 239 husbands were directed to pay a total of $249,000, the collections made by the Metropolitan Toronto juvenile and family court totalled only $55,733.

Here, I think, in cold statistics is a terrible story of tragedy. We all know that the orders that family court makes certainly would not allow for any luxurious living on the part of the beneficiaries, the deserted wife and the children. And yet, of the total amount of the orders referred to here, less than one-quarter was actually paid.

It was found that a quarter of a million dollars collectively was required and was properly payable to these women to feed and clothe their children, and the women were able to obtain collectively, $55,000 to $56,000 out of a quarter of a million dollars. What this means, of course, is that there were children who did not have food on the table or inadequate amounts of food, not to speak of the emotional strain to which the mothers must have been subjected. I think the whole system is wrong. I made a suggestion last year to the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) as to a way of improving it. I do not think it really caught fire in The Department of Public Welfare, so I am going to try it again today on The Department of The Attorney General. Perhaps it may be considered more favourably there.

Before I get on to the specific suggestion, I would like to refer to some individual cases. In our office, and I have no doubt in the offices of all politicians, many letters are received, as well as telephone interviews and personal interviews from women who have been deserted by their husbands with one or more children to maintain. I am certainly not going to read all the letters we have received because this session would last for a long time if I did. But I am going to read some extracts from some of them, which I take as representative. I have the actual letters here, Mr. Chairman, and would be perfectly happy to let the hon. Attorney General, or anyone else, inspect them, if anyone wishes to satisfy himself that they exist and that I have quoted fairly from them. I am not going to table them, however, because I see no reason why the names of these women should be made public and I am not going to read the letters in their entirety because some of them are quite long.

I have, however, selected a number of passages which I consider representative. They are passages which, I think, point up the sort of problem that arises. Here is an extract from one of these letters:

We got a separation at a lawyer and he promised—that is the husband, not the lawyer:

—to pay support for the three children. He did so for about six weeks and then nothing. I had him to court and as you are well aware, that is just a farce. He left March 7 and I received payments until May 14. Then the courts ordered him to pay me $25 a week through the courts. I received $25 in August, and then three months without any money at all from him. I then moved to Toronto. I worked for six weeks, evenings, about $50 a week, which just isn't enough to support three children. So, after losing my job, I decided to go on welfare so that I would be home where I figured I belonged until the children were older. But before receiving any assistance at all—and here is really a cruel provision in the law:

—before receiving any assistance at all I had to press charges against my husband. Well I did this and then the court business started over again. Finally he was told he had to pay me $200 back payments or two months in jail. That was quite a laugh.

This happened in November and as of mid-January—that is mid-January of this year:

—he is still walking around having a ball. I still receive no support and have to live on approximately $37 a week.

Here is another letter:

I have three children—the oldest is nine—and in four and a half years have received the grand total of $20 from their father. I have been dealing through the family court all this time but they seem unable to do anything to get this money through. It is unbelievable that a man could get away with things like this.

Here is still another:

In January, 1962, I was deserted with one child and another due that April. After experiencing much difficulty in getting the father into court I was awarded maintenance of $15 a week for my one child. As you may well imagine, payments were collected only with great difficulty and with what I felt was a very minimum amount of effort expended by court officials. I moved to Toronto and found it necessary to begin the entire process again. To sum up, he is presently over $400 in arrears of his payments, still only $15 per week, but now for the two children, and apparently he sends money only after I telephone the court again, from whom I feel I receive only token assistance, and they have contacted him.

In the entire year 1963, I received only $140 and in 1964, only $507. He operates a business and is well able to afford the grand sum of $15 per week. I cannot understand how anyone can ignore a court order with apparent impunity, and why the courts do not make more substantial efforts to see that their orders are carried out. I have at various stages in my dealings with the courts found an almost hostile attitude in some of the officials to whom I have spoken. I might also mention that letters to The Department of the Attorney General, and other representations made on my behalf, produced if anything, negative results.

Here is an extract from a fourth letter:

My husband left me with three children, five years ago. He is supposed to pay us $25 a week. If he misses a week I cannot get any action until at least three weeks have gone by without receiving any money from him. I thought it would be better if I applied for relief to help out while waiting for the family court to round up my husband. That takes another two or three weeks. They have to find out if he is working or not. If they find out he is not working, well bully for me! We get relief all in good time.

And still another:

I am having quite a struggle trying to raise my children properly on my own income and what little I receive through family court. In three years the payments have dropped to over $1,000 in arrears. I shudder to think what would happen if I was unable to work.

Still another one:

In the last four years that I have been separated from my husband I have received about $100 support and this only with constant trips to, and long delays at, the family court. This amount does not go far over four years when trying to feed and clothe a child especially when she has cerebral palsy and must have constant medical attention. I realize that there are many women in our predicament and the courts are trying to help, but are they trying their best? It seems that the onus is completely upon the wife—and I think that is a valid point:

—and the husband is left comparatively free to do as he wishes including ignoring the letters from court.

And here is the final letter from which I would like to quote a portion:

My husband deserted me when my girl was only four months old. After a hearing in family court he was ordered to pay for her support $32 a month. He paid until she was about two years old. This was eight years ago; then he vanished. I went back to the court over and over again and asked for help. All the answer I got was find him and we will make him pay. Meanwhile go to the welfare. I never did. I never could hire anybody to find him because I did not have the money.

Now, Mr. Chairman, those are extracts from seven letters. I am sure that the hon. Attorney General and every hon. member in this House will agree that they are entirely representative of the situations in which many women in this province find themselves at the present time, and have found themselves for many years.

The problem is that if the wife is deserted, the law, quite properly, takes the position that the husband, the father of the children, should pay towards the maintenance of the children. I have no objection to that. I think that is a sound principle. But what I do object to is the further provision of the law that it is the responsibility of the wife to take the initiative in finding him and bringing him into court, and then getting an order against him, and then getting the order enforced. The court officials give minor assistance in that regard, but it is of a very minor nature indeed. The onus falls mainly on the wife.

Now, a woman with two or three small children to bring up, without a father in the home, has more than enough worry and strain, without having to make constant trips down to family court to see if they can locate her husband and, after locating him, if they can squeeze a few dollars out of him. I do not think that she should be placed in that situation. She is in a difficult enough situation as it is. Those of us who have read Michael Harrington's book, The Other America, will recall that Harrington noted that one of the main groups of people suffering from poverty, are women and their families who have been deserted. They are in a condition of poverty to begin with. To struggle along and to try to bring up a family under those unfavourable circumstances is surely enough for any human being without having to carry on this largely futile and most frustrating procedure of going down to court time after time. Maybe the woman will get $20 if she goes down a few times. So she gets that and then she has to go down again because it is that $20 and nothing more.

Now it seems to me that there is a fairly simple solution to this problem—at least it is the beginning of a solution—a solution to the specific aspect that I am dealing with. I proposed it to the hon. Minister of Public Welfare last year. I think perhaps it is a matter that more properly should be considered by the hon. Attorney General. I say that a woman who has been deserted by her husband or the father of her children should have the option of assigning her claim against the father to the Crown. Perhaps the hon. Attorney General is the person to whom she should assign it; he probably is the proper officer of the Crown to receive such assignments.

Now, I do not say that she should be compelled to do this. There are many cases where settlements have been effected either voluntarily or through the family court where the father honours his obligations and the family is much better off than they would be if they were on welfare or on mother's allowance. Those situations, of course, should remain undisturbed. But where the woman simply cannot get the money or cannot collect it in adequate amounts, I think she should be entitled to assign her claim to the Crown. Then if she does that, she should be eligible for mother's allowance.

All of us know that mother's allowance is not a very generous allowance. People live in dire poverty on mother's allowance, but it is better than nothing and at least it is a secure income. The woman can know that it is going to come in every month and she can therefore plan her programme for the maintenance and upbringing of her children accordingly. She should be able to collect the mother's allowance regularly and without interruption. She should not be in the position where, if she can get $20 out of her husband, she is taken off welfare. She cannot get back on welfare until he has missed two or three payments and she has made several trips to the family court.

Let her be guaranteed the income, such as it is, that is provided for mothers of dependent children who have no husbands to support them; let her receive these payments regularly; let the Crown receive an assignment of her claim against her husband—or it may be that it is not her husband, but at any rate the father of her children; and let the officers of the Crown go after him. And I say: Let them go after him as hard as they can. I certainly am holding no brief for any man who refuses to accept his responsibilities for the maintenance of his children.

But I am saying that the hon. Attorney General's department is much better equipped to deal with recalcitrant fathers of this kind than is a poor struggling mother.

Then, if the hon. Attorney General manages to collect the money owing, that is fine; that can be offset against the payments made to the mother in mother's allowance. In other words it will simply go to the provincial Treasury. If the Crown fails to collect from the man—and I am afraid that will happen frequently—well, I think that the hon. Provincial Treasurer can bear the loss with greater equanimity than the poor mother who is entirely dependent upon it for the upkeep of her children. I am sure it will not matter to him if his deficit for the year is increased from $140 million to $140,001,000, I am sure it will not make any difference at all.

If, on the other hand, the hon. Attorney General manages to collect more than the amount of the family allowance then let him pay the difference to the mother. She can certainly use it; I am sure she will not waste it on riotous living; she will probably be able to buy another pair of shoes for the children. That will be about as far as that would go.

But let all this onus, this nervous strain, this tension, be removed from the mother. Let the officers of the Crown handle the deserting father, let The Department of Public Welfare take care of the deserted mother. It seems to me that this is a sensible and reasonable proposal that would help to solve an extremely difficult problem; one that causes not only heartache but genuine physical suffering, amounting even to starvation, to shortage of food for the mother and children. Let this problem be dealt with on its merits and let the other problem of making the deserting husband accept his obligations be dealt with as an entirely separate issue.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Attorney General's estimates were first called, I had occasion to remark on the conduct of two magistrates. When the hon. Attorney General replied, he commented on my view of the law, particularly insofar as it referred to the decisions or the actions of Magistrate McClevis, which I questioned. I expressed at that time, sir, grave doubt as to the hon. Attorney General's opinion of the law, but not being aware of what answer he would give me, I was not able to prepare any answer for him at that time. I have since, sir, had an opportunity to examine the authorities and I bring now to the hon. Attorney General's attention a most important case, which I am certain he will accept as the authority on this matter. The case is Regina vs. Essex justices ex-parte final. It is reported in 1962, 3 All England Reports at page 924. That case was heard by Lord Parker, the chief justice of England—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What page?

Mr. Singer: Page 924. —by Mr. Justice Gorman and Mr. Justice Sammon.

An hon. member: A strong bench!

Mr. Singer: A very strong bench of the Queen's bench division. And I do not think, sir, that there could be a stronger or more authoritative bench than the one that gave this decision. I am going to read first the headnote and then a couple of extracts from the decision, which, I think, having heard this, the hon. Attorney General would be bound to agree that the legal opinion he gave us was quite incorrect.

The headnote says this:

K was charged with a motoring offence. After hearing evidence the chairman of the bench announced the determination and decision of the court to the effect that

K. would be fined, whereupon K's solicitor produced further argument to the effect that the case had not been proved. The justice, after hearing the further argument, dismissed the information. On an application for an order of certiorari to quash the justice's decision, dismissing the information, on the ground that they had no power to do so once they had convicted, and for an order of mandamus requiring the justices to substitute in the register a conviction and the sentence of a fine.

It was held that certiorari and mandamus would be granted, because what the chairman of the bench announced amounted to a conviction, and the justices were functus officio at the moment when they had announced their decision.

Now I am just going to refer very briefly to some of the remarks that the chief justice, Lord Parker, made in delivering his judgment and a couple of remarks made by Mr. Justice Gorman and by Mr. Justice Sammon.

At page 926, where the chief justice is quoting from other authorities, he refers to Rex vs. The Manchester Justices, ex parte Leaver and the reference to that case is 1937 3 All England Reports at page 4 and 1937 2 King's Bench, 96. And quoting from that case and the judgment of Mr. Justice Humphreys in that case, he said:

I find it difficult to treat seriously the argument that a statement by the magistrates, who are a court of competent jurisdiction, that a person who has been tried before them is guilty, followed by a statement that he is to pay certain penalties, does not form a conviction, and that there is no conviction unless and until some clerk has made a record of that finding and sentence in the book which the court is required to keep.

Now to translate that into simpler language. If Mr. Justice Humphreys is right and the chief justice, Lord Parker, thinks he is right and quotes him as an authority, the argument of the Attorney General falls completely, because the so-called record the Attorney General was looking for and suggested there had to be an endorsement on, in the view of this court in England has no importance at all.

The chief justice goes on to say, and I am still quoting from page 926:

I have no doubt in my own mind that the justices in the present case were functus officio at the moment when they had announced their decision—

As did the magistrate in the case that I referred to at the beginning of these debates. And whatever the ultimate result of the case may be there is good ground for letting an order of certiorari and an order of mandamus issue.

Then, sir, turning to page 927, Mr. Justice Gorman says this—and he quotes a previous case, I think it is Jones and Williams. The references are all there. I do not know if my hon. friend wants the citation for this but it is in a footnote at page 927. But quoting Lord Goddard, chief justice—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have already distinguished the case in my own mind, but I would be glad to read it.

Mr. Singer: Well, if my hon. friend is able to distinguish it, he is doing mental gymnastics that I can find no—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Very simple, I will point it out.

Mr. Singer: The fact that the magistrate announces in court that there is a conviction amounts to a conviction. And Mr. Justice Gorman says:

In my view of the authorities that is right.

He goes on to say:

It is said by counsel for the respondent that even if there was a conviction, as in my view there undoubtedly was, the judges had an inherent jurisdiction to alter the conviction, if—

I think that he seeks to limit it to sitting at the same time and in the same court:

—if they find there has been some mistake. Counsel for the appellant answers that by saying that there is no such discretion or no such jurisdiction, I agree with counsel for the appellant, and for these reasons I agree with my Lord—and he refers to the decision of the chief justice.

And then Mr. Justice Sammon, who was the third judge on that bench says:

I agree. It is quite plain on authority that once a decision by magistrates is announced in open court that decision so announced amounts either to an acquittal or a conviction as the case may be. Once the magistrates have convicted or acquitted, they are functus officio and cannot alter their decision.

Now, with the greatest respect to my friend I cannot see how he can distinguish this case from the case to which I refer, because there was a hearing, there was a conviction, there was a sentence and there was a reservation of it or cancellation of it immediately in open court. A week later the sentence was confirmed, the sentence went before the county court judge on an appeal. What other conclusion can there be and in the words of these three justices that once the magistrate had performed those acts he was functus officio? With great respect to my hon. friend, I think the case I stated then was valid and with this authority I suggest that there can be no doubt about its validity.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak very briefly to this matter. I do not feel that the House is perhaps interested in a legal discussion between two lawyer members as such. However, there is a distinction that comes at once to mind as my learned friend read the case. I must say this, I should like an opportunity to read it. I have found through my practice that it is sometimes misleading, I do not suggest intentionally so, to read excerpts from a long judgment or judgment of more than one member of the court.

However, when the hon. member for Downsview started out he described the case where there had been a conviction pronounced by the magistrate or the convicting justice, and then he reversed himself completely round about and said: "No. No conviction." Washed it right off! That was not the case with Magistrate McClevis. He had a conviction, he imposed a penalty and then he simply varied the penalty. Now this to my mind is a very clear distinction. It is not an alteration of the judgment or the finding at all; the conviction stood. The magistrate altered the penalty.

Beyond that I do not propose to go at the moment. I could argue that while the case has great persuasive merit, if it were on all fours, this jurisdiction of Ontario is no longer bound by it, but I will not pursue that argument. I say there is a clear distinction between finding a conviction and then completely wiping it out—a total reversal—and finding a conviction, leaving the conviction to stand but altering the penalty first thought of and modifying that penalty. That is all I would propose to say at this time.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter into any more complicated legal argument but I suggest that there can be only one interpretation of the words "functus officio." If those words mean what they say, they mean that the thing was over, it was at an end. And I suggest the hon. Attorney General in an effort to defend a very weak case that he presented is now splitting hairs. If the words "functus officio" are applicable, and they are applicable as these three judges say, then the magistrate was through with that case once the decision had been pronounced, and that is it. And any effort to shore up the sort of legal argument that the Attorney General put forward, while it may make an interesting argument before a court of appeal, it is my very strong submission, Mr. Chairman, that there is no basis in law for it whatsoever. Enough for that.

I want to deal at some length with the question of justices of the peace and in connection with this I presume the hon. Attorney General is familiar with a recent article that appeared in one of our local newspapers, in the magazine section, concerning justices of the peace. This article levied some pretty serious charges against the government in connection with the appointment and training of justices of the peace. And it would seem to me, and I am going to repeat some of these charges as they are in this article, it would seem to me that the hon. Attorney General, having become aware of this article, and it was published March 20, 1965, would have taken the first occasion to rise in his place in the House and deny these charges if there is in fact a denial. Because some of the things they suggest in here about government, to say the least, are not flattering. To go a little further than that, they are quite damning.

For instance:

There is little disquietude over the fact that 950 persons who are unversed in the law and owe their jobs to political patronage, have the power to jail a citizen in perpetuity.

I would have thought that the hon. Attorney General, the day after he saw that, would have come into the House and risen on a point of privilege or something just to set the record clear, if this is not the record, but we have not heard a word about that. The gentleman who wrote this article is called Albert Warson and this is in the Globe Magazine supplement to the Globe and Mail of March 20, 1965. Amongst other things he makes these remarks:

In the letter of the law—which is by no means so immaculately strict as the cliché would suggest—a citizen in Ontario can be arrested, haled into court, convicted, fined $1,000 or sentenced to as much as six months in jail at the discretion of a man who is without formal legal training, who holds his position through party patronage and who may be moonlighting in court from his regular line, which could be anything from haberdashery to hogs.

He says the same man can decide absolutely whether without appeal from the decision, whether a private citizen or the police for that matter, will be allowed to lay a charge against the suspected wrongdoer.

I am sure it has come to the hon. Attorney General's attention very frequently, the citizen's complaint that "I went to the justice of the peace and the justice of the peace refused to allow me to swear out a complaint." Whether rightly or wrongly, I have heard many of these complaints. Whether the complaints were justified or not, I am not going to discuss. But it would seem to me that since this is the machinery that a private citizen can initiate, and the only procedure by which a private citizen himself, on his initiative, can commence criminal proceedings for assault and various other things, when he has to go to a justice of the peace, this government has a very serious and important responsibility to make sure that those persons who are appointed to act as justices of the peace are the best people available.

Even more disturbingly, the article goes on, the man in question may commit someone to jail for eight days at a time in perpetuity. This is the sort of thing—there were some awfully excited words about in the debate on Bill No. 99. While the police commission was denied this privilege or not given it, the justice of the peace apparently still has it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He still has it and he has had it for a great many years.

Mr. Singer: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Under section 457 of the criminal code.

Mr. Singer: I agree, and since that power is there and since it is in the criminal code and since it is given to justices of the peace, one would think that one of the hon. Attorney General's most important tasks would be to make sure that everyone who is a justice of the peace is competently trained, is well equipped to do his job, so that there could be no possible abuse of this very far-reaching power. I suggest the hon. Attorney General is a long way from making sure that this is in fact the case. He may do this if a person required to give evidence before a preliminary hearing refuses without—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, this is all very interesting and of course I have read the article. These statements seem startling if it is true, but I wonder if my hon. friend has ever stopped to think—if he can find in his own experience, or if he has been able to find in the experience of anyone else—where a justice of the peace has ever exercised the power he is making such a lot of words about, committing someone to jail for eight days and then again and then again. Can he tell me of one solitary instance?

Mr. Singer: I cannot, but the fact that that power is there and that we know it is there should make us all most concerned about the persons who have the power to do this very thing, and if the hon. Attorney General was prepared to say that he is satisfied with all of the justices of the peace, with their training, with their ability, with their knowledge, with their regular courses of study, and that he is satisfied that all of these people, if called upon, would exercise this power, this very dangerous power, with the utmost caution and protection, then perhaps there would be a point in what he is saying.

But I suggest, sir, that since this criticism in this article, and since a case I am going to bring before you very shortly I think will speak for itself, this seems to indicate that our system of appointing justices of the peace is something far less than satisfactory, and that the hon. Attorney General should not say to me, "Can you give me one instance?" Rather, the hon. Attorney General should be prepared to say, "Our system is good and we are satisfied with it," or, "We are going to do something to change it radically." I say again, sir, that the charges in this article are of a most serious nature and it would have seemed to me that the hon. Attorney General, having read this article, would have been most anxious on the Monday following March 20, to come into this House and say, "The article is wrong," and I think the opportunity could easily have been created to do that, if he had wanted to. This is a series in a responsible journal by a responsible writer; this is a series of very important and very damning charges directed to the office of the hon. Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member allow me? I could be up on my feet many times and occupying a great deal of the time of this House if I got up to deal with every newspaper article I did not like, or that I thought was unfair in its import or its implication. The article is not wrong when it says that the justice of the peace may commit the witness to jail if he refuses to make a statement under oath at a preliminary inquiry, and that he may put him in jail for eight clear days and bring him back and put him in again. This is not wrong, but I have tried to point out that it is not such a dreadful thing as would appear in the article. It has been in the criminal code. It is section 457. It was attempted to be used in one of our Acts in this Legislature last year, but it was repudiated. However, it has been in our criminal code—a federal statute—for many years and it has been used across the years by justices of the peace through this province in criminal proceedings. This is what the article fails to point out.

I could go on with almost every feature of it. The article fails to point out that by virtue of that warrant, by virtue of that power—which I cannot find has been used by a justice of the peace in years and years and about whose use my hon. friend cannot tell me of a single instance—it guarantees that the witness comes to the preliminary inquiry and gives evidence and tells the truth and does not put himself in jeopardy of being thrown in jail and being kept there until he does. That was put in by our forefathers in their wisdom. There it has been and there it has been used. Perhaps the article might have surveyed the possibility of having some virtue in that section, which has proved itself, not by its use, but by its being there, down through the years.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend makes some very interesting points. He says he does not feel it is his job to come into the House every time someone writes an article with which he does not agree and I would accept that as a general premise, certainly. But I say that when an article that is damning to this extent, which addresses criticism, very substantial criticism, at the office of the Attorney General or at the functioning of law administration—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Just once more and then I will promise to say nothing until the hon. member is finished. Is the article damning the law—the section which I have mentioned which is on the federal statute book—or is it damning the officials? I think by and large they are respected people. Is it damning the officials or is it damning the law or is it damning both?

Mr. Singer: I do not think, Mr. Chairman, it is particularly damning the law; I think it is damning the system which allows officials, who, in the opinion of this writer and in my opinion, are appointed unversed in the law. He says there are 950 persons who are unversed in the law and owe their jobs to political patronage. That is pretty damning, is it not? That is pretty damning. He says, and I will repeat this:

These things can be done at the discretion of a man who is without formal legal education, who holds his position through party patronage and who may be moonlighting in court from his regular line which could be anything from haberdashery to hogs.

He points out:

I am disturbed that this section is in the code.

I do not think that section should be in the code, but I recognize that in this House—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Did you ever say anything; did you ever tell the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Singer: I recognize that in this House we can do nothing about what is in the criminal code, but I say as well, sir, that in this House we can do something and certainly we can say something and hope it is going to be effective, about the system of appointing justices of the peace. This is only one of the criticisms. There are many more criticisms in this article, so let us not get diverted just on to this one thing.

Their system is a patchwork of convenient practice, statutory clutter, responsibilities by extension and duties by default, as to be a scandal in the pure sense of the term, a stumbling block with a final faith in the due process of the law. There are almost no age limits for the post.

He mentions a young man in London in 1956—there is no point in mentioning his name—who was appointed a justice of the peace at the age of 21. My hon. colleague from Sudbury gave me a couple of other instances where men at age 21 had been appointed justices of the peace. I say with the greatest respect to my friend the hon. Attorney General that for a young man of 21 without any formal legal training or background to be given the power and authority of a justice of the peace, is wrong. I am sure that my hon. friend, reasonable man that he is, will agree with me. This man who is referred to in the article doubles as a violinist in the London Symphony Orchestra. Good for him! He is the youngest JP ever named and my friend the hon. member for Sudbury tells me that there are a couple of others that he is aware of. As for the oldest, the distinction is an academic one since death appears to be the only factor certain to remove a justice of the peace from his commission.

No legal qualifications are required.

“JP’s are chosen,” Inspector of Legal Offices Alan A. Russell says, “as much as possible for intelligence, common sense, a grasp of local affairs, and, if possible, a knowledge of the law.”

They are appointed to their jobs by the provincial Cabinet on the recommendation of the Attorney General’s department, but the original nominations may have come from a variety of officials—a member of the Legislature, a judge, a magistrate, or an officer of the provincial police. Sources in the Attorney General’s department—

I am sure the hon. Attorney General would want to comment on this next remark, Mr. Chairman:

—are quite blunt about the crucial step in screening nominees: Each is checked out with the appropriate government member or, if the post to be filled is in Opposition territory, with the appropriate riding association.

As I say, these are fairly serious charges—and if the gentleman who wrote the article is wrong, I should think that the hon. Attorney General would be anxious to set the record straight.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I thought some of your members sitting behind you would set the record straight and tell you that in Opposition territory, we consult those members.

Mr. Singer: In the six years that I have had the privilege of being here, sir, may I say that no one in the government has consulted me about the appointment of a justice of the peace. I am not aware that any of my colleagues have been consulted; they might have been, but none of them has told me.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Metro Toronto is always an exception.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: I think that this deserves an answer. This is a charge made in a responsible newspaper. If it is not true, let the hon. Attorney General get up and say so. I think that the record should be set straight.

JPs get no formal instruction in their duties. By the provincial Justices of the Peace Act, each JP who is appointed must be examined by a county court judge before he takes up his duties. In practice, the questioning usually takes a perfunctory five or 10 minutes. After that, though the JP is presumed to call on the nearest magistrate or Crown attorney if he needs guidance, he is on his own.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): If you take the word "perfunctory" out, it might be an accurate statement. My information about people who go down to be interviewed by the judge on this matter are given a very careful going over.

Mr. Singer: I do not know if the hon. Minister of Labour was here when I commenced these remarks; my prelude to them was this—

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Well, do not repeat it, please.

Mr. Singer: I will, because the hon. Minister of Labour apparently is not familiar with them. My introduction was this: There was an article written and appearing in a responsible newspaper, which represented a very serious, if not damning, criticism of the actions of government in this regard and I would have hoped that the hon. Attorney General, having seen this—and he has advised that he has seen it—would have taken the first opportunity after this came to his attention, to come to the House and to answer it. He has not answered it, and I think he should. If these charges are, in fact, incorrect, then I think the record should be set straight.

Given the correct political leanings, almost anyone at all is eligible for appointment as a JP.

—the article goes on:

The fact is that JPs are instead the object of such widespread official concern—and this is a very interesting comment, too:

—that two senior members of the Attorney General's department did not know, and refused to believe it when a reporter told them recently that the 15 JPs in Metropolitan Toronto belonged to local 79 in the Canadian union of public employees. Union membership, of course, raises the possibility that the JPs could tie up the Metro courts in a strike.

I would like to hear whether the hon. Attorney General thinks that this is reasonable and logical, or whether he thinks it is unreasonable.

An hon. member: That is pretty far-fetched!

Mr. Singer: The article goes on:

It is a JP to whom a police officer routinely applies for a search warrant and it is he who signs summonses and warrants for arrest, at the request of the law. This puts within the JP's absolute discretion the police officer's right to invade the privacy of any citizen at any time of the day or night, at home or at work, and to force any lock or barrier or to break into any safety deposit box belonging to the person against whom the warrant is issued.

Well, as my hon. friend knows, these are very serious powers and there is concern, there is real concern about the people who exercise them. I am not going to read the whole of the article but there are two or three more references here that I do want to make.

We talked about bail and my comments in regard to bail were made earlier. There was substantial criticism of the method of payment of justices of the peace, but that substantially has been corrected so there is no point in referring to that. But here, toward the end of the article, under the paragraph head of "Conflict of Interest" are some remarks that I think are very important:

In 1963, Mr. Justice W. D. Roach tabled in the Legislature the report on his Royal commission on crime in Ontario. Roach recommended in it that James Bartlett, the provincial police deputy commissioner, resign, and it was only upon Bartlett's resignation that the inspector of legal offices discovered the deputy commissioner had also been holding a JP's commission. The inspector, Alan Russell, was indignant: he said the dual office constituted a conflict of interest because Bartlett issued search warrants and other processes to officers of his force without any impartial judicial officer being consulted. Nevertheless, two civilian employees of the provincial police were appointed JPs the same year to pave the way for the force's investigations and arrests and both Inspector Russell and Commissioner Eric Silk seem satisfied that this is proper, arguing the civilian employees are not actually on the force. There are lawyers who do not agree.

I would be most interested in hearing the hon. Attorney General's views on that. Is the inspector of legal offices, Mr. Russell, correctly quoted? Was he shocked, and if he was shocked, why has his department not done anything about it?

I am going to elaborate a bit more on this particular aspect in just a moment.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What year was that?

Mr. Singer: Well, in 1963, Bartlett was a justice of the peace and in 1964—and I think at the present time, if I am not incorrect—two persons very closely associated with the Ontario provincial police and, in fact, working in their offices, are justices of the peace.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I was inquiring as to the year of the appointment.

Mr. Singer: The year of the appointment of Bartlett? I do not know. It is my understanding that after Bartlett resigned, or retired, or whatever happened to Bartlett, that these other two men came along. That information—this other man here that I am going to talk about in just a moment—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: For the record may I make it clear that no persons employed or engaged as police officers have been appointed justices of the peace by my department while I have been Attorney General!

Mr. Singer: By your department since your accession to that office, but as late as 1963, Mr. Swan was appointed and we will have some comments about Mr. Swan just in a minute, and I would like to know if the views, as I say, of Mr. Russell are, in fact, the true views of the present Attorney General or the true policy of this department.

There is reference in this article, as I talked about earlier, to Mr. Wilson's giving a series of four-hour lectures on the duties of a justice of the peace in Windsor, Niagara Falls, London, Owen Sound, Sarnia and Newmarket. About half the total number of justices of the peace turned up to listen and there has been no other effort since to give them any instruction.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I must rise, Mr. Chairman, I cannot just let remarks like this go unanswered.

Mr. Singer: Well, will the hon. Attorney General wait until I am finished?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would like to just say this: There have been other efforts. One of them is the preparation of a manual which is now well along in the course of preparation for justices of the peace, a manual of instructions. I could get up and give these things in answer to a newspaper article but I do not feel called upon in every case to do so. I will say to the hon. member—

Mr. Singer: I would have hoped that the hon. Attorney General, seeing this type of criticism, whether he arose at the first possible moment—I think perhaps he should have—or somewhere during the course of these estimates, would have said, "Now, there has been criticism about justices of the peace, here is the true picture, here is what we are doing, here is how they are being selected, here is how they are being trained, here is what they are doing, here is how they are acting." I think the people of Ontario deserve this kind of an explanation.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Who is worrying about it besides you?

Mr. Singer: Well, it is very fascinating that the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management and some of his colleagues in the same bench have no concern at all about the proper administration of law in the province of Ontario. And I hope that is on the record, because I want to repeat what the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management just said, "Who is worrying about it besides you?"

I tell him that the people who are worrying about it are the people in the province of Ontario who are concerned with the proper administration of justice. Whether my friend, the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management is worried or not, is of no moment to me. I do believe that my friend, the hon. Attorney General is worried about it and I am glad that at least one man on the government benches is listening and is going to tell us some of the things he is doing to remedy it. Because as this story has gone on, whether you recognize it or not, the hon. Attorney General has indicated that some of the practices referred to here are not his practices and are practices he does not like.

Now, if the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management in his typical fashion says, "Who's worrying about it?"—if that is the view of the Cabinet, then I say it is a pity that the government of Ontario is charged with carrying people like you on their shoulders.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to return—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): It's people like you that we have to carry on our shoulders; you are freeloaders.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, there are criticisms about the availability for justices of the peace in granting bail and those have been referred to earlier.

I want now to turn to an incident which came before the court of appeal in a case in which judgment was given on September 28, 1964. The hon. Mr. Justice Roach—and the case was the case between Frank Worrall, who was the applicant to the Supreme Court of Canada for leave to appeal and A. Swan and P. Sawatzky, who were the respondents—

Mr. Justice Roach gives a dissenting opinion in that case, but I am going to quote one paragraph from Mr. Roach's judgment, which is not his opinion on the facts in issue, the granting of the appeal, but touches on the whole question of his opinion of the role of justices of the peace. He says:

With that information before him, the justice is required to exercise the judicial function of determining whether or not it discloses reasonable grounds for that belief. In performing that function, the justice stands between the informant and the person in occupation or control of the place in which the informant seeks to have a search conducted. In no sense is he identified with either of them.

I think up to that point we can all agree.

As a matter of convenience to the police he may have his office close to police headquarters but he is not a branch of the police department—and I think my friend, the hon. Attorney General, will agree that he is not and he should not be:

—and as such an aid in the discharge of police duties, under section 429, his duties are strictly judicial. In the evidence in the instant case, it appears that Mr. Swan had his office at the headquarters of the Ontario provincial police, that he had been an employee of the Ontario provincial police since 1929, but it does not appear in what capacity. In 1963 he was appointed a justice of the peace and is also registrar of firearms "under the Ontario provincial police," whatever that means.

When the solicitor for the appellant visited him at his office to examine the information he began to ask him some questions relative to his experience in issuing search warrants. To this, Mr. Swan did not object, as he would have been justified in doing. Instead, he left his office and returned in a few minutes with a sergeant of the force who, on hearing another question along the same line, advised Mr. Swan not to answer. All this, in my opinion, was entirely incompatible with the independence of a justice exercising his judicial function under section 429. A justice of the peace should never in any way be affiliated with the police.

Well, there it is. And I am sure that my hon. friend is not going to say that this is proper conduct. But why Mr. Swan is continuing to be a justice of the peace in the office of the Ontario provincial police, doing this sort of thing and taking his instructions from the sergeant of that force—and there is another one down there as well; I do not know when he was appointed; there is Arthur Shield, who is also a justice of the peace; he is the registrar of private investigators, apparently. Why these two gentlemen are allowed to continue to perform in this way I do not know, I think it is wrong, Mr. Justice Roach certainly thinks it is wrong, and I hope the hon. Attorney General thinks it is wrong and is prepared to do something about it.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring the discussion back, if I may, to the problem raised by the hon. member for Halton some time ago, the matter of probation services. I was rather disappointed that the hon. Attorney General had not commented on the case which was raised of the boys who were given a criminal record, in effect, because the probation services could not accept them because they had violated the criminal code. I wonder if the hon. Attorney General might take that under advisement, might give us some answers as to how this might be overcome, because I think this is a very serious aspect that should be faced up to. Perhaps if he would like to comment on that I could raise further questions after his comment.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would be glad to comment on that, Mr. Chairman, right now. I have been aware of the situation, of course, since it has been going on in recent months, and I was quite interested in the remarks which have been made about it. The fact of the situation is that our provincial statutes do allow a probation officer to enter the case before conviction and to deal with a person brought before the court—a young person—to make a report to the court and so on, but there is no such provision in the criminal code. When the offence is one under the criminal code there is no such right, there is no such law, there is no such permission and the short answer is that it would require a change in the provisions of the code in order that this be brought about.

Representations, I believe, have been made. I must confess I have not made them directly, but I believe representations have been made that there should be such a change in our law. Actually, I will have to say this: I appreciate the motives of the magistrate, but in doing what he is doing, saying he will not convict and will not put that mark on the young person's record, he is actually not carrying out his oath of office, where he says "I will enforce the law." I appreciate his motives and I agree, I think, that since we accept the principle and acknowledge the fact that in our provincial statutes such a procedure should obtain where a probation officer may come in, should come in, and assist the court, assist the young person and enable this to be done without a record of conviction being made, then I think if we accept that principle, it should certainly indicate our attitude that the criminal code should allow the same procedure. I would certainly be glad to follow the matter up. It has been brought very forcibly to my attention today.

Mr. Young: Thank you very much.

Mr. Kerr: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General says that the code supersedes The Probation Act, is that what he is saying? When the offence is under the code?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There is no provision under the code for a probation officer to come in and deal with a person, unless there has been a conviction before the court.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, following this matter up in regard to probation services, the more I have looked into the probation setup in Ontario—and I admit it has not been extensive to this point, the more I have been impressed with the quality of the service and with the quality of the probation officers—I have been a bit disappointed at the case load which many of those officers carry. Now, it is one thing to talk in terms of averages, but averages do not show the situation because in some areas the case load may be a proper case load and sometimes below what could be carried, and in other areas the case loads are very, very heavy, so when we talk in terms of averages, perhaps we do not talk in proper terms.

I was interested in the hon. Minister saying the other day that he was hoping to increase the staff, and as I remember the figures, he has 187 probation officers now, he is hoping to get eight more this year, which would bring it to 195. Can the hon. Minister inform us how many probation officers there are in the Toronto area, and in the Ottawa area?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: In the county of Carleton, Mr. Chairman, there are eight probation officers with two secretaries, or a total of ten on the probation staff of the county of Carleton; and for the county of York, there are 36 probation officers and 17 secretaries, a total of 53 on the probation staff.

Mr. Young: This brings the probation staff in the province to something more than the 240 mark.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The total of probation officers is 187, as the hon. member mentioned; secretarial staff is 103; the total is 290.

Mr. Young: Does the 187 include Toronto and Ottawa, or is this just the provincial staff?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is the provincial staff. This does not include 12 probation officers who are engaged by Metropolitan Toronto and are not included in our figures; they are in addition.

Mr. Young: And does not include Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It includes Ottawa. The figures I gave included the Ottawa figure, which was: the county of Carleton, eight probation officers and two secretaries.

Mr. Young: Mr. Minister, the problem as I see it here is that we have a jurisdiction in the province itself which is doing, I think, a fairly good job, although standards perhaps can still be raised. But in the Toronto and Ottawa areas we have separate probation systems and we saw very recently the problem there, where municipal politicians take a look at the budget and say that here is a place where the budget can be trimmed. It is the kind of area where this kind of trimming is very tempting to municipal politicians, because probation service perhaps does not bring as many votes as sewers or watermains or sidewalks and other things that people can see. These are visual, and these are services which are being demanded. The other is more in the realm of service and not as apparent.

I wonder, Mr. Minister if this province should not give very serious consideration, first of all, to bringing these staffs within the provincial jurisdiction and correlating them with the provincial staff—that is, have the provincial staff take over these two jurisdictions that are now outside the provincial staff. In both cases, I understand, the salaries are lower than they are provincially and the case loads are higher than they are provincially, though again, as I say, talking in averages is difficult in this field. I would hope that the hon. Minister is giving this very serious consideration. I hope this can be done and I hope that the kind of budget can be set up to bring the standard up in these areas and to remove the probation service in both Toronto and Ottawa from the dangerous situation in which we saw it placed in very recent days.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I wonder if I might just take a moment, Mr. Chairman, to deal with that now while it is raised? I would just like to tell the House through you, Mr. Chairman, that discussions on this very subject have gone forward for some months, particularly with Metro Toronto, and I should say we feel that is the area with which we perhaps might move first. It is the largest problem, it is closest to hand, and it is most severe there, for the very reasons which the hon. member has mentioned and for others which we see. I can only say that the discussions have been full and complete. We have an objective, such as the hon. member has outlined, of taking the situation over as a provincial matter. Whether this can come about soon or not, I cannot say at this moment. It is a matter that is in the exploratory stage and very seriously considered.

I think in fairness to Metro, we should point out that perhaps at our request, all of the probation staff has had increases in the salary ranges in this year's budget. Metro did that much.

Mr. Young: Just one further question, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister. The hon. Minister mentioned that it is difficult to get properly qualified people and so he is planning on an addition of about eight people to the staff this year. I understand that people in this field are anxious to see a much greater increase in that number—more than twice that. I wonder if the hon. Minister would tell this House whether, if people are found and if people are available, the moneys can be made available in the budget to increase the staff to bring the case load within reasonable proportions?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, this is a subject in which I personally have a great interest. It is one of the phases of my department in which I find much interest, and some of the notes I had made for the debate with respect to these estimates on the matter of probation and probation services indicate that this service was started only in 1951. It was planned then and considered in 1952. In 1952 the service included 17 probation officers with a budget then of $74,505. In March of this year, we had a total of 187 provincial probation officers, with 103 secretaries and a budget of $1,589,000. Perhaps one does not measure everything in dollars, but the increase in numbers there from 17 to 187 in that period, indicates that this is not a neglected branch of the department. In 1964 we established a minimum educational qualification at the level of a BA degree for a probation officer, so the hon. member will understand that while it is a good qualification, it is a restrictive one. The field of applicants, to that extent, or to some extent by reason of that, is limited.

I think I outlined in my opening remarks to the debate on these estimates, the training that is done in the field and in courses, and how that is fitted together with supervisory training. To answer the question now as to whether it is possible to secure more officers if we were asking for them, I think perhaps if the effort were made and the money put forth, and I would ask for extra funds, I could perhaps say, yes, I could probably get some more. We have asked for eight this year. We think, after an assessment of the work and the case load, that this is reasonable, fair and proper, that this is a reasonable increase having in mind the task which confronts us.

Mr. Young: Thank you very much.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a series of question on a matter that I have raised for six years in this Legislature in the hope of getting some improvement. With all due respect to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management, who does not apparently believe in improvement—he would leave Indians living in wigwams and that sort of thing—with all respect to him I should like to ask the hon. Attorney General—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: What vote are we on?

Mr. Sopha: I should like to ask the Attorney General, where in this vote is the item for for salaries for supreme court reporters?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is here somewhere if I can find it.

Mr. Sopha: Is it in the second last one—Supreme Court of Ontario, $762,500—second last item on page 19?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I was looking for a little more detail for the answer to the question. The item is in the section headed "Supreme Court of Ontario," page 19; that is where it will be found. I have detail as to what those salaries are.

Mr. Sopha: What is the answer?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: For the supreme court reporter class 1, the range is $6,300 to $7,500; that was fixed as of November 1, 1964. Supreme court reporter class 2 is $6,600 to $7,800, as of September 1, 1964. The chief supreme court reporter has a salary range of $7,500 to $9,000; that was made effective November 1, 1964.

Mr. Sopha: That is Mr. Luett.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. I would just like to add that these salary ranges are still under review at the present time with a view to an increase.

Mr. Sopha: That is fine. Would you tell me what the cost of a page of transcript of evidence is in a civil case in the supreme court, and what the cost per page is in a criminal case, or are they both the same?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can get it.

Mr. Sopha: I will take a guess, but I think it is somewhere around 85 cents a page. You are going to find out?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is 80 cents a page, I am certain in the criminal—

An hon. member: Why ask if you know?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not sure whether it is exactly the same in the civil. Is it 80 cents a page?

Mr. Sopha: That is fine; 80 cents a page in a criminal case. Then there is a law for the rich and a law for the poor. Let me tell the House that when the very rich people with lots of money come before the courts, they can get what is called daily copy. When the really first-class, high-grade, diamond-clip type of criminal comes before the courts, he can get what is called "daily copy." They will put a whole fleet of reporters into the courts and change them at 20-minute intervals and the copy of the evidence of that day will be ready at night for the counsel defending. Those are usually long trials.

I think the Smith brothers who own the hotel downtown had daily copy, and I believe there was daily copy in the Farris case. But as long as six years ago I complained here about the burden on the impoverished individual, the fellow of limited means in picking up a tab—my language is not very good today; it is very loose and I am using jargon—picking up the bill of $700 or $800 before he goes to the court of appeal. Imagine the oppressiveness of that burden—scraping together that money to get a review of his case in the appellate courts.

Let it be said, in all fairness to make the record complete, that where the individual has no money at all—a legal aid case—the Attorney General's department will pick up the check.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I was just about to say that when you said that.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, it will, upon the asking; it will do that. But take the individual of very moderate means who is able to retain his counsel, if he feels he does not get a fair shake in the first court and wants to go to the court of appeal. The first trial may have lasted four or five days, and with the five copies that he must deposit in court, the bill comes sometimes to $700, $800 or $1,000.

I have suggested this in the past, that equity and justice and fairness would demand that the Attorney General's department pay the court reporters sufficient in order to reduce the cost of pages per transcript, to bring it within reason, so that an equitable burden falls upon the high-class, well-heeled criminal—or, I should say, person accused of crime—and the individual in the lower income group. I will bet a quarter—I will not go further than that, but I will bet a quarter—that some of those court reporters who run into a series of appeals during the year, and especially in lengthy cases, make more money than the hon. Attorney General makes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That would not be hard to do.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, well, I bet they do, that they make more than the boss himself, when they pick up $700 or $800.

I know of a case where there was a mistrial. The individual, who was represented by counsel, had no money. The mistrial was caused through the neglect of the opposing side, and naturally after the mistrial the evidence had to be ordered for the new trial. The bill for the evidence came to something like $450.

A long time ago I suggested that this price per page of 80 cents could be slashed quite a bit. After all, I can report to the House as the hon. Attorney General well knows, that at 80 cents there is not a great deal on the page. Maybe that is a good thing, that the pages really do not contain many words and the reporters double space them in addition. Perhaps that is a good thing from the point of view of the presentation of the argument when the case goes into an appellate court. I just hesitate to think of what happens to the individual of limited means who wants to go to the Supreme Court of Canada, because he is faced then with a tremendous cost to get the evidence printed in the form of the factum in which it must be printed by a printing press—one like my friend, the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Boyer) runs.

But let us leave that aside and deal only with the appellate court within our own jurisdiction. I would ask the hon. Attorney General what is the cost per page in the district courts for evidence?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would have to get that from a member of my staff.

Mr. Sopha: I think that runs about 60 cents.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I did discover that it is 80 cents, as I told you, in both courts, civil and criminal.

Mr. Sopha: Because it is a junior court, I suppose, in the hierarchy of courts, the price goes down a little bit. I would not be surprised to hear in the division court that you go down to about 40 cents a page maybe. Then I must not leave out the prohibitive cost per page of examinations for discovery, which is a step along in the prosecution of a law suit, and which the litigant has to pick up. It is fair to say that throughout this province a good many lawsuits, perhaps the majority of lawsuits, are financed by lawyers who are prosecuting them. Let me hastily add that the lawyers do not accept the case on a contingency basis. But I venture to say, and my experience tells me, that the plaintiff who has a good case, on first looking at the case—a motor vehicle accident, let us say—if he is not able to put up any money for the prosecution of his lawsuit the lawyer puts up the disbursements and it is the lawyer who has to put out these disbursements, including the cost of paying court reporters for the examinations for discovery.

But in my own view, the whole thing has gone to ridiculous limits—this business of $700 or $800 or $1,000 to get into the court of appeal before you can get the evidence, and you do not get into the court of appeal until you pay for the evidence—it is cash on the barrel. When the evidence is ready you have to take a cheque down to the registrar of the supreme court at Osgoode Hall and deposit that cheque with him. He will give you the five copies of evidence to take over to the court of appeal office. As long as that exists there are going to be a lot of people in this province denied the review of their cases, which they might otherwise get, for lack of funds.

We have had quite a few of the white-collar criminal, the high-class one, in recent years in the province, and the tone of my voice will indicate that I do not have much sympathy for them. Indeed I do not; I do not like the high-class criminal; I prefer the safe-buster to the individual who, through his own intelligence, agility and manipulations, swindles widows and orphans in the stock market, like that bunch in the Brilund Mines case. That is the type I do not like. But you see how fast they get into the appellate courts and get to the Supreme Court of Canada. By the time they end up they have the first trial judge, and they have five in the court of appeal—that makes six—and then they get to the Supreme Court of Canada and they get a bench of five or seven there. They either have 11 or 13 judges who have reviewed their case, so they have the full treatment. Somewhere along the line, they might convince the majority of those judges that somebody was wrong below them and they might get off.

The fellow from New York, in the same case that I have referred to, convinced the Supreme Court of Canada and he got off.

But I am worried about the other individual who may not have got justice in the trial court and he does not have the money in the pocket to pay this tremendous expense to get into the appellate courts. I would like to see you take this step—put the court reporters on salary, completely on salary. Pay them; pay for the administration of justice and reduce—I do not say give the evidence for nothing—but reduce the cost per page of the transcript to a very nominal amount, say, ten cents a page or 15 cents a page.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee rise and report a certain resolution.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to a certain resolution and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I believe it has already been announced that tomorrow there will be second readings, including the milk bill, and thereafter we will proceed with estimates of The Department of the Attorney General. There will be a night sitting, of course, tomorrow night.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MAY 13, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the east gallery, students from Sturgeon Falls high school.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE MOTOR VEHICLE FUEL TAX ACT, 1965

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves first reading of bill intituled, The Motor Vehicle Fuel Tax Act, 1965.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, the new Motor Vehicle Fuel Tax Act provides for a change in the way in which the 20.5 cent tax on fuel oil used in diesel-powered vehicles is collected. At present, over 1,400 persons are registered under the Act and remit the tax to the department.

By changing to a method similar to that used for gasoline tax, the number can be reduced to below 50, with a resultant improvement in administration.

As several types of fuel oil can be used in diesel motors, this Act would provide that any such oil on which tax has not been collected will be identified by a coloured marker. This will not interfere with the normal use of such fuel oils. Two western provinces as well as the government of Great Britain, have had favourable experience by using this method. New Brunswick has recently passed comparable legislation and I understand that Quebec and another eastern province are contemplating similar action.

The Act would come into effect upon proclamation and the former Act would be repealed.

TAX ON THE CONSUMERS OF TOBACCO

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to impose a tax on the consumers of tobacco.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, The Tobacco Tax Act provides the administrative machinery for the collection and administration of the tobacco tax for the province of Ontario.

The tax imposed by The Tobacco Tax Act will be paid by every consumer of tobacco products, as has been done under The Retail Sales Tax Act. However, the method of remitting the tax to the Treasurer of Ontario will be changed.

In the past, retail vendors have remitted the tax directly to the Treasurer. However, with the introduction of this new Act, tax will be remitted through a series of collectors, as is currently in use under The Gasoline Tax Act.

The tax imposed on the various tobacco products will be virtually the same to the consumer, although the method of calculating the tax has been amended. Generally, the administrative provisions of the Act are in line with other taxing statutes of this province. The tax will come into force on the date to be proclaimed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

The provision for the exemption of tobacco products under The Retail Sales Tax Act will also be proclaimed on the same date, so that immediately the tobacco products will cease to be taxed under The Retail Sales Tax Act, they will be taxed under The Tobacco Act.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett).

In view of the release this morning stating that traffic accidents and deaths in Ontario have increased 56 per cent, I would like to ask the hon. Minister what immediate steps he is taking in the public interest.

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question concerning accidents in the first quarter of 1965, I must first correct the information in the question about an increase of 56 per cent in the traffic deaths and accidents. This figure is not correct; there was an increase of 23.8 per cent in accidents during the quarter compared to the corresponding period last year, and there was an increase of 4.2 per cent, that is 11 persons, in the total number fatally injured in accidents. The figure of 56.5 per cent refers to the increase in the number of pedestrians killed.

At the same time, I would point out that there were decreases in the number of drivers killed and the number of passengers killed. I mention these points in the interest of accuracy.

I would emphasize my profound regret that these accidents took place and that these deaths occurred. Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, that one of the purposes of compiling accident statistics by my department is to maintain public awareness of the accident problem, and to remind drivers and pedestrians alike of the need for constant caution and common sense.

The steps that are being taken by The Department of Transport to combat the accident problem are continuing steps. The figures that have just been released serve as a reminder of the magnitude of the accident problem, but they do not signify any appreciable change in the problem itself. Instead, they confirm the fact that accidents pose a major challenge in our modern and mobile society, and they confirm the need for concerted and individual concern for traffic safety.

The government of Ontario demonstrated its acceptance of responsibility in this concern by the creation of The Department of Transport in 1957. Paramount in the responsibilities of this department are traffic safety and safety education. We attack the challenge in a variety of ways, as outlined to the House on previous occasions. We certainly have not solved the problem; no jurisdiction anywhere has solved the problem, but we believe that with our comprehensive safety programme, good progress has been made and will continue to be made.

Since this department was created, the number of motor vehicles registered in Ontario has increased sharply; the number of accidents has also increased. There is no way of producing statistics to show how many lives have been saved by such activities as the demerit point system, vehicle inspection and the education of school children and senior citizens in matters of safety.

It is of interest to note, however, that in spite of the greater density of traffic in recent years, the rate of accidents per miles travelled has not gone up. In fact, the rates—and they represent the risk of accidents—have gone down in some cases.

The hon. member's question asked specifically about immediate steps. As I have indicated, this department would be remiss if it waited for a statistical summary before it decided to take appropriate steps. It is coincidence that one of the steps decided on some time ago will go into effect next Monday. I refer to the co-operation of The Department of Transport with the Ontario provincial police in an intensified programme of compulsory spot-checks for vehicle safety. The department is providing mobile vehicle check units and staff for our 38-point inspection of vehicles stopped by the Ontario provincial police at predetermined locations.

Another example relating to the statistics just released is driver instruction in high schools. The statistics show that, as usual, the number of relatively young drivers in accidents was higher than their proportion to the total number of drivers. The Department of Transport recommends driver instruction in high schools as a means of increasing safety among young drivers. This continuing campaign will produce an increase of 50 per cent this autumn in the number of schools offering these courses.

Another example involves pedestrians. The statistics show that a disproportionate number of very young and very old pedestrians are accident victims. The department has recognized this fact and is continuing its intensive campaign to make these age groups constantly aware of the need for vigilance and good sense in traffic.

An analysis of the statistics for the first quarter of 1965 shows clearly that they do not represent a new situation. Rather, they report on a continuation of this vital problem, with some special factors that made the figures higher than usual. The special factors were the bad weather conditions and road conditions during the months of January, February and March of this year. The number of accidents that occurred on snowy or icy surfaces nearly doubled, compared to the same period last year, to a total of just under 16,000. The greater prevalence of bad road conditions was the major factor in the increase in accidents. This is consistent with the fact that there were many more accidents of what might be regarded as a minor nature, while there was a lesser increase in the number of fatalities.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. Minister accept a supplementary question pertinent to this?

Mr. Speaker, during the past month three young lives were snuffed out in Owen Sound because—

Mr. Speaker: The member has to ask a question.

Mr. Sargent: Would the hon. Minister agree that the law whereby a policeman must stop a speeding car to give a ticket is right, because three young lives in Owen Sound were snuffed out this past month—

Mr. Speaker: Question!

Mr. Sargent: Would the hon. Minister agree that the law is right where a policeman must catch the car to give the driver a ticket?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Speaker, this is hardly germane to the first question, but I will take it under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE ONTARIO WATER RESOURCES COMMISSION ACT

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy Resources) moves second reading of bill No. 128, An Act to amend The Ontario Water Resources Commission Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE MILK ACT, 1965

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves second reading of bill No. 135, The Milk Act, 1965.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss the principle of this bill on second reading, perhaps the most obvious comment is that it is so broad, so flexible and leaves so much room for my hon. friend to manoeuvre that the spirit of the bill cannot be accurately determined because of its broadness and flexibility.

The precise machinery is not included because, presumably, this will be included in the regulations, a copy of which we have not had.

This bill can be used to implement gradual and far-reaching reform in the dairy industry or, on the other hand, it can be used by the government as a vehicle to maintain the status quo, or close to it, in the dairy industry.

Frankly, in reading the bill, I did not get the impression that the hon. Minister had accepted the challenge of the mess in the dairy industry.

The ultimate authority for taking either course rests with the Minister of Agriculture. Barring this, my hon. friend could adopt a course of action somewhere between the two extremes. This gives you an idea of the vague generalities with which we in the Opposition are faced; this is the quandary in which I find myself. Under those circumstances it becomes somewhat difficult to intelligently discuss a bill of this nature. Having said that, I hope, and presume, that my hon. friend will use this bill to bring about gradual reform in the dairy industry. I say gradual because, in my opinion, an industry as important to the economy as the dairy industry, if it were placed in the position of being reformed in a rapid and sweeping fashion, could be thrown into economic convulsions.

In the proposals put forward in the Hennessey report, it was stressed that this should be done on a gradual basis. I believe it is suggested in the report that any reform emanating from the report should be based on a three, four- or even five-year period. In any case, the change was to be a gradual one. However, I must warn my hon. friend that the need for caution should not be an excuse for what might be termed inaction.

The dairy industry, needless to say, has been in a state of frustration and chaos for a number of years—a condition responsible for bringing about the Hennessey report. An attempt has previously been made to get the four dairy groups together in order to set up a province-wide single authority for the handling of all milk in the province. Of course, we know the history of that; it failed because none of the groups was willing to sacrifice individual identity or the benefits peculiar to themselves. Those who had fluid milk contracts did not want to give them up, and so on. No one would yield a portion of his price to a lower category in the long-range interest of the dairy industry. So the milk inquiry committee was set up, and out of that came the Hennessey report. As promised, legislation has followed.

As I understand it, this bill will replace the concentrated milk producers' marketing board and the whole milk league. The cream producers' marketing board and the cheese producers' marketing board will remain operational. A new body, the milk commission of Ontario, will be established, responsible to the Minister. This commission will be headed, as I understand it, by a civil servant appointed by the government.

The commission will have sweeping powers to investigate and control the production, quality and pricing of milk, processing, distributing, transporting and so on. In other words, a wide and general power is given to the milk commission under this Act.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): Is not that good?

Mr. Gaunt: Frankly, I do not see much wrong with it.

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): Do not get excited.

Mr. Gaunt: Presumably this will mean an end to the milk formula, which has been in existence for some time. It will be thrown out and the work it has done over the years will be taken up by the milk commission. There will be field men to enforce such regulations, as I have mentioned, as might apply in the various areas—producing, processing, distributing, and so on.

In addition to the milk commission, this bill also provides for the setting up of a milk marketing board. The commission may or may not delegate some of its authority to that board. The marketing board will be responsible, as I understand it, for collecting all moneys for the sale of milk; it will deduct a licence fee and will pay the balance to the producer. In other words, it handles all money. It will also be responsible, I gather, for price information and the dissemination of such throughout the industry.

The question that arises here is whether the licence fee will cover the entire operating cost of the marketing board, or will the government subsidize part of the operation of the board?

One of the main areas of conflict has been the fact that any milk producer without a quota who produces grade-A milk could not produce for the bottle trade and was, therefore, deprived of a higher price. The Hennessey report took this into consideration and made provision for it. However, there is nothing in this bill that allows for a concentrated high-quality milk producer to get a quota. Is it presumed that the same quota system as is presently in operation will continue? If so, how will any additional fluid milk requirements be met? Will the quota shippers be given the opportunity to meet the increased demand from within their own ranks, or will other producers who do not have quotas be taken in to meet the demand?

Is the government going to open up the quota field, or is it not? I contend that in reading the bill, without seeing the regulations, it is not. If this is so, I think it falls far short of what we should have been presented with.

Another area in which I am interested is the position of the Guernsey and Jersey breeder under such a plan. As my hon. friend knows, the high-test breeders were experiencing considerable difficulty a few years ago in selling high-test milk. As a result of advertising which purported to connect heart disease with cholesterol in milk and milk products, there was difficulty in selling the high-test milk. This eventually reflected on the sale of cattle so far as the high-test breeds were concerned. Then, on their own initiative and without government help, the breeders evolved a self-help programme which resulted in the selling of A-J milk, and what has commonly been known as two per cent milk. Both breeds subsequently experienced vastly improved sales and both are riding on the crest of their own success.

May I emphasize again that this was done on their own initiative and without government help? In other words, this was a self-help programme.

The bill is so all-embracing that provision could be made for these people. As a matter of fact, it would be my interpretation that it would even go so far as to allow a pool to be set up exclusively for these breeds. Perhaps I am wrong in this, but I would like to ask my hon. friend if he considers giving the Guernsey and Jersey breeds special treatment or, on the other hand, does he consider milk to be milk and to be put together, regardless of its origin?

One thing which I am pleased to see incorporated in the Act is the fact that the operations of vertical integrators will have to comply with the regulations in each phase of their operation. I think this is good. To my mind, this will have the effect of thwarting vertical integrators from getting into the field.

Mr. Speaker, my party will support this bill in principle, because at least it is a start towards bringing some semblance of order out of a chaotic situation, even though the bill is inadequate in a number of areas.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): There are a lot of paternalistic remarks around here this afternoon. I hope we will have more of them a little later.

Mr. Letherby: The hon. member should be careful what he says.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I shall not repeat much of what the hon. member for Huron-Bruce has just stated, because most, if not all, of what he has said I would go along with, particularly in his references to the difficulties we in the Opposition face at the moment in assessing the importance of this Act. Until we know what personnel are going to be operating the Act at the milk commission level, and until we know the regulations, it is pretty impossible for us to decide even the real direction the government is going to take, let alone the vigour with which they intend to move in that direction.

An hon. member: Forward!

Mr. MacDonald: Sometimes it is one step forward and two steps back while people are not watching. Mr. Speaker, I was interested in reviewing what the hon. Minister had stated in his introductory statement on first reading of the bill. He commented, rather briefly, that there is no doubt that the Hennessey report strongly indicates that "changes are needed in milk marketing in Ontario in order to avoid serious deterioration in the industry, and to enable it to strengthen its continuous position of importance in the provincial and Canadian economy."

I want to go back for a moment to quote briefly from certain sections of the Hennessey report. It seems to me that the point we must realize in this House—perhaps for us who are not normally on the farm today, with this preponderantly urban community that the province of Ontario is becoming—is the proportion of the crisis faced by this important milk industry. Certainly any casual review of the events in the past 15 years will show that we are going from one impasse to another. The hon. Minister has indicated the efforts within the industry to establish a marketing scheme two or three years ago, efforts which I think were so directed from this government behind the scenes so that they share a major responsibility for the situation that blew up. The hon. Minister, I notice, washes his hands of all that.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): That is not true.

Mr. MacDonald: I am aware of the uncanny ability of this government to achieve its purposes—I borrow the appropriate phraseology to my right here—by devious routes, through the farm organizations. If it succeeds, they take the credit. If it blows up, it was the farmers who made another mess of things. However, in this instance we finally had to face up to it in the establishment of the Hennessey commission. I think it is interesting to review a few quotes to show how serious the Hennessey commission views the present situation. For example, from page seven, we have this quotation:

The major theme for the past 15 years has been the unsuccessful efforts of the producers' organization to come to the recognition of mutual interests and of the folly of now partisan behaviour. There is conclusive evidence that sensible compromise and constructive joint action will not be attained on a voluntary basis.

After having chastized the government for its share of responsibility, I would underline the importance of this conclusion of the Hennessey report. For a variety of reasons, the milk industry has reached a virtual deadlock. The four constituent elements within it, because of vested interests and, in some instances, of personalities and factors that perhaps we do not need to bother to review, had reached the point where they were virtually incapable of solving their own problems. Hennessey underlined this in the very early pages of his report.

Starting on page 32, there are a number of quotations that set the whole tone. He said:

The milk industry in Ontario has not solved its major problems, nor has it been able to cope with many changing conditions.

On page 33:

Milk producers have come to the general conclusion that present marketing arrangements are inappropriate in the circumstances.

On page 34:

Generally speaking, producers established in the market have been able to grow with it and other producers have been unable to gain entry. In general terms, during recent years milk producers without a quota had little hope of getting into the fluid milk market, no matter how fine the quality of their products and no matter how willing they might be to invest money in necessary facilities. Non-fluid milk producers resent what they consider to be the privileged position of quota holders and protest even more vigorously the closed-shop position of fluid milk shippers.

On page 35:

There is no doubt that most milk producers of this province who do not share in the fluid milk market believe that they are receiving an inequitable share of the proceeds derived from the sale of milk in this province.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker. I do not propose to, but that brief selection of quotations underlines the Hennessey conclusion, which I do not think anyone can for one moment ignore, that there is a very, very serious situation.

Indeed, I thought one of the most ironic comments in the whole report was a quotation from the Ontario Royal commission on milk back in 1947, headed by Mr. Justice Wells. How uncannily prophetic it was, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to note as I read these two paragraphs. This is from the 1947 Royal commission report:

One cannot examine the producers' general position without coming to the conclusion that the eventual solution of the difficulties facing the whole milk producers and probably all milk producers in the province lies in the setting up of a marketing organization that will control the disposal of all milk produced by fluid milk producers for the fluid market and, ideally, of all milk produced in the province.

From the evidence that I have heard, this seems to be an inescapable conclusion. Nevertheless, equally from the evidence, I can only say at the present time that I question very much whether the farmers in Ontario in general, or the whole milk producers in particular, are ready for such a drastic move. However, in my opinion, it is the ultimate and only effective solution of their marketing difficulties.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture nods his head. I assume that he, in effect, is agreeing with me that here in 1947 was a profoundly prophetic analysis of the difficulties that were going to lie ahead and the difficulties that ultimately had to be faced by this government through the study of the Hennessey commission. My chief concern, going along with many of the questions that the hon. member for Huron-Bruce has asked, is this: Is the government really going to come to grips with the situation when, in fact, we saw the problem just as clearly almost 20 years ago? Is it going to come to grips with it at this present stage?

Now, if one examines the recommendations of the Hennessey report and then examines this bill, the snap judgment one would be forced to come to is that the government is not coming to grips with the issue. The government has chosen the easy way out. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will add immediately—and hope by adding this immediately, that I will retain the ear, at least of the hon. Minister, if not the ears of those who are interjecting to my left here—that in choosing the easy way out, it is conceivable that it is the right way out. It is conceivable; depending on a number of factors.

For example—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, it depends on a number of factors. One of the factors is that at the present time the milk industry is enjoying a relatively buoyant period and therefore it may be possible, under these relatively buoyant conditions to move slowly toward the objective, if the objective is clearly accepted and if the direction of moving toward it is clearly established. I will explain that a bit more in a moment when I get down to another analysis of the situation.

If, for example, the government does accept, beyond any shadow of doubt, an objective that there is going to be an equal price for quality products, and moves as quickly as circumstances will permit to the achievement of that objective, then I say it is conceivable that in taking the easy way out at the moment; in not grasping the nettle in the somewhat more revolutionary fashion that Professor Hennessey has suggested, that it may be the right way, because I would concede that the quieter one's revolutions are, perhaps the more effective they are.

The second thing, however, that is going to affect what may happen, is the personnel and the regulations. And, if I may interject here, Mr. Speaker, and register a bit of a protest—the hon. Minister came in and gave his original explanation of this bill on first reading, which was relatively brief. He then went out to a press conference and I have read many very interesting, intriguing, revealing comments that he made at the press conference, which he did not make in the House. One of them, for example, was that a top civil servant is going to be heading this commission. I would think that this was not an obscure bit of information that might be extracted by a newspaper man at a press conference; I think it would be the kind of information that the House was entitled to get right from the very outset to assist us in trying to come to a conclusion as to exactly what the government was going to do through this bill.

However, let me go on now, Mr. Speaker, to specify three areas in which I think the principle of this bill can be subjected to some criticism. The first one is that the hon. Minister and his advisers have decided to depart pretty completely from one of the underlying recommendations of the Hennessey report; namely, that the milk commission and the milk pool that will be established, or the milk marketing board that will be established, will be to the greatest extent possible, independent of this government.

Indeed, Professor Hennessey even went to the point of suggesting that their offices should be away from Queen's Park and away from The Department of Agriculture to emphasize their independent position. I assume that he was anticipating the establishment of, or he was seeking to have established, an independent commission along the lines of, for example, Hydro, or the water commission, whose policies will be laid down by this government and by this Legislature, but whose day-to-day operation is going to be to the greatest extent possible within the jurisdiction of those who are appointed to do the job and the producers who come into the picture later, as we gradually get the whole machinery set up.

I think it is impossible, Mr. Speaker, to read this Act, without coming to the conclusion that just as this government has moved consistently in farm marketing, they are moving away from any genuine producer-controlled marketing to government-controlled marketing and I personally find this regrettable.

I am not going to spend a great deal of time threshing old straw. This is a fundamental difference—I have almost come to the conclusion that it is a philosophic difference—between that of the government and my concept of marketing. It seems to me that collective bargaining rights, whether they are given to farmers, whether they are given to trade unionists, or whether they are given to professional groups, are rights that are delegated from this Legislature. They are rights that are given to grown men and women of sane minds and over 21. Once you give them rights, you should say, "Go and exercise those rights." If experience indicates that they are abusing them, that they have too much power, or if experience indicates that they have not adequate power, then it is our right and our responsibility to review that experience and to change the law so that we add to or subtract from those powers. But you should not have a situation in which the government is in effect meddling day after day in the operation of farm marketing. Let the farmers do it themselves. And this, I suggest, would result in something approaching producer-controlled marketing.

I have made this analogy before and I will make it again here. The government, for example, concedes to workers the right to organize a union. I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Agriculture that if he sought to meddle in the day-to-day operations, or rather, if the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) sought to meddle in the day-to-day operation of trade unionists who have been given this collective bargaining right, to the extent to which the hon. Minister of Agriculture interferes in the day-to-day operations of farm marketing, he would be in serious trouble. We would have something more than a quiet revolution on our hands. And quite rightly so.

But the philosophy of this government in amendments to The Farm Products Marketing Act about four or five years ago is that local marketing boards even have to come to Queen's Park, to "Big Daddy," to get approval of how much money they are going to raise, and how much of their own money they are going to spend. I object to this, and I object to its emergence in this legislation, in terms of what is going to be—if I interpret it correctly—a milk marketing commission dominated and controlled by government to a greater extent than is desirable and necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I move to my second basic criticism, and it is a repeat of a question I asked earlier. How firm is the objective of the government in moving toward an equal price for quality products? Because this is the whole nub of the issue. In all of the complexities, in all of the difficulties in the milk industry, I would say the key issue is between the fluid and the concentrated milk producers—along with a few among the cheese producers, and a few among the cream producers—who are producing grade "A" quality milk. Why, if they are producing an "A" quality product, should they not be able to get a top price like those who happen to be on the quota and have the privileges of the fluid milk market which they have enjoyed now for a generation or more? This is the nub of the issue.

And what assurance, what guarantee, is there in this bill that we are going to move toward coping with that problem? This question was asked by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce. For example, are we going to start with the present quotas? Does the government accept the present quotas? Will it move beyond them? It seems to me that these are questions which, if we do not get them answered today—and perhaps it is not most appropriate they be answered in discussing the principle of a bill—we certainly will try to get answered before the standing committee next Tuesday, or when the bill comes back to the committee of the whole House.

I was interested, for example, in reading a letter that was sent to all members of the Legislature, from the Ontario whole milk league. Two paragraphs in it, I think, are pretty significant. This is the group whose favoured position has been envied, and threatened, and yet they state:

We are convinced that only one producer organization should be empowered to negotiate prices of raw milk in Ontario. Only in this way can we avoid having one group of producers pitted against another and we believe that producers have every right to speak with one voice in the market place.

They also say, in the next page, after having expressed fears for the stability of their market and their price level being wrecked by an unduly hasty introduction of 5,000—that is the figure that is now used—new shippers in the fluid milk field:

On the other hand, any move to delay decisive action or to have a plan put into effect that would simply protect the present fluid producers—their own people:

—including those in the highly preferred positions, would cause serious opposition by grade “A” producers not now in the fluid trade. These men must be given a share of that trade as quickly as possible, but they must also be given that share in an orderly and a gradual way.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very statesman-like announcement that was sent to the Legislature. They have said they want the change orderly, they want it gradual, they do not want to wreck the position that the fluid producers—sometimes they have been described as the aristocrats of the industry, though I think they tend to react unfavourably to that title—they do not want to tear that position down while attempting to lift the rest of the industry up—particularly those who are producing grade “A” milk.

But, on the other hand, let us not miss their point: “Any move to delay decisive action or to put into effect a plan that simply protects the present fluid producers, including those in the highly preferred position, would cause serious opposition by grade ‘A’ producers not now in the fluid trade.” That is the nub of the whole thing. And that is the reason why we are entitled to ask and to get greater assurances from the hon. Minister that we are going to move in that direction.

What are the difficulties in moving in that direction? This is the reason why—I will be frank with the hon. Minister—I have come to the conclusion that perhaps the easy way out in the relatively buoyant position of the milk industry at the present time, may be the best way out; because, as I examine the situation, I find it to be this, Mr. Speaker: There are approximately 10,000 fluid shippers at the present time in the province of Ontario. I am informed that, over the years, the number of drop-outs during the year, the mortality rate among fluid shippers, has been approximately 350. Indeed it has been suggested to me that the figure is really higher than that now, that this happens to be an average over a number of years; it may now be closer to 500.

I am also informed, Mr. Speaker—and this point really intrigues me—that perhaps as high as ten per cent of those who are now fluid milk shippers, if the inspection and the regulations for the production of “A” grade milk were really enforced, would be out of the picture as fluid shippers. Now maybe the ten per cent is high, but I heard the observation made—that if there was stricter enforcement some would be out of the picture—from more sources than I can reveal in this House here; and they certainly represent knowledgeable voices from within the industry and, indeed, from within the government. It raises the very interesting question of: How have we been enforcing the regulations up until now if there are some farmers shipping who really are not entitled to have the right to market “A” grade milk? But, if there are some, then that opens the door to the possibility of bringing in those who really qualify with “A” grade milk.

There are 15,000 to 17,000 concentrated shippers. Therefore, this figure of 5,000 potential dairy farmers, potential in terms of interest in getting into the bottle trade, is roughly one-third of the concentrated producers. How many of them want to transfer immediately? The whole milk league says that if 5,000 come in immediately it is going to wreck the position of the trade, but how many could come in immediately?

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been told, for example, that of these 5,000 only 1,800 have bulk tanks. I would immediately concede that the bulk tank is not, by any means, the only criterion, but it is one of them in face of the mechanization required by a grade "A" producer. So then we have only 1,800 who are in a position to qualify, and perhaps only a proportion of those could qualify immediately, if the government is willing to open the door. So consider the situation: with, say, 500 dropping out every year, with some being knocked out because they really do not qualify at the present time—then there may be an opportunity to move pretty quickly in terms of permitting those who want to, and who can qualify, to come into the fluid field.

I think there is another interesting factor here, Mr. Speaker, and I have had this confirmed by people who are active as leaders in the industry. A sizeable proportion of the people who are concentrated producers have been denied the right to get into the fluid field; and anybody who is denied something wants it all the more. Once the government says to them, "Fine, the door is open, you can come in," it may discover that a smaller proportion of those who appear to want it beforehand are really anxious to come in. Or, to put it in more important terms, Mr. Speaker, are ready or willing or able to spend the $5,000 or $10,000 or $15,000 that would be required to bring their facilities up to a standard to be able to qualify.

In other words, I have come to the conclusion, as I analyze this in depth—in terms of milk producers who might want to come in—that it would be possible, very early and very quickly, to permit those who qualify to move over into the fluid field.

There is another factor I would like, by way of a question, to raise with the hon. Minister. Out in British Columbia, in the Fraser Valley, something of the kind of experience we are now going to have to cope with, in a blended price within a pool, has been had by the farmers for some years. And it is my understanding that the pool in the Fraser Valley has secured, from the federal government as part of their subsidy programme, a contribution for a proportion of the milk that went into the pool and was not used for fluid milk bottle purposes, but went into manufactured milk.

The figures I have been able to get are that, roughly speaking, most people in the whole milk league today, on an average, are getting the top price for about 70 per cent of their production. About 30 per cent of it is surplus and presumably they were getting as low as the $2.60 or the $2.65, the price that has obtained for the last number of years and is now going to be raised to $3.50 through the subsidy programme that the hon. Mr. Hays has introduced at Ottawa, so that you get a blended price that ranges at about the $4 figure.

If the government is going to move, and I submit it should move, to open the door to grade "A" producers to come into this pool—and I wonder why the government seems to be leaning over backwards not to describe it as a pool, it does not appear in the hon. Minister's statement or in the bill anywhere—why cannot they approach Ottawa immediately for a contribution to that manufactured milk which is going to be shipped by fluid producers—members of the milk league now, or others who were in the concentrated field and who are going to be brought in? If these shippers remained in the concentrated field they would be entitled to this subsidy from Ottawa. It seems to me that the subsidy programme should be administered a bit more flexibly at the Ottawa level—not as a pioneering effort, because it is merely duplicating in Ontario what has already been done in the Fraser Valley of British Columbia. This would assist us in a quicker transition to bring together all grade "A" producers in the one market; that, I assume, is the objective.

I have a third criticism to direct to the hon. Minister. I concede that it strays a bit from the bill, but I think it is relevant enough. Generally speaking, the agricultural industry has not shared equitably in the wealth that this nation has produced. If one compares the number of people who are on farms, and the proportion of the wealth that goes to agriculture, you come up with figures indicating there are almost twice as many people as the proportion of the national wealth that is going to them.

Generally speaking, if farmers were to calculate the income they got on a wage per hour basis, most of them would be in violation of our minimum wage laws in the province of Ontario. Generally speaking, farmers have been living on their capital in a fashion that no other business would. Many farmers simply are not in a position to improve their plant, so to speak, so that they might produce a grade "A" quality product. They simply have not got the capital.

There is an interesting statistic available in the newsletter that has just come to my desk from the Ontario milk producers' co-ordinating board—revealing that the cow population in Canada over the past year, according to the latest statistics, has gone down in every province across this country including Ontario. The only exceptions were P.E.I., which is so small as not to be consequential in the overall picture, and the province of Quebec where the cow population has gone up by some 23,000, compared with a year ago. The hon. Minister is shaking his head; I can assure him that this is correct.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): What was the percentage there.

Mr. MacDonald: Let me read the note on this. It says:

The decline in cow population which was evident in June 1964 continued into December 1964. A total of 2,837,000 cows of two years and over were kept for milking purposes on Canadian farms, a slight reduction of 6,000 compared with the same time a year ago. Except for Prince Edward Island and Quebec, all provinces registered a decline in number. In fact, the province of Quebec added 23,000 cows, an increase almost four times as large as the decline in the national dairy herd. This is an indication of the growing concentration of the dairy industry in central Canada.

Let us put it frankly—in the province of Quebec. Why is this taking place?

Mr. Whicher: They are subsidized in the province.

Mr. MacDonald: I will tell you why it is taking place. Because in the Quebec government—if it does not shatter the hon. member for Bruce—they have a few socialists who know something about economic planning. Economic planning means that if there is an underdeveloped sector of the economy, you plan so that they get a fair share of the available wealth, or you assist them to help themselves and therefore the Lesage government—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): A Liberal government!

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, with the incentive coming from those with whom you would not agree, the Lesage government has done this. This would be more appropriate during the agriculture estimates, but let me review it quickly. During the past year they have made available, in addition to the federal subsidies, a ten-cent subsidy on butter fat between October and April, which represents 35 cents per 100 pounds of milk. During the summer months there is a five-cent subsidy on butter fat, the equivalent of 15 to 18 cents per 100 pounds of milk. They are making a direct grant of approximately $500 for building milk houses. They are making a direct grant for mechanical cooling for over four cans—in other words, an economic unit, or something approaching an economic unit, but not a small part-time operation. They are giving general assistance for fertilizer, lime and seed grain. This is the kind of thing that has been done. With this result, that with about the same population—90,000 farms, and about 60,000 dairy farms—their economic status is rising. You have a situation in the eastern part of Ontario, I am told, where some of the Quebec producers who are getting these subsidies from their government are actually marketing in the province of Ontario. I suggest the hon. Minister or his colleague, the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall), is not going to be able to ignore this situation or you will find that the greater production of manufactured milk products in Quebec is going to come in and hit the Ontario market to the extent now shared by our manufacturers.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that another basic criticism of the government's policy, implicit in this bill, is that if you are going to give farmers an opportunity to improve their position so that they can produce a quality product, you have to recognize that the agriculture industry has been depressed. At least in a neighbouring jurisdiction they have moved to assist them to help themselves to get out of this depressed position. The result of it is reflected in a rather amazing change in the national dairy herd within a single year, with an increase in the cow population in the province of Quebec four times the decrease throughout all the rest of the nation.

Mr. Whicher: Has the hon. member got the total amount of that subsidy?

Mr. MacDonald: I do not know what the total amount is. I presume that this could be readily available.

It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I have some misgivings with regard to the implementation of this bill and to the convictions of the government in setting the objectives that are implicit in the Hennessey report or in any study that has been made of the milk industry. Along with the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, I concur that it is impossible for us to come to any definitive conclusion at the moment. I hope the hon. Minister, in concluding this debate, may dispel some of our doubts, answer some of our questions and elaborate more on the principles. In any case, we are stuck; for better or for worse, with this bill. It is the way out of a situation that has become pretty close to intolerable.

If we have no alternative but to support the bill, then on second reading we shall do so.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, and particularly in his complimentary references to the Liberal government in Quebec. It is too bad that he had to take the opportunity to indicate that perhaps those who were indicating the policies were not true Liberals. I would hasten to assure you, sir, that this policy of economic planning is a part of Liberal policy, and a very important part.

This afternoon we are discussing the principle of an Act which assembles an imposing array of authority in the hands of the government. The authority is not new, although there are some aspects of it that have been gathered from other parts of the department, and there are a few new features. In general, the proposed milk commission—production, transportation, processing, distribution and pricing. The commission has within itself the power to not only negotiate and do what it can to foster agreement, but is, in fact, the arbitrating authority in the industry, beyond which, it appears in the bill, there is no appeal. We would assume that there is an appeal beyond the board to the hon. Minister who, in effect, controls the operation of the board, because it is directly under his thumb, and I would like to say something about that in general. It appears that the delegation of this authority can occur in whole or in part, to marketing boards. We already have two of them: a marketing board and a marketing plan involved with the production and sale of cheese and cream; and it appears that there will be a new marketing board setup that will deal with fluid milk and will do away with the present need for the fluid and concentrated organizations.

We find that, if this operation of power is going to be in the same context as it is in the Ontario farm marketing board, these powers can be delegated to the appropriate marketing board but they can be withdrawn without notice and, as a matter of fact, at a moment's notice. All of the decisions of the marketing board—that is, the commodity marketing board—are subject to immediate review and, in fact, frequent interference. We have seen the hon. Minister's tendency toward accepting the overall responsibility when it comes to matters of pricing and matters of acreage allotments, say, in the tobacco industry, but those of us who are making a living in the milk industry remember very well his compulsion to impose a moratorium on the increase in milk price that was indicated by the application of the milk formula that has already been referred to this afternoon.

So the power is there in massive proportions and although it is operated through a commission that would be established by this Act, it is true that the members of the commission, including the chairman, would be appointed by the hon. Minister; they would be selected by him and I have no doubt that they would telephone him before making any great decision and talk it over with him. So, in fact, the levers of this powerful machine are sitting right beside the desk in the hon. Minister of Agriculture's office.

We are growing accustomed to state control of aspects of the agricultural industry. We have seen—and I have seen, when travelling in Europe, how these features that are state-controlled do, in the long run, work out best for the farmers in a good many areas. The features of state control have been tested here in the courts, direct to the Supreme Court of Canada, and have been sustained by the courts. These features of control have been accepted by the farmers in large measure, although there are still a good many with much reason on their side, who talk about the good old days of supply and demand and, in fact, when a man's initiative was all that was required to get ahead in the particular aspect of the industry in which he was interested.

I maintain that it requires much more than that at this stage of the development of our industry. We have accepted this type of control in the past and we are ready to accept it now, and the objection that I would like to put to the hon. Minister is the fact that although we have this impressive array of control—and we assume that the urbane hon. Minister is going to administer these controls for the good of the greatest number—it has never been made clear by anyone in authority, particularly the hon. Minister, what his views are on what the greatest good for the greatest number would constitute in this particular industry, the milk industry. We do not know how concerned he is for the consumer and the price of the product; we do not know how concerned he is for those in the industry who have enjoyed the special privilege of selling fluid milk for years past. It is in this area that we would call the government to task, and the hon. Minister particularly, for not indicating in a clear and precise way, the policies that will direct this organization which will be constituted by the passage of Bill 135.

I have said, and I am sure that I will hear it again, that I do believe, in this controlled aspect of agriculture, it must never be controlled for its own sake; it can be imposed only when there is no other solution; and I maintain that this has been a fact, for example, in the tobacco industry. It is apparent from the report of the Hennessey committee and apparent from the views of the farmers dealing with this industry that such controls are essential now, but we want to know specifically the policy of the government, and particularly the views of the hon. Minister on a series of salient and specific points that are in the minds of the farmers at the present time.

Since the Hennessey committee's report has been circulated across the province there have been rumours going up and down the concessions like brush fires, as to what the hon. Minister said on this occasion; what the president of one milk producing group said on another and so on. It is time these rumours were cleared away and the farmers could base their opinions of the action of the government on fact, and clearly stated views.

To begin with, I suppose the outstanding area in which the government view is not made clear is: To what extent will the fluid milk market be open to those who are prepared to ship grade "A" milk? I should say at this time, Mr. Speaker, that I have been in a preferred position in the milk business and it may be argued that I should not be taking part in this debate because of that, but the fact remains that in the constituency of Brant, there are a good many farmers in a similar position and I have been elected to represent them here and so, with this in mind, I would state the view that follows.

I believe that where the control is great, it is imperative that the views of the controllers be known. I am very glad that the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party read into the record the views of the fluid milk shippers at the present time, a view that is broad, that is unselfish, that is far-reaching. Those who do enjoy the present advantage of "a contract" are prepared to see the government use this authority to open up the industry to those who are prepared to ship grade "A" milk. We have not heard from the hon. Minister how he is prepared to do this. We know that the Hennessey report recommended doing away with these quotas entirely, and in order that no one would suffer from the abolition of these quotas, it recommended that the quotas be bought by this government and suggested $5 a pound. The rumour is that the hon. Minister—or maybe it was the hon. Provincial Treasurer—said that there would be two moons in the sky before money would ever be used for this purpose. Maybe he did not say it, but the farmers are under the impression that money would never be used for this purpose, and we would like to know what the hon. Minister's policy is on this. I have a feeling that he did say it.

Mr. Whicher: Maybe he said three moons.

Mr. Nixon: But the fact remains that because of the Hennessey report there is some change in the trafficking in quotas, which, as the hon. Minister probably knows, has been going on for some years. I have had a farmer phone me and say, "Do you suppose I can buy quotas for less than $10 now, because I have been paying between $10 and $12 a pound for them? I think I should get them for $5 because they may be done away with in a few years." So it appears that the elimination of rumour and the certainty of policy is what we must have from the hon. Minister; and I hope that we will have it this afternoon.

I believe firmly that any farmer who can produce grade "A" milk should be able to share in the best markets for that milk. I feel that the economic equality of opportunity is something that must be the policy of this government and it should be stated by the government. I am quite prepared to hear this policy qualified by phrases referring to phasing, referring to market expansion, to possible industry disruption and it is true that all of these things are much in the mind of the hon. Minister and must surely have been during the weeks that he was considering the Hennessey report and preparing this legislation.

I would like to know the hon. Minister's views on the formula pricing of milk. Once again the rumour is that the hon. Minister has been completely disillusioned with this for many months and will take the very first opportunity to abolish formula pricing. I would agree that if we were going to form a pool in which there was, in fact, one organization marketing the milk, it might be possible to negotiate this price without the formula that they say the hon. Minister finds so objectionable. It is true that the formula has been overridden in the past but we would like an assurance that formula pricing will continue until such time as the industry is organized on a basis where it can be safely done away with. And I would hope the hon. Minister would comment on this.

A matter to which my friend, the hon. member for Huron-Bruce referred earlier this afternoon is certainly in the minds of a small but deeply interested group in this province. I refer to those farmers who have Jersey and Guernsey cattle and who have carved out for themselves a special niche in the marketing of milk in this province. I do not have to reiterate what my hon. friend said about the fact that these breeders were in a bad position but they were able to develop a market through their own initiative. It is obvious that, if their milk is pooled with all the rest of the milk, their position would be very drastically changed.

Once again, there are many rumours associated with government policy and we would be glad to know what the government action would be in the direction of the milk commission when this comes before us.

Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me, there is a fourth area where government policy should well be known and should be stated clearly. It is a fact that this bill deals with the marketing of milk that will be made into cheese. It is another fact that one of the strongest recommendations made by the report that is the basis for the bill we are discussing this afternoon, was that the Ontario cheese producers' marketing board be placed under trusteeship immediately. There were allegations made in this report that the chairman, Mr. Hector Arnold, and the other members of the board have not acted in the best interest of the industry and it was because of this that the recommendation for a type of trusteeship was put before the hon. Minister.

I was surprised a short time ago to hear the federal Minister of Agriculture make some comments about the operation of the cheese board of Ontario in a way that would bring the board into some additional disrepute. This is a board that is constituted under legislation of Ontario. It seems to me that the time has come when the hon. Minister in this House should declare his views on these allegations and restore confidence in the Ontario cheese producers' marketing board or, in fact, put it under trusteeship. Many of us are familiar, personally familiar, with the men who have been investigated in this way by the report. And a great service would be done to the farm community if the cloud of suspicion that covers this area of the milk marketing industry would be removed by a strong statement from the hon. Minister; and we would expect to hear that at the very first opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, I may say in closing that this Legislature has been in session since January 20. The committee on agriculture of the Legislature has yet to meet to consider aspects dealing with the agricultural industry. It met for four minutes to elect a chairman and we have not heard anything about it since. Now we are going to meet next Tuesday, apparently to discuss this legislation, but naturally the report itself has been in our hands for many weeks. There have been a good many farmers in organizations and as individuals who would have been delighted to give their views of the report leading up to this legislation, not only to the hon. Minister but to the hon. members of this House at large. And yet the committee was never called together to give the farm community an opportunity to make its voice known. I feel that the hon. Minister, who should give leadership to the committee, can be criticized in this regard. I regret that the government policy associated with this powerful board is not clearly stated nor even implied. I assume that the principles of the findings of the milk report will guide the hon. Minister, but only he can assure us of this.

Mr. W. E. Johnston (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I feel there is not a great deal left that I might say because, actually, from what I have heard so far everybody is agreed that this bill is a good one. I would like if I may to go back a little way with regard to the whole thing. It has been suggested here that we are leaving the producer groups out and we are putting this in the hands of the government.

I myself, as most of you know, belong to the whole milk group. We produce fluid milk on our farm and for a number of years now I have felt that not only the producers of fluid milk but the producers of concentrated, cheese, and those of cream and butter, might have accomplished more had they been willing to get together and sit around a common table and discuss their problems. But I would like to say to you that, because this has never been done and because they have never seen fit to do it, or because they have never actually found a solution, it became necessary for the government to establish the committee to inquire into the milk industry so, just a few weeks ago, we received that report.

The report revealed a pretty drastic type of programme in a good many ways. I am happy that the hon. Minister has seen fit to bring in this bill which, I believe, will go a long way in finding the solution so that those in all areas of the dairy industry will get a better deal. It is true that those of us who are shipping fluid milk may suffer a little, but the main objective is that we shall bring the bottom up. This, I believe, is what this bill sets out to do.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Brant's remarks regarding the cheese industry. He has asked the hon. Minister to make a statement, or tell him why he has not accepted the recommendation of the Hennessey report. I would say to the hon. member that if he has read the editorials in all of the farm papers over the past few weeks, that in itself will suggest that the cheese producers—Hector Arnold, and those who work with him—have been vindicated. The cheese producers' group, as I remember it, was one of the first organizations set up under The Farm Products Marketing Act, 30 years ago. I can well remember when the vote was taken in my community. Since that time, the cheese producers have done a splendid job. I commend them for the job they have done over the years. I sincerely hope that this bill will place them in the same position they have been in; they have been elected by the producers themselves, and the day that they do not serve the producers, I am sure that the personnel will be removed. This is the most democratic way I know of that any farm organization can be set up. It is the way this group functions, and does so very well, in my mind.

This bill, I believe, will find in part the solution to the problem we have been faced with. I have said before that the main purpose, I believe, is that we hope to bring the bottom up—I mean by that the secondary milk producers—and hope to level out at a place where there will be room to move in those who wish to get into the fluid milk trade, and those who are able to produce grade "A" milk. And so, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to prolong the debate. I sincerely hope that with the full co-operation of the milk groups themselves—also that the hon. Minister in his wisdom is able to appoint as members of the commission the very best type of men who will represent all the interested parties, such as transportation, pricing, producers and processors, and that every part of the industry will be represented on the commission. Therefore, I believe it can be said that because the commission has been set up in this way we are not taking out of the hands of the producers themselves the control they hope to maintain through the years.

Hon. T. R. Connell (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part in the second reading of this new milk bill. Actually, I think that in my 14 years in this Legislature, this is the first time I have ever taken part in a second reading debate, but I do feel strongly enough about this milk bill that I thought possibly I should say something at this time. It will not be earth-shattering but it will indicate my interest.

I would like to compliment the hon. Minister for the introduction of this new milk bill. Actually, the Hennessey report is, in my opinion, a good report but it is something like our—I hesitate to mention the press, but when we read the press we are often reading one man's opinion. Just because this gentleman—and I do not know the man but I have a high regard for him—is a university professor does not make him the absolute expert on the milk business. However, he has brought to light many of the inequities in the milk business and he has highlighted many of the problems, many of which we have known for many years. However, and here is where I disagree with my friend, the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, when he indicates that the government has taken the easy way out, I would say that Hennessey in his report has taken the easy way out in bringing in some of his recommendations.

Hennessey's recommendations would be fine, if all the farmers in this province were in equal circumstances and had, say, equal quotas or satisfactory quotas or all the farmers were of the same age; or if milk were in short supply, I would say the Hennessey recommendations might be good. However, I would say that it was the hon. Minister of Agriculture who has taken the more difficult road in bringing in this bill. Instead of opening the gates wide to everyone who could produce grade "A" milk, and allowing them to ship to the pool, he is bringing about the changes gradually, as I understand from this bill.

I will give some more credit to the Liberals, and say that if I determine the Ottawa legislation correctly, the Minister is getting an important assist by the increased subsidy to the concentrated milk producers.

I am afraid that if the Hennessey report had been enacted as recommended, allowing anyone who could qualify to ship grade "A" milk, the price of milk paid to the fluid producer would have fallen very quickly. It seems to me that few farmers are in a position to take less for their milk and continue to survive. Under the new legislation I feel that producers will have an equality, among themselves, that has hitherto only been a dream.

What are some of these inequalities? First and foremost, I would say, is the lack of standard pricing of milk in regard to the amount on which he is paid full price, against that of surplus milk which he must ship toward his quota. This varies, I would estimate, from 90 per cent full price against ten per cent surplus to, in some cases, 50 per cent full price against 50 per cent surplus. The full price is roughly $5.25 against $2.65 surplus; and, of course, this is less trucking in both cases. The milk is all the same but you can see that the one could receive $1 less per hundred.

Second, I would say, is the hardship of many farmers being unable to raise their quotas to a fair amount in spite of the fact that they not only have the equipment and, therefore, the expense, but also the ability and the type of farm, to produce a much greater quantity. I would hope that, under this new Act, the low-quota shipper, shipping grade "A" milk, will be one of the first to be looked after. He has been the long sufferer in the fluid milk business.

Third, I would say, is the inequality in the matter of trucking costs. This is not a large matter, but the distance involved and the resultant cost of that hauling seriously affects the farmer's milk cheque.

There are other inequalities, such as testing the lab facilities, or the availability of lab facilities, the various inspections, the whims of the different dairies, all of which, I hope, will be greatly lessened under the new legislation.

Under the new Act, and the resultant blending of prices, I do not believe there will be a great rush by the concentrated shippers to apply to be allowed to ship to the pool. Most people considered that the grade "A" shipper receives $5.25 for his milk and the concentrated shipper about $3.00. This is true on the surface: The grade "A" shipper does receive $5.25 for milk that is accepted at full price, but remember that any amount from 10 to 50 per cent goes at about the $2.65 mark and both portions of this milk cost from 30 to 60 cents per hundredweight to ship. The fluid milk shipper in many cases does not net much more than $4 per hundredweight. In order to ship grade "A" milk, he must maintain a certain quota the year round, which with winter feeding, does cost more to produce than his counterpart in the concentrated field. The concentrated shipper does not have quotas to keep up and tends to be a summer shipper when feed costs are low. Under the new Ottawa assistance programme I understand that the concentrated shipper will receive at least $3.50 per hundred for his milk. Thus, this narrows the gap considerably between the two groups and I do not believe there will be the pressure to become a grade "A" shipper that has existed this last few years.

When the advantages and disadvantages between the two groups are weighed there will be many second thoughts about becoming a grade "A" shipper.

Now, I would like to mention just briefly how this affects the consumer, and I would think with all the changes that are possibly about to take place in the milk business, that there will be no increase in the price of milk to the consumer. The quality of the milk will be higher at every level of the industry. With the quality and price being maintained, the consumer will have confidence in the product and will retain it in its rightful place as a food and even increase its use.

In spite of the good intentions of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to establish the new commission and milk marketing board, I suggest that it will work well only if the appointments to that board in its initial stages are good, sound appointments. In my opinion, they must have a solid background, not only in the various aspects of the milk business, but in the business world itself. However, there are men like that around. I would suggest to that group, whoever they may be, that changes be made slowly; the gradual implementation of the changes is a must.

Now, there are other suggestions that I would make. I am not sure whether I would be in conflict with our hon. Minister or not, but I would be speaking as a private member rather than as a member of the Cabinet, if they are, but I would say one of the other things that this group must first look after, is that the present inequities in the fluid trade should be straightened out first. I would say the upgrading of quality on all fronts of the milk production is a must.

Another suggestion from me to that group, is that the territorial rights for dairies should be watched closely in any changes that might be suggested, so as not to jeopardize those many small dairies and the job security of their men.

And here is where I fit in with my friend from Brant, I too would like to see a continuance of the formula pricing of milk maintained as a fair basis for not only the producer and the dairy, but also the consumer. And I too, as a private member, will be interested to hear what the hon. Minister has to say this afternoon about that.

I would like to see a good, sound milk marketing organization for the marketing of all milk. Now, whoever this group of men happen to be, I would say it will be the most important job that any of them have ever undertaken. If they are successful, they will do more than any other group of men in our time to ensure a successful and secure future for the dairy industry in Ontario.

Mr. O. F. Villeneuve (Glengarry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this legislation and I want, first of all, to compliment the hon. Minister for introducing this bill because perhaps it is long overdue. But irrespective of what the province of Ontario does to put the milk industry in its proper focus, Ontario cannot do it alone unless it has a co-ordinated effort on behalf of the province of Quebec along with the federal government, because we produce in these two provinces, 65 per cent of the milk production of Canada and after all, you can sell only according to supply and demand on a preferred market at home. What you have to export out of the country, competes with world prices.

Now, as far as Ontario is concerned, we have more or less regulated our dairy production into different channels in proportion to what we sell and I think that what we do not consume in the way of milk products here is exported largely in concentrated milk and cheese. We are the only province that has legislation that will permit the cheese marketing board to function and sell this surplus on an outside market. For many years it has carried on successfully. Now there is a conflict of interests between the federal hon. Minister of Agriculture and the head of the cheese marketing board in Ontario. I am from a cheese-producing area. From May 1964 until September 1964, the average price paid to milk producers doing business with cheese factories across Ontario was 20 cents per 100 more than that paid or received in the province of Quebec.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture in the federal House has made quite clear the statement that we should have sold cheese produced in Ontario at a much better price. But the facts, as they are known, do not tend to bear out that argument. I do not wish to get into any controversy; I believe Mr. Hays is a serious man. He is trying to play an important part in putting this dairy industry on an even keel. I have a list price for cheese sold in London on February 17 of this year, and Ontario cheese still brings over two cents a pound more than the product manufactured in Quebec, it is rather hard to understand why they would pay more for cheese produced in Quebec and six months afterwards, when it is aged, the Ontario cheese receives a preference of two cents a pound. That is all I am going to say about that particular argument.

I believe we are making some progress. I served in the federal House during the years 1957-1962 when, previous to the 1957 election, the price of milk powder was raised to 17 cents a pound. That caused a great increase in the production of butter, a product that we can sell only at half the price we are receiving for it in Canada; when a market is available, we have to sell it on the world market. This province is not responsible for that butter, because during the past six years the province of Quebec has produced 250 million pounds more butter than has the province of Ontario. We have to import small amounts in order to feed our population on a per capita basis. So, as I say, the dairy production industry is in order so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, but I am sure the authorities in Quebec are willing and are accepting this kind of legislation. It is my understanding that they are so impressed with this bill that they are prepared to introduce it. As I stated before, if we get that kind of co-operation with the province of Quebec and the federal authorities, I am sure there are many bugs that have got to be ironed out of this legislation—at least we have started in the proper direction.

So far as the fluid milk people are concerned, I appreciate the fact that you can only take so much milk in that particular trade. If you are going to take on increased amounts, you are going to cause chaos and disorder, and everybody is going to suffer. We have had that experience in other branches of the dairy industry. I believe we have to move cautiously; the fact that we are trying to get the lower price people up on a more even keel is doing something they appreciate. The average intelligent man realizes that you can sell only so much of this product; therefore, we have got to have regulated markets. But I believe that, with the effort that has been made, and with the co-operation of the province of Quebec and the federal government, that the dairy industry is in for brighter days ahead.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to get into this debate at this time because so much has been said. Before anything else can be summarized about this bill, we must hear what the hon. Minister is going to say. As far as I am concerned, it will be one of the most important speeches of his life, because he has been asked a great many questions this afternoon. Many have been given in the newspapers and we will look with interest to his answers.

Before going any further, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I certainly appreciate the difficult job that the hon. Minister has. The inequality of milk prices has been going on for years and perhaps it is too much, even for those of us in the Opposition, to think that the hon. Minister can wave his magic wand and fix everything up in the dairy industry in the province of Ontario.

He has a difficult job, but he has no more difficult a job than many of the concentrated milk producers, cream producers and cheese producers in the province of Ontario who have been living on a starvation wage for many years past. What we in the Opposition hope for, and I am sure what people in the farming industry engaged in the milk business are concerned with, is this question: Will this bill help to bring those thousands of farmers in this province who, as I say, have been living on starvation wages, will this bill help them in any way? If so, how much, and when, is it going to take effect?

The impression has been given by several of the speakers this afternoon, I think particularly from the hon. member for York South, whose speech I enjoyed very much, that he did not think that too large a percentage of concentrated milk producers would go into the fluid market if they had the opportunity. He gave several reasons for this not taking place. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not share this feeling with the hon. member for York South. I think there are hundreds of concentrated milk producers in the province of Ontario who not only work to get into the fluid milk market, but are ready to start tomorrow morning if that opportunity presented itself.

I am thinking of my own particular area where the number of fluid milk producers, of course, is small. May I tell you that the largest milk producers in Bruce county are concentrated milk producers and some of the best quality producers—not only the quality of the milk they produce, but in their whole setup, from bulk tanks, as the hon. member for York South mentioned, their milk houses and all the necessary machinery that is needed. I would say that many of these concentrated producers are in an excellent position and ready to start tomorrow morning whenever the hon. Minister will give the word.

I think the figure was mentioned this afternoon that of the possible 5,000—a figure, incidentally, that I do not accept, but it is possible that it could be true—who might become fluid milk producers if the opportunity presented itself, only 1,800 had bulk tanks. Might I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no regulation at the present time in the milk industry that a producer of fluid milk must have a bulk tank in order to ship to dairies. This is not necessary at all, but to my knowledge there is a limited number of people who are milking cows today in any substantial number who would not put in a fluid tank immediately, or in the next week or two. I assure the hon. member for York South that it takes only two or three weeks to get one installed and I assure him, and the House, too, that instead of costing a maximum of, I think, $10,000—as he suggested—a fluid milk tank can be installed today for approximately $3,000. This is considerably less than the $10,000 I heard mentioned this afternoon.

The hon. member for Carleton mentioned the fact—and I hesitate to say this when he is not in the House—that he thought this was a good bill. I, like the hon. member, hope it is a good bill, but I point out to the House that the reason that it is good, so far as he is concerned, is because he is a fluid milk producer. So far as I can see—without the regulations, that we do not know about, and without having heard the speech that the hon. Minister is about to give in a few minutes—his income will not be touched by five cents. I am sure that this bill, as I read it, is not going to hurt a single fluid milk producer in this province.

Mr. Speaker, without hurting the top, how are we going to bring up the concentrated producers? How is this going to be done? There is only so much money in the pot that supports the milk industry in this province, in the amount of milk that we drink, in the amount of milk that we use in butter and in concentrated products. If something is not taken off the top, I suggest that those on the bottom level are not going to be able to be brought up.

I believe it was the hon. Minister of Public Works, Mr. Speaker, who said that this bill will put everyone in the province of Ontario engaged in the milk business on a common basis. Mr. Speaker, I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Minister of Public Works; it will put them on a common basis except in price, because the concentrated milk producer, as the bill is read, is not going to be helped by a single cent, except by the Treasury in Ottawa. That is where the milk producers in the province of Ontario are going to be helped. Unless the hon. Minister, in the speech we are about to hear, tells us some of the regulations that are going to be put in the bill, and unless he tells us something that we do not read when we read this bill as laymen, I suggest that the only common basis for milk producers in this province will be in the fact that they are controlled by a milk czar who can do practically anything he wishes to the various milk leagues of this province, and to the different producers. As far as price is concerned, there is still going to be a great differential.

The hon. Minister said, too, that he did not know how the fluid milk producers could be brought down at all in price because he thought that they had to have the present price in order to survive. Mr. Speaker, that is the point. I, as a milk distributor, for example, agree that the fluid milk producers of the province of Ontario are not getting too much money. But how do you expect the thousands of concentrated producers of this province to survive at $1.50 per 100 less than you are getting, Mr. Minister, if you cannot take 25 cents or 50 cents off the top?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Do you want the fluid milk producers to come down in price?

Mr. Whicher: No, I do not.

Hon. Mr. Connell: That is what you said two or three times.

Mr. Whicher: If I gave that impression, I am sorry. I said that I am quite agreeable that the fluid milk producers are worth every penny that they are getting at the present time, but—

Mr. MacDonald: You said that there is only so much money in the pot—

Mr. Whicher: I agree with the hon. member, and I asked the hon. Minister how he is going to do this. But what I said to the hon. Minister of Public Works was this: If he cannot survive at $5.25 per 100, how do you expect the concentrated milk producers to have survived the past few years at $3 per 100, and who are now going to survive at $3.50 per 100, only through the grace of the Treasury in Ottawa?

Hon. G. E. Gomme (Minister without Portfolio): One can buy milk less than $5.25 a hundred?

Mr. Whicher: Yes, I do, very little, but about—

Hon. Mr. Gomme: Then why do you use that figure?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Whicher: Because that was the figure that was mentioned.

Mr. MacDonald: Four dollars and 68 cents was the average last year.

Mr. Whicher: Four dollars and 68 cents, my hon. friend says. I suggest that this is a much larger figure than the $3 that they are getting at the present time, or the $3.50 that they are going to get in the immediate future.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. Minister is going to be able to tell us how this is going to help those people who are getting a limited amount for their milk in the province today. I certainly hope that he can help us, because at the present time, without the regulations, without the speech the hon. Minister is about to give us now, this bill means very little indeed. It just means a change of regulation.

It means, of course, too, that they are going to try to improve the quality of all milk in Ontario. With this I agree, but the thing that is most important to the farmer who is engaged in the milk business is, "How much money per hundredweight am I going to get?" And, as I have said before on many occasions, Mr. Speaker, revolutions have been fought in countries, hundreds of years ago, on issues much more minor than this one.

It is simply not fair that some people with top quality milk should get $4.68 a hundred, or whatever the average was last year, and others, with exactly the same quality, should get only $3. This is not right; and, unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, and I say this in the most friendly and kindly way, it is the hon. Minister of Agriculture's job and position to give us an answer to this problem. And not only are we in the Opposition looking most anxiously for the speech he is about to give but, I assure him, the thousands of concentrated milk producers in this province are also listening with great anxiety; so I say to him, "Good luck!"

Mr. N. Whitney (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief remarks in this debate. I, for one, share the opinions of other hon. members who have spoken and I want to congratulate the hon. Minister on this very forward step in milk legislation. For many years things have been in a very sad state of affairs, as has been described; and there have been most difficult problems with which to deal. I believe, for the first time, that this is a forward step and although we never expect anything to be perfect in the beginning but, with good appointees to the commissions and to the boards, we do believe that a wonderful opportunity to make things more closely equal than they have been in the pricing and the conditions in the production of milk will result. Along with the action taken by the federal government in subsidizing the manufactured milk and cheese milk, it will certainly make things much more equal than they have ever been in the past.

I would say that the federal government is to be commended on its action in subsidizing manufactured milk; but, on the other hand, I would very much object and just wonder why this was done, because of the attitude that was taken by the hon. Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa. Last Sunday I happened to be watching "Country Calendar" at the time when they allocated part of their programme to the farmers' union march on Ottawa; and, of course, I heard the hon. Mr. Hays addressing the farmers' union delegates. He started right in and said, "You people are to blame for the situation you are in. You do not treat your hired man properly; you do not let him have Sunday dinner at your own table," and things of that kind.

Well, there may have been isolated cases many years ago when that was the situation—and, of course, there could be conditions where groups of men are hired for working in tobacco fields or picking apples where it would not be feasible and practical to take care of this particular help in the farm house. In special circumstances like that probably they are in some cases—and during warm weather—when their actual living conditions might not be of the very best, but nevertheless they accept that in good faith and understand there is a practical reason for it. But I do not know of one single case where the average experienced man on a farm is not well used.

Many of them have excellent houses of their own; they have gardens; the single men have their rooms and their board—and just the same board and at the same table as the farmer himself; and they are treated for the most part exceptionally well because they have to be. A good worker on a farm is a very valuable asset to any farmer; and if he is not treated well one place then that farmer is not going to get help from any source when he wants it because the man will get other employment without any difficulty whatever.

Then, further, the federal Minister of Agriculture made the statement to these people: "Go back and blame Hector Arnold."

Mr. Speaker: I would like to remind the member that he must make his remarks relevant to the principles contained within this bill; and that in the remarks he is making he should try to have some relevancy to the bill that is being discussed.

Mr. Whitney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I am proceeding to do that because he was referring to the cheese which is a part of the milk industry. To continue, and I hope I am in order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister stated to these people, "Go back and blame Hector Arnold for the price of cheese on which you could have got two cents more a pound last year"—or words to that effect. The cheese producers' marketing board was also criticized in the Hennessey report; and I feel that, on the average throughout the years, the cheese producers' marketing board has done a very excellent job because they have given a degree of stability to the cheese industry which did not exist before.

Previously there was not machinery to take care of surpluses and so on; with this stability the cheese producers could plan and they could market the surplus at a lower price than the local prices; and the result was that they have done a pretty excellent job. How could Hector Arnold or anyone, Mr. Hennessey or Mr. Hays or anyone, possibly know last spring that there would be great scarcity of cheese, a lower production, and that we would have the drought and dry weather? How could they possibly anticipate this? And, in fact, it has been good business for the cheese producers to negotiate ahead of time because that prevented them being faced with a huge surplus for which they did not get an adequate price.

The British market, the export market, knew what they would have to pay for cheese; and in fact the hon. member for Glengarry points out that the Ontario product is bringing a much better price than the Quebec product, which is a pretty fair indication, I do believe, that an excellent job is being done by the cheese producers' marketing board.

I feel also that, through this bill and the regulations which will follow from it, a great improvement can be made in the costs of trucking, and so on. I do not feel that there will be the same number of trucks patrolling up and down the roads, some picking up milk for one cheese factory, some for another cheese factory, and so on; and I think that great improvements can be made in cutting costs in this way. I feel also that the local producers, in going ahead in the lower grades of milk, will be helped by this federal bill because they can make a long-range plan on whether it is worthwhile to improve their dairy operations, or whether it is not worthwhile. I believe, in fact, that this bill will open the way for a far greater stability than ever existed in the past for the entire dairy industry, and I wish to congratulate the hon. Minister of Agriculture on bringing forth this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, in listening to the debate for over an hour-and-a-half, we have, I think, brought to the attention of the House and the public in general the complexities of the dairy industry as it pertains in Ontario. There has not been one single clear-cut policy emerge this afternoon, from any of the debates, which would suggest that there is a black or a white area, and we must proceed down the single centre line.

I think it is similar to the operation of one's farm. There are many examples in the province of Ontario of a farmer who operates his farm completely different to someone else, but they may both be considered exceptionally successful farmers. And so it is with all agricultural policy. There is always this grey area that does not simply lend itself to being either, as I said, black or white.

Reference has been made this afternoon to the Hennessey report and to the bill we have introduced. I think, if we are really to get at the significance of this whole matter of the dairy industry as we see it today, we must look at the historical background of the dairy industry in Ontario. I think we have to look at the reasons that have brought us to this place in the agricultural history as it pertains to the dairy industry of this province.

In the years prior to the depression, in the early 1930s, there was what might be considered to be utter and absolute chaos in the dairy industry; there were no defined marketing areas, no producer knew what he really had.

Out of that condition grew The Milk Industry Act of 1932, brought in to bring stability in those markets across Ontario where producers would know that they had a quota to that market for 12 months of the year, and the distributor could count on a quality supply of milk to that market for that period of time. Above all else, the consumer was assured of a quality product in continuity of supply. This is what generated The Milk Industry Act, and since that day in 1932 we have progressed step by step, with one amendment after another, to the time when we have now reached the place where we have been accused by many shippers in the province of Ontario, who do not enjoy the privilege of a fluid contract, of having restrictive legislation—indeed, protective legislation—to a certain class of producers within our province. There is certainly validity to this claim.

It was because of the great complexities as to how one should determine whether or not this should be the breaking down of this protective or restrictive type of legislation, whether there should be the elimination of the distribution areas that had been set up to protect the distributor in that area, and to provide the consumer of that area with a quality product. In order that those shippers who produce the quality product might be given access to that market, we brought in the Hennessey committee and gave them, I think, rather broad terms of reference to examine the dairy industry as it pertains to the province of Ontario.

It was true that before this committee was set up we had asked—indeed one of the first things I did after assuming the office of Minister of Agriculture, at the request of the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), was to carry on the work that had been started by my predecessor in trying to bring together the various dairy groups, the fluid milk shippers, the concentrated, the cheese and the cream producers. And we asked them to sit down and try to work out a marketing plan among themselves, and it was found that this was not possible.

I take grave difference with my friend, the hon. member for York South, when he accused me this afternoon of having by ingenious—and then he said devious—methods—

Mr. MacDonald: I borrowed the phraseology from the hon. member for Grey South.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It shocks me to think that either one of these hon. members would think that I would stoop to such a thing as that, because I am sure that all of the hon. members of this House, indeed the farmers of Ontario, know that is not the type of man I am.

Mr. MacDonald: They came up with a plan but it did not fit in with their election schedule.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Unfortunately, they did not come up with a plan. They came to my office and asked me if we would give consideration to the implementation of an inquiry into the dairy industry in Ontario. And to this we acceded.

Mr. MacDonald: That is skipping a chapter.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, perhaps; but we have talked a lot and this is what actually happened.

Mr. MacDonald: Let us not cry over the spilt milk.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Now we have the report, and I thought this afternoon there would have been more debate on the report itself. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, reference was made to the fact by my friend, the hon. member for Brant that we should have called the agriculture committee together and discussed the inquiry report. I must confess that this would appear to have some merit but I want to say, at the same time, that this report was circulated widely in Ontario, it was given tremendous publicity by the farm papers, by the radio, by the television—in fact, all of the news media—and I want to pay tribute to them for the excellent job that was done in publicizing the main points of the Hennessey report.

And if the hon. member for Brant feels that the farm groups of this province have not given consideration to this, and have not presented their thinking to the government at least, he is certainly wrong; because I can assure him that, ever since I received the report, you might say I have been constantly meeting with people interested in the dairy industry, representing all segments of the dairy industry. And I have good reason to believe that many of these people, and quite rightly so, have been expressing their opinion to the Opposition; this is our democratic privilege.

I would like to make some reference to some of the things which have been said in the commission report, because I correlate what I have to say to some of the remarks that have been made this afternoon, particularly by the hon. member for York South. He mentioned, I believe, somewhere here, his concern with the independence of the commission as suggested in the report and as is revealed in the bill. I think he referred to a statement that I had made at a press conference afterwards.

Mr. Speaker, had I taken a great deal more time at the introduction of this bill I would have said all of these things, because I have no hesitancy whatever in saying that I firmly believe that the chairman of the milk commission must be a civil servant, and I think he has to be a top civil servant. I say this for many reasons.

First of all, in the new bill—The Milk Act—the dairy branch of The Department of Agriculture will come under the direct supervision and instruction of the milk commission. How can we have a civil service branch of The Department of Agriculture responsible to a commission which is completely independent and cut off from the government, and from the responsibility to the Minister?

Then I want also to point out the fact that, in the report of the milk industry inquiry committee on page 47, with reference to the Ontario milk commission, the report reads that:

This committee has studied some of the board's decisions—

this is referring to the milk industry board:

—and was permitted to attend several hearings and other meetings conducted by the board, the last of them on October 11, 1963.

Through this report, the inquiry committee takes strong exception to the achievements and accomplishments of the milk industry board and the prestige with which it is held by the dairy industry of this province. Indeed, I feel that there was criticism directed at this milk industry board which went plenty far. But I am greatly concerned with the fact that here we have a milk inquiry report suggesting that there should be a completely independent commission cut off, as the hon. member for York South says, divorced entirely, from The Department of Agriculture even outside its building committee. And yet at the very time this milk inquiry board visited the milk industry board it was indeed a completely independent milk industry board; not a single civil servant on it.

Mr. MacDonald: They did not act very independently.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: And I would say this: When Mr. George McCague came to the board in November, 1963, as a civil servant, appointed chairman of the milk industry board, there is not a single reference to the milk industry board's decisions in this report after that date. I would think that we should give some consideration to that statement.

Reference has been made here today to the policy of the government in this bill. I was not quite able to follow the thinking of the hon. member for York South when he said—in fact went to some length to say—that we should leave the farm groups to themselves, the farmers of Ontario to themselves, to do as they saw fit with their own particular industry in their own interests, while at the same time he admitted that they had, for years, been trying to get together and could not get together to do the very thing we are trying to do in this bill.

Mr. MacDonald: Where did I say this?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say this, Mr. Speaker: Whatever interpretation may be placed on this new bill a plan is brought in, whether it is by producer petition, which is possible in the bill, or whether it is brought in by government order, which is also possible in the bill, to me it is abundantly clear that there must be a marketing plan for milk in the province of Ontario. Now then, it would seem to me that there are certain things that we could expect a milk marketing plan to accomplish in Ontario.

First of all, I mentioned earlier that there were many milk markets across this province—indeed over a hundred, most of them with different agreements, some of them with different prices. I would say that one of the first things that could be accomplished would be to bring order into the fluid milk industry through the milk marketing board, establishing, first of all, a stability of price, a standardization of agreements, terms of conditions of contract; and to try, in as far as it is possible, to avoid the very obvious duplication in transportation services. But I think, above all else, a marketing plan would relieve the producers of this province of the rigidity of individual contract quotas, and the pressure that is exerted upon individual producers to maintain those quotas. Oftentimes I am inclined to believe that this has resulted in excess surplus milk being produced by those same fluid shippers even though they felt it was not always in their best interest to have to do this. And I think that this very problem of excess surplus milk has aggravated the entire dairy situation. It seems to me that we should place emphasis on a co-ordinated approach to the sale of all raw milk as milk, not as a specific dairy commodity, and place emphasis on the production and sale of dairy products providing the best returns to producers. This surely must be one of the prime objectives of the marketing board.

Now we come to this matter of the details of admission to the milk marketing plan of those concentrated or manufacturing shippers across the province. I think we have to leave to the producers' marketing board under the supervision of the milk commission the details of the admission of these people—these concentrated, or cheese, or whatever you have, manufacturing shippers—to the fluid market. I think we have to recognize the fact that the legislation of this province since 1932, in providing marketing areas and distribution areas, has required the expenditure, by many dairy farmers, of capital investment in plant and equipment, and in the maintenance of a standard of their farm appearance, that has been not required of other manufacturing milk producers.

This does not, for a minute, say that some manufacturing milk producers have not also reached those standards. But we must recognize the fact, whether we like it or not, that only so much fluid milk can be sold in the province of Ontario; granted it is increasing at the rate of about two per cent per year.

The fluid milk producers of this province produce 2.5 billion pounds of milk annually. Of this amount, 2,029,000,000 pounds are used in the bottle trade. The rest of it is used for plant purposes and surplus or excess milk. There is no reason, in my thinking, why, with concerted effort, we cannot increase that annual two per cent increase by a certain amount. I would like to see it go up to four per cent; I would like to see it go beyond that; because I think we must recognize the fact that milk is nature's most perfect food—and that is an old cliché but so true and so obvious.

How we bring in these other people becomes, surely, the responsibility of the marketing board, of their own producers set up to deal with these very matters. I think it would be indiscreet on my part, I think it would be wrong on the part of this government or of this Legislature, to lay down the guide lines by which they will be admitted; and other than that they will not be admitted. I think we must recognize the fact that there are a number of fluid shippers dropping out of the fluid milk trade, and I think this is a trend that may continue. Because we must recognize, as we do in all aspects of agriculture, that many small producers are dropping out of their respective commodity-producing fields.

But I am disturbed by a suggestion made this afternoon by the hon. member for York South when he referred to the fact that ten per cent of the present fluid shippers would be dropped if quality standards were enforced. Mr. Speaker, I want to make it emphatically clear to this House, and to the consuming public of the province of Ontario, that no consumer is asked to drink milk that is not fit for human consumption.

Mr. MacDonald: What percentage does the hon. Minister think would be dropped, then?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This is something of which I have no idea, but I will say this:

There are very, very few. To even suggest that this may be the case, is, I think, an unfortunate statement and I want to set it correct.

Reference has been made this afternoon to the cheese marketing board and what was to become of it, and why we did not do something about that in this bill. Well, Mr. Speaker, this bill we have presented here was drafted with a very great deal of consideration—bearing in mind the entire dairy industry, bearing in mind the contribution made to the dairy industry of Canada by the cheese producers' marketing board of the province of Ontario.

We recognize the fact that criticism may have been directed last year at the fact that perhaps our cheese was not sold for what it might have been sold, but I think we must at the same time recognize what has been so well said by my friend, the hon. member for Glengarry this afternoon: that no one could have foretold the drought that happened in eastern Ontario last year and the obvious drop in cheese production, and the fact that the cheese which had been sold indeed could not be delivered from the province of Ontario to the British importers.

Last fall I spent two weeks in the United Kingdom and I made it our business while there to visit a great many of the cheese importers of the United Kingdom, men who had laid their dollars on the line and said, "We will take all the cheese you can deliver us up to certain quantities at a fixed price." These were the men who, a number of years ago, when the cheese producers of Ontario took hold of the cheese marketing in this province and went to Great Britain and said, "Look, we have a surplus of cheddar cheese in the province of Ontario and we want to sell it to your market."

These were the same men who said, "All right, we will give you a negotiated price for it and you deliver it to us." I am afraid that my hon. friend from Ottawa, Mr. Hays, with great respect to him, met—and I met these people, too, who in those days were not ready to say, "We will take a chance on Ontario cheese," but who said to Ontario cheese producers, "Look, send us your cheese on consignment. We do not think it will sell for any more over here than any other person's cheese, but you send it to us and we will sell it and send back to you whatever we get for it."

I am suggesting to you, Mr. Speaker, that the cheese producers would not buy that kind of a deal in those years. They said, "We are interested in protecting our producers and we want a fixed price"; and they stood by that fixed price.

Bear in mind all the time that Ontario raw milk cheddar cheese sells for a premium on the British market for one reason only, and that is because it is a raw milk product, and if made with the quality standards which pertain to our Ontario cheese industry will age properly when it is stored either here or in Great Britain and provide that flavour that is distinctive to it and for which the British housewife still is ready to pay a premium.

When the cheese shortage developed last year, and it was obvious to us when we were there that there was a shortage of cheese, it was possible, of course, that the price might have been increased, but I think we have to pay tribute to our cheese producers' marketing board for having negotiated what, in their opinion, was a good price and which yielded a higher price to the cheese producers in Ontario than in any other province of Canada. And I say, at the same time, that this self-help programme of deducting .9 of a cent a pound, to put into a stabilization fund of their own, to help them export surplus cheese from Ontario, in effect, carries an umbrella over the entire industry of this country as far as the dairy industry is concerned. I pay tribute to them.

There is this problem of Quebec cheese, and criticism has been directed at the fact that Quebec is selling cheese in the United Kingdom, and that Quebec cheese will not "stand up." I want to say, emphatically, that cheese which is being produced in Quebec is being produced under the same federal government inspection as that which is being produced in Ontario. I have reason to believe that it will "stand up" when it gets to Great Britain. I believe that we in Canada, in Ontario and Quebec, should be approaching the export of cheese on a unified provincial basis, if not, indeed, on a national basis, because I think we must recognize that it is Canadian cheese; and, as such, I think we should be using the knowledge, the experience and the courage that has been shown and developed by the cheese producers' marketing board in exporting this product out of Canada.

Something has been said this afternoon on formula pricing of milk—

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, might I ask a question before the hon. Minister proceeds?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Nixon: He has dealt very effectively with the views of our mutual friend in Ottawa, but we particularly want him to deal with the views of Professor Hennessey with regard to the cheese board.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: As I have said many times, Mr. Speaker, Professor Hennessey and the very able men he had on his committee, in my humble opinion, presented the facts as they saw them in relation to whatever aspects of the dairy industry they studied; this was their interpretation and their opinion of it. We carried on the cheese marketing board in Ontario, as it is presently constituted, because to my mind it deals with a finished product—cheese, cheddar cheese—and not necessarily with cheese milk; and we are talking about raw milk in the plan that we are talking about today. I would say this—

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister does not agree or disagree; he ignores, is that so?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think we have not, and neither has my hon. friend, bought all of the recommendations which were contained in the Hennessey report. These were simply laid-down guide lines by which we might carry on and develop our dairy industry.

Mr. Nixon: If you would permit me, Mr. Speaker, in this case surely the hon. Minister should either accept or reject, and not just ignore, Professor Hennessey's recommendations about the cheese board.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not think I have any more need to do that than has my hon. friend in the comments he made this afternoon, because I fail to find one constructive suggestion in everything he said this afternoon.

If I may continue, Mr. Speaker—and I would point out to my hon. friends that I listened for an hour-and-a-half and never said a word, and was not on my feet once through it all. Now, I would like to have the same courtesy attributed to me.

With reference to what has been said, I would say another word about cheese marketing, indeed about the export programme of the dairy industry in Canada, because this really ties into the general principles of this Hennessey report and the new milk bill. The bill was developed after very close consultation with the federal government at Ottawa, and I, like other members here, will pay tribute to the federal Minister for having implemented a programme of price supports on manufacturing milk throughout Canada. I think it was high time that this was done, quite frankly. I am not altogether satisfied, quite frankly, with the support price that has been offered; I think it might have been higher, on a given quantity of milk.

Mr. Whicher: Why does the hon. Minister not give a little support to that?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I will come to that before too long, my friend. I would say this: We must recognize the fact that the federal government has a taxing base that should carry the export programme over and above any domestic production—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! I would remind the members that we are discussing second reading of this bill. Every member so far has been given a good hearing and I would ask the members opposite if they would also give the Minister a hearing while he is giving his views of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

We felt that the proposal of the federal government to introduce a national dairy commission would tie in very well with the proposal embodied in this bill for a milk commission and a milk marketing board in the province of Ontario. We have been given assurance that a similar type of programme will be inaugurated in the province of Quebec. If this is done it seems to me that, as has been mentioned this afternoon, with more than two-thirds of the total dairy production of all Canada found in these two provinces, we can very well look forward to a co-ordinated interprovincial federal export programme for that little bit of surplus in the dairy industry; because, of the 19 billion pounds of milk produced in Canada, only 2.8 per cent of that total product was surplus last year. Surely we can never arrive at what might be described as a more uniform domestic production than that?

What about formula pricing for milk? I would pay tribute to those who have developed the milk price formula in the province of Ontario, because I think it has served a useful purpose. And I would also say, Mr. Speaker, that it was with the greatest of regret that, to my mind, the milk price formula was abused a few years ago when it came into the realm of politics.

Enough has been said about that in this House, in previous debates, that I am not going to enlarge on it at all, because the hon. members know very well what I am talking about. But I will say this: I do not believe that the present price of milk, or the formula structure for the price of milk, should be disturbed until the marketing board is established and operative to handle the price of fluid milk in Ontario. But at that time I think that the formula pricing for milk, if it is decided by the marketing board that there are certain guide lines—and that is all the formula really is, a guide line as to what may be paid for fluid milk—if it is decided that such a service is needed and might be continued, then I would suggest that we should have, in the province of Ontario, a group of independent economists to develop this formula as an advisory service to the milk marketing board; but I do not think they should be civil servants as is presently the case.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have, in this bill, the opportunity to come to grips with the dairy industry in this province in a way that has not been heretofore provided. I believe that there are possibilities here for us as legislators, first of all, to give approval to this bill and then to put it into operation, stage by stage, as has been suggested this afternoon—in a gradual process of evolution, to the objective of doing everything we can possibly do to bring stability and equality of opportunity to all who are milk producers within the province.

But we must recognize certain basic principles in doing this, and I think if we were to throw open the doors and say, "Let all of the manufacturing shippers of milk in this province come into this pool, this marketing plan, with whatever the number may be—be it 1,000 or 5,000 or any figure in between," then we would, in effect, be saying to the present fluid milk shippers of this province, "We are dropping your market to what the average will bear after all of this milk has been received and allocated out, or sold out to the various distributors."

Mr. MacDonald: It does not sound like the decisive action they asked for.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It may not, but I think we have to recognize that, with the increase in the federal subsidy to the manufacturing shipper, he now is recognized as having had a problem, and the national Treasury is coming, to some degree, to strengthen his place in the market.

Mr. MacDonald: And even with the rest of them.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would think that he would not be quite as much interested in rushing into this other, what he might describe as, more attractive field. It is true that there will be some who will do this, but I talked just last week with a concentrated shipper and he said, "Believe me, as far as I am concerned, I am not nearly as interested now in getting into this fluid market as I was prior to the announcement of the federal government." I like the fact that the federal subsidy is based on production controls, to a degree based on last year's production, and I think this is important if we are going to maintain the balance that we need so much in the dairy industry.

I believe that if we can gradually absorb those manufacturing shippers who are producing a quality milk into this marketing plan—into this blended price that will be developed within the marketing plan—then I would think that we have provided a service to them and an opportunity to them that they have long since wanted, and that many of them will have the opportunity of accepting.

Mr. Speaker, I want in closing to say that I greatly appreciate the support that has been indicated by the Opposition parties, and certainly from our own hon. members of the House, who have spoken in support of this bill. It is, to my mind, a step forward in the dairy industry of Ontario.

ONTARIO INSTITUTE FOR STUDIES IN EDUCATION

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves second reading of Bill No. 127, An Act to establish the Ontario institute for studies in education.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, in Bill No. 127, we are asked to deal with two principles.

The organization that the bill would set up is really an institute for research and it is an institute for teaching and conferring of degrees; in the words of the bill, a college. Research and teaching are, in the words of an article I read recently, like sin and confession; because the latter does not mean much unless participation in the former has already taken place.

If you will permit me, I would like to speak first about the research responsibilities for the proposed institute.

There has been general criticism for a number of years that sufficient money has not been made available for adequate educational research in this province. There has been a seat-of-the-pants approach to the direction of our multi-million dollar effort in education, which I am very glad to see would be changed with the passage of this bill, and we on this side will support the bill because of this.

The curriculum institute that has been supported by the government for some years past, I believe last year to the extent of $50,000, was in many ways similar to the proposed institute that is before the House this afternoon in that the members taking part in the institute represented in fact various constituencies.

The members of the curriculum institute were drawn specifically from the teachers' federation, from The Department of Education, trustees and certain specific boards. Because of this they had a constituency to represent; and because of this, more than any other reason, there has been criticism of the work of the curriculum institute, a feeling that it was somewhat timid and ineffectual, that it was able to present its reports in a very glossy way because of the $50,000 it picked up yearly from this Legislature, but that in fact the contents of these reports were disappointingly thin.

But the bill before us, at least the hon. Minister's remarks on the introduction of the bill, would indicate that this curriculum institute would be absorbed by the new institute. Some other research efforts will be absorbed as well, particularly the department of educational research at OCE, which has a second duty. As I understand it, the department of educational research at the college of education is also The Department of Education's research arm and is readily available to the hon. Minister to do specific researches as he requires.

This is going to be included in the new institute and, I think, is more than anything else the earmark of what is going to be wrong with the institute; it is going to in fact be the Minister's institute. It will have no separate existence in fact. It will be available to do specific research projects for him because, if it is not, no other body is available for this; and surely he would not function without this at his disposal.

I have made the point that this new institute will be very much under the control of the Minister. This is a criticism that comes into many Acts of this government, and I suppose many others. When we look at the bill, we find that the money that supports the institute is voted directly by this Legislature and so we would have the opportunity to review what they did last year and to question what they will do in the years that lie ahead.

The areas for research have been specifically laid out by the hon. Minister himself in great detail, and I am sure that much thought has gone into this; but once again, very little will be left to the imagination of those who will be undertaking this research.

The director of the institute is going to be appointed by the hon. Minister. He has even indicated who this would be, and I would concur that the appointment would be a good one. Nevertheless, the director owes his appointment to the hon. Minister—at least the recommendation of this appointment, which is tantamount to appointment.

As a matter of fact all of the members of the board of governors of the research institute receive their appointment in the same way. They are recommended by various constituencies. Maybe that is a confusing word to use, but I refer to the fact that the Ontario teachers' federation will nominate somebody, the University of Toronto, through its president, will nominate someone. All of these nominees have to be concurred in by the hon. Minister of Education before they actually become a part of the board of governors of the research institute, which should be a leader not only in this province but in this nation and hopefully in the world with the money that we are prepared to make available for its use.

As a matter of fact, the hon. Minister is in a position in this bill to rule on the re-appointment of members of the board of governors—their eligibility for reappointment. In fact he decides on the conditions under which membership on the board of governors is vacated and the procedures for filling any vacancies.

In sum, I would say the institute for educational research is entirely the hon. Minister's baby. It is constituted in this way and he has the direct and continuing responsibility for all of its actions, as it is presently constituted. I would be the first to say that we could trust the hon. Minister of Education to assume these responsibilities properly, but let us look at the board of governors which he eventually is going to appoint on the recommendations of the teachers' college—specifically the University of Toronto and then the other universities that are in sort of another class—The Department of Education, the Ontario teachers' federation, the trustees of Ontario, and a group representing the directors of education, the superintendents of education, the inspectors and the various officers of administration throughout the province.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that this group of people control education very specifically and they must have some sort of an organization through which they can speak directly to the Minister and advise him and give their comments on his proposals; but for them to run the institute of research is a retrograde proposal on the part of the government. We have to think of the vested interests that they in fact represent. It would be possible to list a large number of important areas that should be investigated by this research institute which really will be closed to them, because at least one member of the board of governors is going to object violently.

I could think of an investigation into the teachers' professional organizations themselves. Perhaps at some later date the institute would like to look into the role played by the Minister of Education in the development of policy regarding educational television. This would be closed to them. They might want to look in detail into the authorization and writing of text books and how this might be improved in Ontario. We are certainly going to be spending tremendous sums of public money in this regard and we would want it to be as effective as possible.

It is quite possible that because of the constitution of the board of governors of the institute for educational research they will not be free to carry out the type of investigations and research that we would expect of any organization that we are going to subsidize so heavily as we are asked to subsidize this particular one.

There is one other qualification dealing with the board of governors that has to do with the fact that they would be residents of Ontario. I feel that this is a provincial approach in the worst sense. It will mean that we will not have the advantage of the views of those outside of our province and perhaps outside of our country on the direction in which research might take in our province. With the sums that are available and with the breadth of vision—

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, I will make some observations a little later, but if he reads the bill carefully, while it says: "persons who are resident in Ontario," which can include this group of lay people who are not associated with the professional organization, which I think would very adequately cover the point my hon. friend has raised. There is nothing in here to preclude the possibility of appointments of personnel from outside the jurisdiction. There is nothing in this bill that prohibits this.

Mr. Nixon: These people are not residents in the province of Ontario. I may misunderstand the meaning of the Act; and I know that elsewhere in it, at least in the hon. Minister's introductory remarks, there is an indication that he, too, realizes the importance of getting different views from other jurisdictions. I would just like to emphasize the importance of this; an educational research institute must have its windows open to the whole world, otherwise it is going to be fifth rate and useless—

Hon. Mr. Davis: We expect to get—

Mr. Nixon: —and spend its millions of dollars on examining what colour chalk should be used or something like that, something that could be very well done without this elaborate organization. I feel that we would look forward to the direction of this organization being partly in the hands of those who would come to us from outside of the province of Ontario, who, I suppose, would then be residents of Ontario, but at least people who would have had experience in the educational systems of Europe—France and England particularly—from the United States and from these jurisdictions whose views would be so useful as far as the development of our own education system is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Davis: There is nothing in here to prevent this at all.

Mr. Singer: The use of the word “resident” seems to.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I did not expect that I would have to explain the bill to a member of the legal profession but if you read it very closely, as the hon. member for Downsview would, there is nothing in here that says that all these people have to be residents of the province of Ontario; if you read it carefully.

Mr. Singer: I rely on my hon. friend’s advice.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister is rather adept at the type of comment that he has just made, and we will pass this by simply by reiterating the necessity of having the broadest possible view in the operation and direction of this research institute.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I should point out that in my statement I refer to the fact that they will be looking for actual administrative personnel from outside the jurisdiction to be participating in this particular instance.

Mr. Nixon: The second principle we would be dealing with in this bill has to do with the establishment of a new educational institution. It is referred to as a college and, of course, this has a broad meaning, but in a sense we are asked to charter a degree-granting institution.

It has been made clear that the authority for the granting of these degrees in the beginning would come through the charter of the University of Toronto, but the fact still remains that the institution will not be conducting its affairs under the academic umbrella of stability the university would be able to provide. There are too many educationists already who have been successful in a number of fields, had their success recognized by a university in this province or elsewhere, and been granted honorary degrees with high-sounding names, and they set themselves up with the title of doctor—and I suppose even the hon. Minister himself could do this if he were not such a modest man, having received similar degrees.

But I know that there are people who are in a position to advise him, working in his own department, who are quite proud of the fact that they can put this appendage to their title; and there is a feeling among many people associated with education that, as soon as you get sort of a quasi-independent, college-type institution, which is independent of a university, you are going to get third-rate academics who are going to reduce the level we must have in the institution proposed in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, normally in any academic institution there is a board of governors, as is proposed here; and, associated with the same institution, an independent academic senate. This bill calls for the setting up of an academic council which is going to be directly responsible to the board of governors and, in fact, through them, directly responsible to the Minister. The powers and duties of this academic council are prescribed by the governors. I would say that this is very much opposed to the general academic traditions in this jurisdiction, and in most others. The fact that the appointment of the people who are going to control our research is going to come from a Minister of the Crown rather than from an independent academic authority is something that really puts the whole institution in some question, and—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I was just wondering if the hon. member knows how the board of governors, for instance, at the University of Toronto—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it would be better if the Minister would let the member complete his remarks, and then reply to his remarks at the end.

Hon. Mr. Davis: All right.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would submit to you, sir, that the control of staff and their duties, and their appointment, must be independent of the Minister. The group which does make this appointment must be powerful enough to set the standard of the courses that would be given; they should have the power to control the curriculum and to make the final decision on the granting of degrees. But it appears that the academic council proposed in this bill is no academic body at all.

I have just about finished my remarks, but I would like to say that the responsibility of the director is nowhere defined in the bill. I realize that we are not setting up a new university. If we were, his position—the parallel to it—would be that of president, and his responsibilities would be very carefully defined. We can only assume here that he is being given a blank cheque to do as he wishes, or that he is in constant contact with the real director of the organization who is sitting opposite; and this is something that we must avoid at all costs, if it is going to have an independent existence, and if real research is going to be possible.

The hon. Minister has referred to a similar institution in London, England. I think he should cast his view to another institution of academic and educational research, that is the graduate school of education at Harvard, one which does enjoy the protection of the normal functions of a university, and which is not subject to political direction in any way. This umbrella of academic and intellectual responsibilities to which I have been referring is needed for this institute as well and, I submit, is not found in this bill. Its absence may doom the work, done in the new institute, to mediocrity. I trust not, but the danger is there.

Mr. Speaker, we have needed an organization for this purpose, properly financed, in the province of Ontario, for years. I hope that the hon. Minister can improve the basis of the organization, as it is described in this bill, so that we can look forward to its implementation with confidence.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I would like perhaps in just two or three minutes, to reply to a great deal of this—

Mr. MacDonald: I have some comments to make also.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

Motion to adjourn, Mr. Robarts, agreed to	2928

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MAY 13, 1965

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate we were engaged in before six o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The 27th order; House in committee of supply.

Mr. Speaker: Before the House goes into the committee of supply, I have an important announcement for certain members who park their cars at the front of the main building, to the south.

Tonight there are going to be a couple of large cranes operating there to raise the new flagpole, and all members have been advised to move their cars or they may be towed away. I have been asked to inform those members who park their cars there, unless you want them towed away, you had better move them this evening.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, is there any significance, in your direction or suggestion to the hon. members, having to do with the possibility of a snap vote?

Mr. Speaker: None whatsoever.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Or a snap election?

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 207:

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): Mr. Chairman, under vote 207, I would like to say a few words on a matter which is of concern to the area that I represent and, I have no doubt, is of concern to other sections of the province.

I would like to point out, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), that what I have to say is not meant in any way in the form of criticism—although it would not be the first time that I have criticized either—but is simply said to urge that some consideration be given to the thoughts that I would like to express. This is the matter of juvenile and family court judges.

In this day and age when there is so much discussion on the problem of juvenile delinquency, I feel that there is a great need for emphasis on the juvenile and family court judge. Unlike the civil or criminal courts, where cases may be disposed of in a peremptory fashion, the juvenile and family court cases require careful and painstaking consideration.

In the juvenile court there is great concern for the proper development of the immature personality. Intensive research into the background of each case is required, if a proper disposition is to be made. In a family court, the decision of the judge not only affects the lives of the marriage partners involved but their children as well, and the right decision is extremely important to a society where the family unit is a hallowed institution.

At the present time, in Ontario county, we have part-time juvenile and family court judges who can devote only two half-days, and sometimes one whole day, a week to these courts. Because of this part-time situation, there is a considerable backlog of cases, and the important counselling and advice so necessary in this juvenile field of first offenders must, of necessity, be very brief. The time allotment militates against lengthy deliberations and extensive problem analysis. The present judges are committed to other duties connected with their full-time occupations and do not have the time to engage in research. A full-time judge could hold court more frequently, he could spend the necessary time in considering the merits of the case from the background information; and also he could acquaint himself with the counsel and information introduced by modern authorities.

Recently our county judge emphasized to me the importance of proper counselling during the juvenile's first appearance in court. "Proper counselling," he said, "would go a long way towards eliminating further trouble in later years and I would not have this same juvenile appearing before me later on."

Under the present situation we find The Attorney General's Department appoints and sets salaries for the full-time juvenile and family court judge, with the municipality being responsible for the entire salary payment. There is undoubtedly a real need for a full-time juvenile and family court judge in our county. This is, I think, Mr. Attorney General, a recognized fact. But the large increase in salary for a full-time judge presents, to start off with, somewhat of a deterrent and also there is a very strong feeling that The Attorney General's Department should be fully responsible for this matter. I feel we have reached the point in many areas of the province where the juvenile and family court judge become equally as important as other facets of our justice administration. It is no longer a part-time operation, and I would urge the hon. Attorney General to give serious consideration to the possibility of his department accepting the full and complete responsibility for the appointments in this area of administration.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I commend the hon. member for Oshawa for his most important and lucid remarks. I think the suggestions he has put forward have very great merit and I think they emphasize a problem that exists here in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto.

I do not think I need to refresh the hon. Attorney General's mind about the great problem that exists in Metropolitan Toronto, particularly when the council of that municipality came to pass their last budget. They were looking, as politicians do so often, to methods of reducing the tax rate, and one of the points where they decided to chop was in the estimate for juvenile and family courts. If my memory serves me correctly, they decided that they were going to knock off some $100,000 from the estimate of that court.

The hon. Attorney General would not have had to read too many of the local papers to recognize the universal condemnation with which that move was greeted. Every newspaper in this city wrote very condemnatory articles concerning this matter. The Telegram, for instance, said: "Help These Lives"; and in an editorial dated March 1 goes on in this tone:

Perhaps senior Judge Lorne Stewart of the Metropolitan Toronto juvenile and family court omitted to present his case forcefully enough.

They conclude with saying this:

Where the money required by the department for some material, ordinary project—

I suppose they mean things like sewers or sidewalks or art centres or something like that:

—the executive committee's desire to economize would cause no grievance. But these are lives we are talking about, children and young people and families who are desperately in need of assistance.

The difference is $101,000. Surely Metro council can find the means of providing it.

The Globe and Mail had an editorial entitled "Budget Before Children." It goes on and says just about the same thing in a different way and makes its point just as effectively.

The Toronto Daily Star had a similar editorial. There were many letters to the editor. With those sentiments—the sentiments expressed in these editorials, the sentiments expressed in the letters to the editor, the sentiments expressed by my hon. friend from Oshawa—I find myself in complete agreement. The hon. Attorney General is nodding, and I hope he is in complete agreement.

Now, along the way there was a news clipping headed: "Wishart's Men Probe Family Court Needs," and I gather from this that the hon. Attorney General has this problem under investigation.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): I think I made a statement on this in the debate last night.

Mr. Singer: Yes. Well, as we go along through these estimates, the hon. Attorney General, in his very pleasant and very helpful way, has indicated that he is in agreement with many of the suggestions which have come from this side of the House, and that he is looking into them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Singer: My hon. friend is applauding—and I think the hon. Attorney General's sentiments are worthy of applause provided that we are going to get some action. I am hoping that we are going to get some action.

Is the juvenile and family court in Toronto going to be able to function in the way that it should, in the way that the hon. Attorney General wants it to, in the way that my hon. friend from Oshawa wants it to, without this additional money? Is not the solution, Mr. Chairman, the solution put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa: that the province should recognize that the whole field of the administration of justice really knows no municipal boundaries, knows no county boundaries, is a problem of all the people of Ontario, and should become the financial concern and the financial responsibility of the province of Ontario?

I need not point out, Mr. Chairman, that the select committee on The Municipal Act, in the latest Act, unanimously, on two occasions—and it is a committee consisting of members of all the parties—recommended that just this course be taken. I think, when problems like this come up—when it is apparent to me in any event, and to the hon. member for Oshawa, and, I would think, to most hon. members of the House, that the situation in our juvenile courts and in our family courts is not being adequately looked after—that we need an immediate solution. And the solution is apparently not in leaving the problem with the municipalities; it is not working well enough.

I do not know if the hon. Attorney General wants to reply on this particular point. I have one more major point at this time that I want to emphasize, but if the hon. Attorney General wants to reply on this one, I will gladly hear him.

The second point, Mr. Chairman, that I want to make is in regard to court space. I do not think it is necessary—I have referred earlier in this debate on these estimates, and in my general remarks, and in the Throne debate, to various articles, various reports and so on, about the real shortage of court space that exists in all our courts: magistrates' courts, division courts, county courts, the supreme court, the piling up of the lists, the inadequacy of our courtroom facilities. I have quoted from Magistrate Klein's report—and I hasten to add, quickly, before the hon. Attorney General reminds me, that he did give me Magistrate Klein's report and that was why I was able to quote from it so authoritatively—and Mr. Justice Gale's speech, Mr. Justice Gale's remarks to the grand jury, and that sort of thing.

In each jurisdiction for which these gentlemen are responsible, it is obvious that we have quite a situation in our court facilities. There are steps being taken in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, for instance, to build a new courthouse, but it has come to my attention—I do not know whether it has come to the hon. Attorney General's attention or not—that this building, which is not even as yet completed, is not going to be nearly big enough.

There are not going to be enough courtrooms available to properly handle the volume of cases that are presently before the courts. Now what do we do about this? The hon. Attorney General says that he is looking into the shortage of magistrates' courts' facilities. The responsibility perhaps is not his—it is shared with the various municipalities and that sort of thing.

There will be a new courtroom; it will be more comfortable; the facilities will be more pleasant and the atmosphere, generally, will be better. But the fact is—without going through the long statistics about the number of cases on the list in the supreme court, the length of time it takes to get to trial in the county court, the lengthy adjournments that have to take place in magistrates' court—the fact is, and it must be obvious to anyone who has studied this question at all, that we have a serious crisis facing us insofar as making available the physical facilities to properly handle the cases that are ready to come before our courts.

What do we do about this? I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is not sufficient for the hon. Attorney General to say that he agrees. I submit it is not sufficient for the hon. Attorney General to say that in certain areas—Metropolitan Toronto—there is a new courthouse being built. I submit it is not sufficient for him to say that he has talked to his colleague, the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell), and in due course we are going to get some more money. It may not be this year, but if it is not this year, it will be next year or the year after. I submit that we are in such a serious position at this point that the hon. Attorney General should be prepared, at least on this issue, to come before us and say that he is about to undertake a crash programme to deal with this backlog.

One of the administrative efforts that perhaps he might want to undertake is not only a careful study, but perhaps the initiation of an appointment system of trials into the trial procedure of the supreme court. This sort of system has been used for quite a while in the county court of the county of York. I am certain that my hon. friend is aware that when trials come on the counsel between themselves, and in co-operation with the county court clerk of the county of York, arrange and agree upon dates for trial and postcards are sent out and there is reasonable certainty to the profession and to the parties to the actions and to the witnesses and to all those concerned that on June 10 next the case of Smith versus Jones will be scheduled to be heard.

There is perhaps a criticism of this in that on occasion a county court judge, having had a docket of three or four cases fixed for that day, suddenly finds that they have all been settled. To my mind such a criticism is not a valid one, because I think our courts are performing a reasonable function when the immediate advent of a trial date forces the parties together and gets them to settle without the necessity of taking up the time of the court.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): You are speaking out of both sides of your mouth at once.

Mr. Singer: No I am not. I am suggesting, Mr. Minister of Labour—if you will listen to me, if you will listen carefully—I am suggesting that if such an appointment system was inaugurated in the supreme court—and it is not going to be as easy in the supreme court as it is in the county court—even though on occasions a supreme court judge might have nothing on before him that day, at least if you were the plaintiff's solicitor in a particular action and you had a case fixed for that day, you would know that by the tenth of June you would either have to be ready to go on for trial or you would have to speak to my hon. friend from Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), who is on the other side, and work out a settlement.

In any event, at that point there would be something approaching finality, either you would agree to agree, or you would agree to disagree and you would go on into court. I am suggesting that this criticism, and it has only been a minor criticism, of a county court judge on an occasional day not having anything before him because five cases have been settled, is a good thing and advances our administration of justice. In our present system the cases pile up and are shifted from list to list and put on the ready list, and it may take a week or ten days or a month before actually you know you are going to go on for trial. And there is always another chance that maybe there can be a remand, or maybe there can be an adjournment.

This delays, seriously delays, our administration of justice and there have been, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will understand that these are matters—and I speak as a lawyer—these are matters within the competence of the chief justice of the trial division of the supreme court, and they are matters within the competence of the chief or senior county court judge in any district.

The hon. member raised the question about settlement being reached and therefore the case comes off the list; or you come close to settlement, so it comes off the list.

Quite frankly, how can anyone, whether it be the government or the senior county court judge of any country, or the chief justice of the trial division, reach any degree of finality so that you can approach what you are saying in an exact fashion? I suggest that the exactitude which you are suggesting is not available, either to this government or any other government; nor is it necessarily our responsibility.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, with great respect to the hon. Minister of Labour, I think he is quite wrong. I think there is a real responsibility on this government, which is charged with the administration of justice in this province, to explore every avenue of expediting the matters that are standing before our courts.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, right on that point, may I say this—

Mr. Singer: If the hon. Minister of Labour wants to talk, he can talk later.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let me make my statement—

Mr. Singer: No, you have made a couple of statements—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You have been speaking for about a month.

Mr. Singer: I may be speaking for maybe another two months, but I am still speaking now; and when I am finished then the hon. Minister of Labour can—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Will you not let me make my comment—

Mr. Singer: I just did; and I want to finish my point before the hon. Minister of Labour gets up and finishes his point. He has as much right as anybody else to make a statement.

Mr. Chairman, I have the floor and I am not yielding it to the hon. Minister of Labour.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You are not yielding it? Fine!

Well, it suggests the uncertainty—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor and I wish you would call the hon. Minister of Labour to order.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, well, I will relinquish the floor—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I wish you would call the hon. Minister of Labour to order. Only one of us can have the floor at a time.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I relinquish the floor—

Mr. Singer: You do not relinquish it. I had it and I have got it back again and I am not relinquishing it to you.

Mr. Chairman, will you call the hon. Minister of Labour to order?

An hon. member: Filibustering, that is all you are doing.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, in relinquishing the floor—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, will you call the hon. Minister of Labour to order?

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Who was on first?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I am not advancing any further argument—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, would you call the hon. Minister of Labour to order, please!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: And in not advancing any further argument, the position taken—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, would you call the hon. Minister of Labour to order, please!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: —to support the allegations—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, will you call the hon. Minister of Labour to order, or will you not?

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You want to talk all the time; but you will not let anybody else say a word, even in—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, are you going to call the hon. Minister of Labour to order or are you going to let him make a continuing nuisance of himself as he is doing?

An hon. member: What about the cut and thrust of debate?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, it is completely—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson)—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, is it necessary that this come from the House leader, whom after all, we look to as being a symbol of dignity in the conduct of proceedings of the House?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We talk about dignity, we want—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, this is ludicrous!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We want the truth about what is going on in the courts of this province, not a political accusation from the hon. member for Downsview.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, can you not control the leader of the House?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): This debate is getting too spirited.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, not so.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): It is going to be an interesting evening, I see.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Throw it, if you have to, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, it is my opinion that there is a real responsibility on those charged with administration of justice in this province to do everything in their power to expedite the handling of cases that come before our courts, whether they be magistrates' courts, or county courts, or division courts, or the supreme court or the court of appeal. I am suggesting to the hon. Attorney General that a system has been worked out, not with exactitude as my friend the hon. Minister of Labour suggested I said, but with reasonable facility that works within the county court of the county of York. By the appointment system—albeit it is not perfect—by the appointment system there has been evolved a method that has improved the procedure of cases through our county courts.

It has been suggested that such a system could be explored for use in the supreme court recognizing, Mr. Chairman, that in the supreme court such a system would not be as simple as it might be in the county courts. In the supreme court more important cases, more involved cases, are on the list for trial and many more things come into consideration. Trials in the supreme court are reasonably likely to last for longer periods than they do in the county courts. There is no exact way of telling whether a trial might go on for five days or ten days or two or three weeks. On the other hand, in the county court it is reasonable to assume that most trials will not last for more than a day or two or perhaps portions of days.

But I am suggesting that this type of investigation on the administrative level could and should well be undertaken by the proper officials of the hon. Attorney General's office in consultation. I am not suggesting that anyone in the hon. Attorney General's office is going to sit down and pound the table before the chief justice of Ontario and say, You must do this; but I do not think there would be anybody happier than the chief justice of Ontario if he had administrative advice which was going to show him how the whole procedure in front of his courts could be speeded up. This goes for every judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

What I am suggesting, sir, is that this sort of study and this sort of administrative know-how could and should immediately be put to work to advise those responsible, the chief justice of Ontario, the chief justice of the high court, how possibly better methods could be used to speed up these procedures.

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): Do you suggest that the executive should advise the judiciary?

Mr. Singer: Insofar as administrative procedures are concerned, yes; that is exactly what I mean. My hon. friend from Forest Hill makes a point, and I would draw to his particular attention that while the appointment of judges, the control of criminal law and that sort of matter is the responsibility of those people in Ottawa, the federal government, the problem of the administration of justice—as my hon. friend well knows because he is not only a good, but a very careful, student of our constitutional history—the administration of justice is the responsibility of the provincial government; and in this province, our friend, the hon. Attorney General is charged with that responsibility.

He is charged with providing courtroom facilities with stenographers, with accommodation and all that sort of thing. It is part of his responsibility, certainly, to make the facilities so available, and to help to evolve such a system that the administration of justice and the control of the administrative procedures are as well done as they can possibly be, so that those gentlemen who are our supreme court judges will be free from these worries and will be able to sit in their judicial wisdom and make all the proper decisions.

I am not suggesting that the hon. Attorney General go and tell the chief justice how he should listen to a case, or what evidence he should accept. I am suggesting that the hon. Attorney General should move from the shoulders of the chief justice of Ontario the administrative problems which properly should not be the very great concern of the chief justice and his colleagues in the supreme court bench.

Mr. Dunlop: You just suggested that he bring some know-how to the courts.

An hon. member: That is just a pious speech.

Mr. Singer: Well, I am rather surprised—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: I am rather surprised at the two hon. Ministers here in the front row. My hon. friend from Forest Hill, I think has a much more reasonable approach; but the two Ministers here, the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) and the hon. Minister of Labour—both of whom are lawyers and both of whom, before they entered the Cabinet benches, when they were in private practice, must have been as frustrated as any lawyer about our court procedures which delay at very great length the trial of actions which were pending before our courts—I would think these two gentlemen would be amongst the foremost—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You are not suggesting any solution to the problem that you are raising. This is the point. They have all been considered by the law society, by the judges themselves and by the hon. Minister of Justice in Ottawa.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, can you not keep that man quiet?

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You are talking out of both sides of your mouth at once.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on occasion the hon. Minister of Labour exhibits great knowledge about certain matters, but what he is talking about tonight I am sure he does not know either.

To continue what I was talking about, I say that the hon. Attorney General's department has the responsibility to do everything in its power to improve the administrative procedures in our courts, and I do not think he is doing enough about it.

Mr. Chairman, there was a suggestion advanced in the editorial columns of the Toronto Daily Star a few days, or a few months ago, about the need for more magistrate's court facilities; and the Toronto Daily Star comments on Magistrate Klein's report. They comment on the remarks by Crown Attorney Henry Bull, who is the Crown attorney here in Metropolitan Toronto. Henry Bull is quoted as saying to the Metropolitan Toronto executive committee that overcrowding is so bad we are just barely fending off a Royal commission into the whole administration of justice in Metropolitan Toronto.

Now that throws the challenge into the teeth of the hon. Minister of Labour who says this is none of our business. Henry Bull, who is a knowledgeable man, who is an able man—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

Mr. Singer: Oh, Mr. Chairman!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I did not say it was none of our business; I said that your proposal had no merit.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I am really not too interested in what the hon. Minister of Labour has to say tonight, because he is doing it, obviously, in a disorganized and in an annoying way. If he wants to get up and reply after I am finished that is up to him, but in the meantime could you please keep him quiet and let me finish with my remarks.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): We should have two Houses, one for each.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, this problem is of sufficient concern to Henry Bull—who is the Crown attorney for Metropolitan Toronto and a gentleman, I think, who was appointed to this position by my friend, the hon. Attorney General—to have him, apparently, make this sort of remark: That the problem of overcrowding in our courts is appalling, that the overcrowding is so bad that we are just barely fending off a Royal commission under the administration of justice in Metropolitan Toronto.

Then this editorial goes on to suggest, instead of arguments that take place between Chief Magistrate Klein and Mr. Allen, who is the chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto council, that perhaps the provincial government should take certain steps in this regard.

If the provincial government were to appoint more magistrates, Metro would be obliged to find more courtrooms for them. This space could be found by renting accommodation in office buildings. These temporary courtrooms may even be necessary after the magistrates move into the old city hall, if the increase in case loads during the next few years is as heavy as anticipated. That is why planning should begin now, either for a single massive courtroom building in downtown Toronto, or a series of smaller courts in the suburbs. This concept certainly should not wait until 1970, as apparently the mayor of the city of Toronto suggests.

Meanwhile—

and we have talked of this aspect of it before, too:

—men and women who cannot raise bail, people who may subsequently be proven innocent, are prisoners in the Don jail waiting to be tried. It is up to Queen's Park to appoint enough magistrates to hear their cases quickly. It is the responsibility of Metro to rent enough courtroom space so the new magistrates will have a place to work.

I suggest, sir, that this crisis is not unique only in the province of Ontario, and I am certain that my friend, the hon. Attorney General did not miss the front-page news stories in today's papers dealing with the way his counterpart in the province of Quebec—Mr. Wagner, the Attorney General of that province, who has held his office, I think, for no longer time than my friend—has begun to embark on some of these problems. And in a front-page story, and I have the story here in front of me—it was in the Toronto Telegram and in the Globe and Mail this morning: "Quebec Lawyers, Judges To Ease The Jam." And, apparently, what they have done in Quebec, with the co-operation of the Bar association of that province, is to recruit on a temporary basis some 93 lawyers who have volunteered to tackle, as special arbitrators, the backlog of 17,000 civil cases.

I am not suggesting that the crisis is quite that bad in Ontario but it is bad enough; and I am suggesting, if the hon. Attorney General was anxious to take on this problem, that he should be prepared to embark upon unusual methods to clear up the immediate crisis, the immediate backlog of cases before our courts. He should seriously consider renting space, he should seriously—well, not seriously—he should be prepared to announce, perhaps at this time, that for the time being, until some of these court buildings catch up, until his colleague, the hon. Minister of Public Works is able to put into his budget enough dollars to build enough buildings, he would rent space.

He should make arrangements to run courts through the summer. There should be more magistrates appointed. The services of the lawyers of the province could perhaps be called upon in a manner similar to that being tried now in Quebec; and I would suggest that if the Attorney General wanted to address himself immediately to this serious crisis which exists in all our courts, this is the sort of programme we should be hearing about. But I regret very much that we have not heard anything more from the Attorney General to the effect that he agrees that this is a serious problem, that the matter is under very careful study, and that very soon there will be action. Perhaps tonight he can tell us what he is going to do about the crisis in our courts.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, first of all I do not accept the word "crisis" at all. It is certainly not in anything like the situation the hon. member for Downsview has compared it with—the situation in Quebec. I will start at the latter part of his remarks.

As I read the article in the Globe and Mail this morning, there was a backlog of something over 17,000 cases. When Mr. Justice Gale made his remarks a few weeks ago at the opening of the court, he referred to something more than 2,000 of a backlog.

Mr. Singer: I said it was not as bad as it was in the past.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And he said we need additional judges; and the judges' committee requested two additional supreme court judges. I presented to this Legislature a bill, an amendment to The Judicature Act, asking for those judges. This Legislature passed it at this session, and I have sent it on to Ottawa. The Minister of Justice has acknowledged it and he has assured me the appointments are available and pending, if they have not at this moment been made.

The provision, incidentally, allows what is done in Quebec to be done here, as described in this article. The appointment of lawyers as judges may be a very sensible thing. Certainly, when you get into a state of affairs such as our friends in Quebec have, of 17,000 cases untried and waiting, then I think it is time they did do something desperate. Maybe it is not a desperate thing to appoint lawyers as judges and give them some training in that field, but in any event that is in the Quebec civil code and we just do not immediately have available, at our fingertips, a law or an authority to do that. We would have to get federal authority, and ask the federal Parliament, which has the prerogative of appointment of supreme and county court judges—

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): That is not impossible.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, it is not impossible, but it is sometimes very slow to get action out of the federal Parliament.

Mr. Singer: Have you asked?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I have not asked.

Mr. Trotter: Well, what do you expect?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But I say, we have not got that at our fingertips today; and I am not sure if the federal Parliament would give to this province the right which resides in the hands of the Quebec Legislature and in the hands of the Quebec Bar by virtue of the civil code.

Mr. Trotter: You do not know, if you do not ask.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, we can ask if it becomes necessary—

Mr. Singer: We are at least as important—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —but let me tell you something further.

An hon. member: The federal government does not think so.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Justice Gale, as I have recounted, said: There is this backlog and we need two judges. This was the recommendation of the judges' committee, and we have got them.

Let me tell you something further, Mr. Chairman. In the mid-1950s—I cannot give you the year, I did not practise law in Toronto at that time but I think perhaps the hon. member for Downsview did, and perhaps he was one of those concerned and perhaps one of those involved, I do not know. This is not any damning indictment I am about to make, but I am aware of the fact that at that time Mr. Justice McRuer, who was then chief justice, said:

I am concerned at the backlog of cases on the court lists and I am going to do something about it. I will set a day and I want these cases on then and I want the lawyers and the parties ready to proceed.

He brought the court together and I think I can say that it was to his disgust that the lawyers and the parties were not ready to proceed. Perhaps the hon. member for Downsview recalls—

Mr. Singer: I was not one of those.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, but you recall the situation.

Mr. Singer: Yes, I recall.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And Mr. Justice McRuer, the chief justice, did his best and then set a peremptory date, as I recall it, and said: "Set down your cases and get on with them." And this did not succeed; they asked for adjournments and I believe he went so far as to say: "These cases will be struck off the list if you do not proceed." And they still would not proceed and the whole proceedings were abandoned.

Mr. MacDonald: You mean the lawyer was defying the court?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, my point is this: When you say there are 2,400 cases on the list do not, for one moment, be led into the thought that those people are able to proceed or that—

Mr. Bryden: Many people have been waiting for months and are anxious to proceed.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —or that 80 per cent of them want to proceed; or that if you said, "Be ready next week," that they would be there to proceed.

Mr. Singer: Some of them have waited two years.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, and if you put them on the list next month they would not be there to go on. This has been proven, this has been tried, this has been shown. Many cases are commenced with the idea of forcing a settlement and the plaintiff does not want to go on; and you have to get them right up to the trough—up to the fence, rather, I should say—you have to get them right up to the jump before they will settle. So I am not fooled by a recital of some 2,000 cases on the list.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let me bring you up to date. Last year, 1964, there were, on the civil jury list in Ontario, on the supreme court list, 1,545 cases set down for trial; 197 were tried; 593 were settled. There was none struck out. There remain 755 not tried. And I venture, from my own experience, from the experience I have recited and the experience that lawyers generally know, that if you set those 755 down and gave them six weeks to be ready you would not get ten per cent of them ready to go on to trial.

Mr. Singer: That is no answer at all.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, it is experience. Let me say this on the matter of courtroom space. The hon. members of this House are aware that a new courthouse is being built in Toronto, that it will provide, I think it is, 21 courtrooms, 11 supreme court rooms—these are additional facilities—and ten county courtrooms. This is the obligation of the municipality of Metro Toronto and the county of York, and they are building the courthouse. It is well under way, and you can see it rising downtown; it will provide 21 additional courtrooms. I regret that they did not start a year or two earlier, but I think it is a very exemplary effort, something they should be commended for, that space is becoming available.

With respect to magistrates' courts, what is the situation? We have been negotiating with the city of Toronto—again I am not sure who claims full ownership, I believe Metro Toronto—for the old city hall. While we cannot give an assurance that we are going to obtain what we are asking, I think it is fairly definite, and I am quite in a position to say, that it would appear that there will be—that the westerly portion of that city hall will be made available for magistrates' courts—70,000 square feet of space. I am not certain how many courtrooms we reckon that will provide—perhaps some 15 to 20 courtrooms for magistrates' courts.

These things are definite; they are approaching accomplishment; and it is something to our credit that this is being accomplished. We are not unmindful of the situation but I do not think we are in a crisis at the moment. Only one judge, so far as I have been able to gather—and the hon. member for Downsview says it comes to his ears that the new courthouse is not going to be adequate—at least I read where one judge expressed a doubt that they had built it quite big enough; but I think it is a fine addition to the courtroom facilities of this county and metropolitan city.

I am reminded that there is also an addition being made to Osgoode Hall; this will provide a very considerable amount of additional space, I do not know just how much.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Attorney General if he now plans to leave the subject of courtroom facilities?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I do. I was going to—or I can come back to it if you wish—but I would just like, while I am on my feet, to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Oshawa, echoed by the hon. member for Downsview. I think, yesterday evening, I had expressed views which are very much in agreement with those expressed by the hon. member; at least certainly an awareness of the desirability, in my view, of the province, taking a larger part in the responsibility for the provision of juvenile and family court facilities in that whole area. As I stated then, this matter has been not only considered but discussed and it is very seriously under consideration.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, there was one matter I wished to bring before this House. Last February the former Attorney General (Mr. Cass) got some favourable press over the fact that he said he was going to bring in legislation in order to protect the consumer against the “fast-buck” operators we have here in the province. I think various chambers of commerce and better business bureaus in Canada have said that Canadians get milked for about $50 million a year. Bearing in mind the size of this province and the money in this province, it is fair to assume that a great proportion of that $50 million is wasted right here in the province of Ontario.

I would like to know if the hon. Attorney General has any intention of doing anything about this in the immediate future? I realize another former Attorney General, the present hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), was going to do something about the drunks in our courts. Nothing happened. Then the immediate predecessor—

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): A lot happened.

Mr. Trotter: Nothing happened; I have seen the courts. The immediate predecessor told us what they are going to do about protecting the public against crooks in business, and yet nothing happened but, in the meantime, you milk the publicity out of these headlines as much as you can, giving the mirage that you are actually doing something. I admit the present hon. Attorney General can be called a new man at the job, but he has been there now for over a year with the same civil servants; and if this legislation is contemplated I cannot understand why it has not been before this House.

For example, even quoting from a relatively conservative paper, the Windsor Star; when they were talking about the legislation they thought was going to come forth about protecting the consumer, they said this:

The Hon. Fred M. Cass, Attorney General, promises to introduce into the Legislature a measure to protect consumers from cheaters. Such protection is long overdue.

And then they conclude by saying:

The legislation should be as strong as possible but even that will not be enough. Many victims are old people, widows, and so on, who have not the money or the know-how—and incidentally, that is very important, the know-how:

—of how to take the culprits to court. There should be a government agency to which people can take their complaints if they think they are cheated. Then, if the complaints are justified, the government can take over the prosecution. The fact such an agency existed would make cheaters take second thoughts. It is one thing to swindle a widow or some other innocent individual and get away with it. It is something quite different if the miscreant knows that government is likely to take him to court.

I advocate that something can be done about stopping a lot of these racketeers—who, incidentally, in many cases, act within the law, or even when they have broken the law it is so difficult to catch them because the individual who has suffered does not have the money or, as this editorial said, the know-how. But to point out that it is not a pious hope I want to say again to this House that what I have mentioned they have done in the state of New York has worked very successfully. It has worked in the state of New Jersey. In the state of New York they set up a bureau of consumer fraud and protection. They have brought many people to court and the very fact that they are there is like a policeman on the beat: The very fact he is walking down the street keeps many a crook away. It is long overdue that this province do something in a big way.

I have, on various occasions, gone over this business of the magazine salesmen and the various rackets that have been used—how they force the last buck they can out of some 80-year-old woman who does not know what to do. And there are many instances where the same rackets are perpetuated. First one company starts up in Montreal and then, a few years later, it changes its name and comes back to this city; it bilks the people of Montreal and Toronto. In many cases it is a matter of jurisdiction where the Attorney General of Quebec, the hon. Attorney General of this province, and the government in Ottawa have to get together to see that something is done.

I mentioned, I think in the Budget debate, about a racket called "the perpetual energy invention," where they try to sell a radio that is worth 98 cents for $5 through the mails. I think Ron Haggart, a couple of weeks ago, had picked up this racket again. This type of thing has been pulled on Canadians, particularly in Ontario. I want to emphasize it really hits a large area like Toronto, and the larger centres like Montreal, because they can inundate the population quickly, grab their money out of the mail and beat it across the border. Most of them are from the United States. Again, it is something that is the responsibility of the hon. Attorney General; it certainly is under the administration of justice. I would like to know if the government really intends to do something, or are we going to have another put-off job like we had from the hon. Attorney General's predecessor?

Has the hon. Attorney General any remarks to make on it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, yes, I have some remarks. This whole matter has been the subject of study by the select committee of this House on consumer credit under the chairmanship of the hon. member for St. David (Mr. Price)—

Mr. Bryden: That is only one phase of it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is a pretty broad study. We referred a good many things to that committee and I anticipate that the report of that committee will be tabled in this House before the end of this session; probably this month. We are expecting it. I would think that the hon. members would expect, in the light of that study by a select committee of the House, that we should, knowing that the report is about to be tabled very shortly, wait for it in order to implement it into legislation. That is one thing.

We have our anti-racket squad of the Ontario provincial police very actively watching and investigating these things, and every complaint that is received is referred to them. We have had prosecutions. Recently I recall the art fraud cases where prosecutions were carried forward by the Attorney General's department; the aluminum siding cases recently. These things we are doing but I believe that much of the answer will be found in the report of the committee on consumer credit, and the legislation which we can then initiate and introduce to carry out its recommendations, which I think will be wide and ample enough to take care of the matter.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, for example, here is somebody saying, "Now, run your car half on gas, half on air." This racket has been pushed for ten years, every once in a while. That has nothing at all to do with consumer credit. I admit consumer credit is part of the problem but when they try to sell you perpetual energy and tell you your car can run on air, and some of this stuff, this has nothing to do with consumer credit. I am saying that $50 million is bilked from the people in this country—this comes from the chambers of commerce—it has nothing to do with consumer credit. That is another phase.

Consumer credit may even be worse, but I say to you that if you had a consumer protection bureau you could at least help the public to a large degree because the only firms which can really move quickly are when large firms, like what happened recently—Remington Rand sees a fraudulent person using its name, it has the know-how and the ability to move in quickly and it protects itself as well as the public; but a lot of these other firms are not able as quickly—

Mr. Bryden: What about the "Kelso Roberts' Used Car Dealers"?

Mr. Trotter: Or these small operators can bilk the small people. So again I say I often wonder what the former Attorney General had in mind when he said he was going to introduce this legislation, because the former Attorney General was not waiting for this report on credit.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could I ask the hon. member what he spoke of a moment ago, the example of the advertising that you can run your car half on air and half on gasoline or whatever? This is not consumer credit we are talking about.

Mr. Trotter: No, that is what I am pointing out; that is what I am trying to tell you. You said you were waiting for the consumer credit report. I say a lot of it has nothing to do with consumer credit. These are rackets.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You just mentioned—yes, all right. In one breath he mentions consumer credit and in the next breath—

Mr. Trotter: You brought it up.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let us distinguish.

Mr. Trotter: You brought up consumer credit, I did not. You started to befog the whole issue by talking about this committee report.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I will try to defog it, then.

Several hon. members: Unfog!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps this will help to clear the air. The example which the hon. member gave is purely a type of thing which is fraud, or a conspiracy to defraud somebody, and the remedy for that type of thing is found in the criminal code. You prosecute that type of thing and you do not need a new Act. I do not know how you are going to protect a consumer except to give him the right, if he is bilked, to take action by way of prosecution in the criminal courts or action in the civil courts to recover.

Mr. Trotter: If he can afford to.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Speak to your friends in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All right, then we have the legal aid coming for him, to help him with the legal side of it. We have the law there for him to take his remedy in the criminal court and in the civil court. Now what are we going to do, stand over him and make sure that the fellow does not bilk him?

Mr. Trotter: No.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is the only thing I know that you can do.

Mr. Trotter: I can give the hon. Attorney General a very practical suggestion. In New York again, where there are large cities, they have found that this bureau they set up is of great help.

Now, I admit nothing is guaranteed to work completely. There is probably a sucker born every minute, but at the same time, their consumer bureau to protect the public against fraud, in New York state under the Rockefeller administration, has done a great deal. I wish you would send a couple of your law officers down and talk to them to see what can be done.

Second, I would like to know this: What did the former Attorney General—after all, there are some of the same civil servants there—what did the former Attorney General have in mind when he said he was going, when he promised, to introduce into the Legislature a measure to protect consumers from cheaters?

He got a lot of headlines out of that; now what did he mean?

Mr. Bryden: It meant what it always means, that he wants to get headlines.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: One of the things he did was to suggest a Used Car Dealers' Act.

Mr. Trotter: That was one that came up on this occasion.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And that is in here now.

Mr. Trotter: Right, but that is the only one.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If my memory—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): You were against advertising restrictions.

Mr. Singer: No, all I wanted was an appeal in there, and you know that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, would you call the hon. member for Downsview to order?

Mr. Thompson: What about the other members?

Mr. Singer: I am just answering him.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If my memory serves me right, in response to the hon. member for Parkdale, I think there were amendments to The Mortgage Brokers Act, The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act—I am thinking from memory, but I know we did a number of things, just in this last year, for the protection of the consumer

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think one can agree that there has been some legislation enacted in the last few years which improved the position of the consumer vis-à-vis people who want to fleece him out of his hard-earned money. I think the problem in the situation is that there is no co-ordinated attack in this province. There are many crooks in the world, crooks who know how to stay within the law. The consumer is open to attack from a great many different angles, often on matters that are quite technical and really beyond his capacity to judge. I think this is the point that the hon. member for Parkdale was getting at. I would say, as far as this party is concerned, for at least eight of the last ten years we have had a resolution on the order paper proposing the establishment of a consumers' bureau in this province. I notice we have not got it on this year; we have given up, for the moment, trying to make the government see the rationality of such a proposition, but we will keep hammering away at it. We have come to the conclusion that a quicker way of doing it will be to turf you fellows out at the next election.

This country, and I am talking about the whole country or about the province of Ontario—whichever you wish—is miles behind other civilized countries on the whole question of consumer protection. Bureaus of the type that we proposed in our resolution, and that the hon. member for Parkdale was proposing a few minutes ago, exist in many jurisdictions of the United States. They do not solve the problem of protecting the consumer from his own stupidity in every single case, but they do a great deal to assist him in protecting himself.

There are so many ramifications to this problem that it is impossible to deal with it entirely by specific statutes. I am hoping, and I believe, that The Used Car Dealers Act will clean up a lot of abuses, serious abuses, or at any rate will reduce them, but the result of that will be that the crooks will move into the selling of aluminum sidings or—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Would the hon. member permit me just to remind him again, and ask him if he is familiar with the work of the anti-racket squad of the Ontario provincial police? I think this is almost on all-fours with the very thing that the hon. member for Parkdale has mentioned, and which you were asking for, or apparently had proposed in your consumers' protection bureau. The name is different, but the work would be exactly the same; and although I do not have at my fingertips a report of the great amount of work that that squad is doing, I know that it is very active. There are five inspectors allocated to that and they do nothing else but follow rackets and clean them up and prepare them for prosecution. This is going on all the time.

Mr. Bryden: I certainly would not like to cast any reflections at all on the work of the anti-racket squad. I think it is a necessary organization and I have no doubt it is doing a good job, but really it can move in only in cases where a crime has been committed.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, no—

Mr. Bryden: That is essentially their job, and surely a police force will move in only in that sort of situation. It is possible, you know, to do a lot of fleecing without really breaking any law.

One large problem is in the whole area of advertising—the misleading advertisement that is not against any existing law now, that I know of, or in many areas is not, and yet can certainly be used to deceive people. Then there is the whole question of standards. Now that is partly governed by federal law and, to a considerable degree, this whole subject matter comes under federal jurisdiction. Incidentally, the federal government, the current federal government, said that it was going to set up some sort of a consumers' bureau. Perhaps the hon. member for Parkdale, while he is inquiring into the matter, could find out what has happened to that federal proposal—

Mr. Trotter: The Liberals are working on it.

Mr. Bryden: If they are working on it in the same way these fellows over here are working on it, all of us will be dead before they ever get to do anything about it.

However, I think the point is clear enough. I suggest it is a matter of concern for both the federal and provincial governments and that we could very well set up consumers' bureaus, at both levels, which work together, not only in the actual prosecution of crimes, or in assisting in that, but in ferreting out and recommending appropriate action with regard to a great many questionable practices which may not be actually criminal. After all, the good racketeer is the fellow who avoids breaching the criminal code. He is the one most likely to stay in business. I am sure, if he breaches the criminal code for any length of time, the anti-racket squad will catch up with him; but other fellows who always manage to stay on the right side of the law, just skirting it all the time, are even a greater menace than some of the fellows who break the law.

However, Mr. Chairman, when I tried to get up a few minutes ago, it was for the purpose of making one or two observations with regard to the question of the overcrowding of court facilities, and I would still like to make an observation or two on that subject.

Mr. Sopha: Are you qualified to do so?

Mr. Bryden: I think so.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I will reserve—

Mr. Bryden: You know, the trouble with the legal profession is that they think that consumers are of no consequence. This is a great difficulty. If you are not lawyer, then what you say does not matter and sometimes they also seem—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Have you got a QC?

Mr. Bryden: No. I have been accused of many things, but not that.

Mr. MacDonald: How low can you get?

Mr. Bryden: I had wanted to make some observations on the problem raised by the hon. member for Downsview and commented on by the hon. Attorney General. The hon. Attorney General denies that there is a crisis in this area. This, I suppose, depends a good deal on how one uses words. I think the former Prime Minister of Great Britain, or a former Prime Minister, used to be called "Unflappable Mac." I think some similar name might be appropriate for our hon. Attorney General here. Nothing ever fazes him. I have no doubt that if the roof of this Chamber fell in he would say, "Some day we must send a man to take a look at that roof." Or perhaps he would have a select committee look into it, or look through it, as the case may be.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the point made by the hon. member for Downsview merits more urgent attention than the hon. Attorney General seems prepared to give to it. I think that the suggestions made by the hon. member for Downsview very likely have considerable merit. I will bow to my friend from Sudbury and say that I do not really know whether his proposal for the scheduling, is it, of cases would work or not. I could not say, but it certainly would be worthy of consideration; but I think, Mr. Chairman, that he has overlooked ideas which would undoubtedly make a much greater contribution to the solution of the problem than any of the suggestions he made.

I would suggest to him, and to this House, that by far the most important way to tackle the problem is to remove from the courts the large number of cases now there which do not belong there; that is the best way to relieve the congestion. At the level of the magistrates' courts that would mean getting the charges against alcoholics out of the courts; these people are not criminals, they are sick. Let us get sick men out of the courts; let us not charge a man with being sick and have a magistrate go through a form of trial and through a futile procedure of sentencing him, knowing very well he is going to be back the day after his sentence has been served. That is one way of relieving congestion in the courts to a considerable degree.

Then if we look at the higher levels, an obvious solution is one that was proposed two or three years ago by Chief Justice McRuer, as he then was. That is to get the automobile accident cases out of the courts; they have no business being there. Chief Justice McRuer at the time said that, in all his years on the bench, he had never felt, in dealing with automobile accident cases, that he had administered justice according to law. That is how appropriate it is to deal with the vast majority of automobile claims in courts. The obvious suggestion is one along the lines Chief Justice McRuer himself made. Let us deal with automobile accident claims and the whole question of compensation for injuries and damages suffered in relation to automobile accidents in a modern, up-to-date way—according to the same sort of principles under which we now deal with industrial accidents, and have dealt with them for 50 years—in other words by setting up a public fund and have a special tribunal administer it.

Let us just consider this from the other side of the coin, Mr. Chairman. Let us assume that back 50 years ago Commissioner Meredith had been overtaken by a desire to protect the insurance industry and had not made the recommendations he in fact made, and that the government of the day had not acted upon those recommendations, and that industrial accident claims were dealt with in the courts in the same way as we now deal with automobile accident claims.

I would suggest that if we were operating under that system, we would have to build courthouses all the way along Queen Street from University Avenue to Yonge Street, including the area occupied by Eaton's, in order to accommodate all those claims. But those cases do not come before the courts at all. The compensation board, in its whole administrative setup, deals with thousands of them every year; they never come to the courts.

Let us follow a similar sensible principle with regard to automobile accidents. Let us get them out of the courts. Let us get a sensible, intelligent way of dealing with them; not a system under which a chief justice of this province says that he had never felt, in any of the cases he had dealt with, that he was administering justice according to law. Let us have a system where justice will be administered in accordance with the needs of a situation which is of a totally different kind. Then let us see how this will affect the courts.

According to information tabled in the House by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) in response to a question from my hon. friend from Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) earlier in this session, as of January 1, 1965, there were 3,977 cases on the list of the supreme court; and, of those, 1,332, or approximately one-third, were automobile accident cases. A third of the cases on the list were automobile accident cases in the supreme court.

In the county courts on the same date there were 2,291 cases on the list, and of those 1,433, or 62 per cent, were automobile claims. Now, if we adopted a sensible system for handling these automobile cases we could get 60 per cent of the cases out of the county courts and a third of the cases out of the supreme court. That would certainly relieve the pressure both on the physical facilities and on the time of the judges, very greatly.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Carried!

Mr. Bryden: If the hon. member wants me to take another hour he should just keep on the way he is.

Mr. McKeough: The hon. member has said the same thing over again now four times.

Mr. Bryden: Is that so? Well, I am glad to know that the hon. member was listening, that is something new. He is so rarely here that we hardly know whether he is listening or not.

Mr. McKeough: The hon. member has said the same thing over and over again.

Mr. Bryden: I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman—I know the clear logic of my case is very painful to these gentlemen, but I would like to suggest to them that it is time we decide that featherbedding in the insurance industry is less important than a rational system for dealing with a particular specialized type of claim. It is also less important than relieving pressure on the courts, and if my hon. friend from Downsview is really serious about the case of relieving pressure on the courts I think that he should get behind this sort of proposition.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, to hurry this vote along—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I want to make some very brief comments in connection with consumer protection. You may recall that I made a speech under the Budget debate about The Hire Purchase Act in Great Britain and the protection that it afforded to the consumers in that country. I would just like to ask the hon. Attorney General if he would have any comments to make about that particular Act in Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I have no comments at this time.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I want to put in my two cents worth about the matter of the backlog of cases in the courts and I want to say by way of preamble to my good friend, the hon. Minister of Labour that we on this side of course do not apologize for the lengthy time spent dealing with these estimates. Especially have we the right to take that mental posture when we recall that during the six years that my hon. friend from Downsview and I have been here, there have been three occupants of the office of Attorney General. I was thinking if there was any other department where there had been three occupants, and I can recall that only The Department of Education has had three; but those circumstances, of course, occurred by reason of the death —

Mr. MacDonald: And Reform Institutions.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, yes, Reform Institutions, but it is likely to change almost weekly. Then again I cannot conceive of a more important subject in the life of this province than the administration of justice for the citizens. Finally this is the first year perhaps that the homework has been done in a very thoroughgoing preparation by my hon. friend from Downsview, with whom I am very proud to be associated in the light of the excellent presentation he has made and the many recommendations that he has forwarded for the improvement of the administration of justice.

Now, I want at this time to pay tribute to the hon. Mr. Justice Gale, who since his accession to the office of chief justice of the high court has spent a good deal of time and energy—and attacked the problem with real enthusiasm—in cleaning up the backlog of cases in the courts. I have had contact with him myself and I have made suggestions in regard to my own constituency which have been very courteously received, with a promise that they will receive consideration and will likely be brought into effect.

Now, I want to address myself to the matter of pre-trial proceedings which of course is not part of the rules of our courts. I just wonder—and the hon. Attorney General can answer with a yes or no—whether he has a nominee to the rules committee of the supreme court.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, I have an assistant deputy Attorney General in the person of Mr. Allan Russell, QC. He is known as the inspector of legal offices. He used to be known as the co-ordinator of justice administration, and that is the way he still appears in the public accounts; he is on the rules committee.

Mr. Sopha: Well, the rules committee of the supreme court, which I might say to the lay members of the House regarding that body of persons, that it is very difficult to find out, unless one made a very special effort, just who is on the rules committee of the supreme court. Some of the judges of the high court are on it and lawyers are also appointed. I do not know who they are appointed by—the hon. Attorney General tells us that he has one nominee—but the rules of the supreme court, of course, are the device whereby the procedure in the courts is governed, and I have said in this House before, and I reiterate it, that the rules of the court seem to have specially yielding characteristic in the presence of the insurance companies and it seems to me as a practising lawyer for plaintiffs, the insurance companies have always managed to effect changes in the rules which benefited them. I recite merely the rules governing payment into court.

Payment into court, of course, is allowed, whereby if an insurance company, or any other defendant, is permitted to pay money into court in full satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim and once paid in—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Would the hon. member allow me just to say that the rules committee—I cannot give him the total personnel, but I know it is made up of judges, masters of the supreme court, representatives from the law society, one of the deputies of this department whom I have mentioned—when the hon. member then says that they make flexible rules and imply that they favour certain clients or corporations, or persons, I wonder at the temerity of the hon. member.

I recall in our rules the right of payment into court in mechanics' lien actions, which I think is a very useful thing. However, I really rose to say how the rules committee is made up.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I was giving an illustration of how the rules favour the insurance companies, and how they have managed to obtain changes in the rules to suit them. One is in the realm of payment into court which is an insidious device, oppressive against plaintiffs without means and a privilege that I would abolish tomorrow. I would not permit payment into court. It is particularly oppressive against infant plaintiffs for whom one has a high degree of responsibility. A few years ago, insurance companies were allowed to pay into court something up to 14 days before the trial of the action—I hope I am accurate in that.

Then that did not satisfy them. They got the rules amended so they are allowed to pay into court seven days before the trial of the action. I can record with certainty that if they miss the seven-day limiting period they very frequently make a motion before the local judge or the master permitting payment into court, notwithstanding that the time has elapsed, and leave is almost always granted.

It is useless to oppose that motion. Payment into court is nothing more than a coercive measure to put the plaintiff and his counsel on the spot, for if you go on to trial and you do not get more by way of judgment than the amount paid into court, the plaintiff must be responsible for all of the costs after payment in, notwithstanding that he may win the lawsuit.

The bulk of the costs, of course, are connected with the counsel fee at trial, the preparation for trial, and accordingly the plaintiff who does not accept the payment into court may be faced with a very heavy burden of costs. Accordingly, the decision whether to take the money out of court or not is a very difficult one to make. In balance, the lawyer may feel, counsel for the plaintiff may feel, that the claim in the light of the injuries sustained is worth more money than the money paid into court. However, he may be uncertain about the liability features. He may be uncertain about the personality of the judge and his unwillingness to give high damages—judges, you know, Mr. Chairman, have reputations. Some of them have reputations for giving very munificent amounts, and some of them have reputations for being very stingy.

These difficult decisions have to be made for counsel by the plaintiff. Let us remember so far as motor vehicle claims are concerned, something like—the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) will tell me—something like 98 per cent plus of the vehicles now in the province are insured, so litigation arising out of damages on highways is a fight between the plaintiff and the insurance companies. I give that as an illustration of how oppressive it is.

In respect of infants, why not prohibit the device of payment into court? The court, after all, is the protector of the infant, you cannot settle a case on behalf of an infant without the approval of the court. Then in order to do justice to that infant, who cannot forward his own interests, take away that privilege granted to insurance companies to pay money into court, and let the judge decide what is equitable and fair and reasonable compensation for this infant.

I know of other illustrations that I could recite in the rules where the insurance companies are able to have their own way. I could go into the matter of the delaying characteristics of third party procedure, and I could speak at great length and it is a matter of great sorrow to me.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I wonder if the hon. member is about to leave that particular subject?

Mr. Sopha: Yes, that point.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Would the hon. member permit that I make some remarks?

Mr. Sopha: By all means.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat puzzled. I am very interested in the remarks of the hon. member, but what he is talking about is a rule of procedure forming part of our Judicature Act, or part of our rules pursuant to The Judicature Act, and prepared by a rules committee established under The Judicature Act of Ontario, an Act of this province, an Act which this Legislature has power to change and which, I think, I have some amendments before the House with respect to—if I may end that sentence with a preposition.

I would just like to say this to the hon. member, and perhaps to the hon. members of the House, Mr. Chairman: The Judicature Act, section III, reads:

The rules committee shall continue to be composed of—these are the people who make the rules by which we practise law, under which my hon. friend practises, the rules committee. These are the people that I take it the hon. member is criticizing for a rule that they have made. I am not sure whether he expects the Attorney General to disband the rules committee, or to change the Act so that I can name, or so that this Legislature rather—

Mr. Sopha: I will tell you in a moment what I am expecting you to do.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I want to get this clear—

Mr. Sopha: I will tell you in a moment.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have to make my puzzlement clear in order to get it cleared up—

Mr. Sopha: Tell us who is on the rules committee.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —because the hon. member is criticizing a rule made by the rules committee. Is it his suggestion that this Legislature disband this rules committee, or pack it up, or change its character, and how?

Mr. Sopha: I will tell you in a moment. Tell us who is on the committee.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Here is the composition of the rules committee:

—shall continue to be composed of: (a) the chief justice of Ontario; the chief justice of the high court and five other judges of the supreme court to be appointed by the chief justice of Ontario. That is six judges; (b) two county or district court judges, who shall be appointed by the Attorney General; (c) the Attorney General, or such law officer of the Crown as he from time to time appoints.

So on that committee the government, through the Attorney General, has one nominee.

Mr. Sopha: Well, whose fault is that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is nobody's fault. I do not think it is a fault.

(d) The master of the supreme court, that is the senior master; (e) three barristers or solicitors who shall be appointed by the benchers of the law society of Upper Canada in convocation.

That is six judges of the high court, the supreme court, two judges of the county court—there are eight members of it—a master, who is in the nature of a judge, that makes nine; then the Attorney General has one nominee and there are three lawyers. They make the rules.

All I am anxious to know is, why does the hon. member in this debate, the estimates of the Attorney General, say to this House there is something wrong with the rules committee?

Mr. Sopha: I want to reiterate a very fundamental principle right here. The supreme body in this province, is this Legislature. No judges, no masters, no county court judges, or anybody else. This is the sovereign body.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I agree.

Mr. Sopha: But in this Legislature, in the realm in which I am speaking, the hon. Attorney General is the guardian of the public interest. I recall the late Mr. Justice Walsh, a great friend of that government, a very wise man and a very old man when he went to his great reward.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): A friend of yours, too!

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Justice Walsh told me—well established quite a rapport in the latter years of his life—that he was one of the members of the rules committee at one time. To use, perhaps not his exact words, but to paraphrase them, he said it was sickening to go to the meetings and to see the influence of the insurance companies' lawyers there. I can think of one that was on the rules committee for a long time, a man who whenever he appeared in court—I must not point my finger, it reminds me of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko) and I do not want to copy him—always appeared on behalf of insurance companies.

Now, sir, I say to him through you, Mr. Chairman, that if the hon. Attorney General is really the guardian of the public interests, he should wish to remedy an evil such as I have pointed out—the business of payment into court, especially in regard to infants. Mr. Justice Walsh and I shared a common view. He, too, said that he would eliminate it immediately. I think it is unjust and oppressive, it is unfair, it does not give compensation to infants in the measure that they ought to receive it. I know that from personal experience. If the hon. Attorney General will come into a rapport with me and see that there is an evil, then the hon. Attorney General, through his nominee, can become insistent to the rules committee that such and such a change be made. The office of Attorney General is one of such great prestige, the chief law officer of the Queen in the province, that he can send a strong man to the rules committee and that strong man—the man of a very determined personality—can say that this is what the Attorney General wants. I daresay that, human nature being what it is, what the Attorney General wants in the realm of reform, the Attorney General will get. He will get through persuasion.

I am going to leave that. That is my feeling about payment into court. I could occupy the time of the House, but I will not tonight, on the score of the third party procedure, the advantage it gives to insurance companies and the way in which third party procedure delays law suits and delays the payment of money for damages suffered on highways, into the hands of persons who deserve to get their reward speedily. I have said that one of my greatest regrets about the select committee on compensation to persons injured on our highways, was that I went before that committee and presented a brief to them on this score and I asked them to urge reforms along this line. Regrettably, that select committee, in its infinite wisdom, did not feel it was appropriate to comment upon the comments of that brief. All a person can do, is to keep trying.

Finally, I wanted to make a few remarks about the pre-trial procedure, to eliminate the case load in the courts. A few years ago, at a mid-winter meeting of the Ontario section of the Canadian Bar association, they invited lawyers from the state of Michigan to describe to us—in fact they enacted, and described to us—the use of the pre-trial hearing in that state. That is a device which could be effected by a change in the rules, by the same rules committee. It is a device whereby the parties must come before a judicial officer at some point in the prosecution of the law suit and discuss with that judicial officer the nature of the case. That judicial officer's function is, of course, to see where there is common ground between the parties, so as to eliminate a lot of evidence at the trial and to shorten the trial itself. Very often, as the hon. Attorney General well knows, there is a great deal of common ground between the parties. Direction of streets, the nature of the driving conditions, the admission that the defendant was in fact the owner and driver of the motor vehicle, the change of medical reports in respect of the injury sustained, and so on.

The second function of the judicial officer is to attempt to effect a compromise between the parties. And here let me say the most satisfied litigants in the world are those that settle the law suit, and if I may have the temerity—that is the word the hon. Attorney General used tonight and I will borrow the word—if I may have the temerity I will disagree just a little bit with the chief justice. The chief justice complained that in many cases, the law suit is settled on the courthouse steps. That seemed to bother him. The case was scheduled for 10 o'clock on Thursday morning. The parties come into court and they announce to the judge, we have settled the case.

Many cases are settled on the courthouse steps. In fact, that is the best place to settle them, because as you approach the fatal hour of 10 o'clock, when the clerk cries out, "Oyez, Oyez, Oyez," one or other of the parties, or perhaps both, start to develop weak knees and biblical palsy at one and the same time, and they are not so secure as they were three months before, in the prediction of success of their case. I venture to say that most cases are settled on the courthouse steps. Indeed, a good many are settled away from the intervention of the trial judge.

Judges, after all—they will permit me to say this about them because I am not being critical—develop a reputation as being settlers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Justice Trelevan, with all due respect to him, and he has left the bench and I can say it, Mr. Justice Trelevan never seemed to want to try a case at all. Dan Kelly hated the thought of giving judgment in a case. He would pressure the parties, and I have been subject to the pressure, from D. P. J. Kelly, a man for whom I have the most profound admiration. He would exercise all the wiles of a very alert and agile personality and get the parties together. When that happens, of course, the judge has nothing to do for the rest of the day, because the next case is not ready to go ahead.

These things we must not interfere with. That is part of the process of judgment. But I do urge upon the hon. Attorney General that he take some steps, perhaps through consultations with the rules committee, or with the judges, or with the chief justice of Ontario, or with the chief justice of the high court, to see whether this province might not try, for a time, this pre-trial hearing, because the pre-trial hearing is merely the replication of the intervention of the judge at the trial in effecting a settlement between the parties. But the advantage of it is that the pre-trial hearing takes place two or three or four months before the case is to come on for trial, and it may be a way out.

In respect to my hon. friend from Woodbine's comments about getting the motor vehicle cases out of the court, that is a very difficult and a very complex subject. But I want to suggest that if we get the motor vehicle cases out of the court, over the howls of anguish of the lawyers—and the howls will be great—then for heaven's sake let us relax the divorce laws so that we can make up in the number of cases—

Mr. Bryden: Do you want divorce grounds broadened in order to congest the courts?

Mr. Sopha: Well, we have a resolution on the order paper to relax the divorce laws, and this would just about balance getting the motor vehicle cases out of courts. Remember that before I was born, a long while back, we took out the workmen's cases, about which my hon. friend from Woodbine spoke with such feeling, and it just happened that with the passing of the workmen from the courts the motor vehicle appeared on the scene.

Mr. Dunlop: The advance of technology.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, it was the advance of technology. But my hon. friend from Forest Hill will agree with me that divorce has nothing to do with technology. It may have something to do with technique, but certainly not with technology. I leave that with the hon. Attorney General, and I hope that he will exercise his good offices to try an experiment with the pre-trial hearing procedure in this province.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 207.

Mr. Sargent: Would the hon. Attorney General tell us the number of civil cases awaiting judgment in Ontario courts, and would he advise if he plans to follow the precedent set by the province of Quebec in using lawyers as judge arbitrators to bring these cases to trial?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, we have been all over that this evening.

Mr. Sargent: Thank you.

An hon. member: We were out to lunch!

Mr. Sargent: I guess I was.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to a gap in the jurisdiction of courts, in the province of Ontario, which has particular bearing on the adequacy of the functioning of the juvenile and family courts, particularly the family aspect of the juvenile and family courts.

I do not know whether it is well known in this House or not, but this is the only province in Canada in which the courts do not have jurisdiction to make a judicial declaration of separation in matrimonial cases, and I think it is essential that the hon. Attorney General and the law officers of the Crown should investigate the steps which should be taken to confer jurisdiction to grant judicial separation to persons who appear before the courts of this province.

The reason is: As anyone who is familiar with the functioning of the family aspect of the juvenile and family court, or indeed familiar in any way with social work done in the city of Toronto, will realize, when a family situation deteriorates to the point where something has to be done in order to separate the spouses, one from the other, the only way in Ontario in which that can be done is either for one spouse to desert the other or for the two parties to sit down and sign an agreement. And I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in many instances it is ludicrous to expect spouses in a deteriorating family situation to sit down and sign a separation agreement.

The result, therefore, is that the only recourse available in this province is for one spouse to desert the other. Immediately you are faced with the very difficult problem of determining which one has deserted the other. And in the family court every day that particular decision is made by a court which, by its nature, is neither quite a court nor quite a family counselling service. As a result of the decisions in the family courts on this question of desertion, the ultimate financial liability of one or other of the parties or the ability of one of the parties to exist financially, is determined for all time.

There are very few people who realize that the transcript of the evidence in the family court is not available for use in any other court, and there is just no appeal from a judgment made by the juvenile and family court. The whole proceeding must then be commenced all over again, in a superior court, to obtain the decision as to whether or not one party has deserted the other for some purpose quite extraneous to the support of the spouse who has been deserted.

It is only, as the hon. Attorney General is probably quite well aware, an historic accident that the courts in the province of Ontario do not have that jurisdiction. We have heard the question of the resolution which is on the order paper raised, I think, by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Worton) to debate the extension of the jurisdiction of the courts of this province in matters relating to divorce; but I would suggest that, without entering into that kind of a debate in this Legislature, it should be possible for the province of Ontario to obtain jurisdiction for the courts in Ontario similar to the jurisdiction which exists in every court in every other province in Canada.

Everyone in this House knows that there is no simple solution to the many problems which exist in family relationships in a deteriorating situation, or in the ability to keep families together; but in my opinion, and, I am certain, in the opinion of many people, the one single thing which could be done, and could be of great benefit, would be for the judges actually to be in a position to declare a judicial separation. Then it would not be necessary for husbands or wives to appear in magistrates' courts in order to get one or other of them bound over to keep the peace, in circumstances where either violence or the apprehension of violence has occurred within the family life.

It would be possible for such a judicial declaration to mean that the deserting spouse would not have any right to suddenly reappear on the scene, and the person who had the benefit of the judicial declaration of separation would be able to place it in the hands of the police and to make certain that their lives could then go forward, on determination by the courts, that they should thereafter live separately.

I would hope that the hon. Attorney General would take this matter up, because this is one matter which the hon. Attorney General could immediately accomplish for the courts in this province, without raising all the many other issues which are involved in the matters set out in the resolution of the hon. member for Wellington South.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to refer to two or three matters that the hon. member for Sudbury has mentioned in the course of the last few days, and to express my agreement with these particular points which he has raised. I need not hark back to another debate earlier, in the estimates of The Department of the Provincial Secretary, when I reiterated the proposition that it was quite essential that bodies such as the law society of Upper Canada, and also such bodies as the rules committee set up under the jurisdiction of The Judicature Act, should be responsive to the public interest; and I agree entirely with the remarks made by the hon. member for Sudbury that the way in which the public interest can properly be brought to bear upon the law society of Upper Canada, and upon the rules committee under The Judicature Act, is through the hon. Attorney General expressing the viewpoint which has the agreement of the hon. members of this Legislature. This is not an intrusion by the legislative branch into the judicial branch at all; this is simply an effort to make the law society of Upper Canada and the rules committee under

The Judicature Act, responsive to what public opinion is on matters related to law.

One of the matters to which the hon. member for Sudbury referred was the need, now that a revision of The Law Society Act is about to be presented to this Legislature, or will be in the near future, to make certain that the statute governing the law society should specifically provide that there be an annual meeting of the lawyers of this province as members of the law society of Upper Canada, so that the governing body of the law society will, in its turn, be responsive to the opinion of the lawyers.

I need not reiterate that there has not been—certainly, in my experience, I have no idea when the last meeting was ever held, of the lawyers in this province within the framework that was granted to the law society of Upper Canada to govern the legal profession in this province. I would hope that every hon. member of this Legislature who is a lawyer, who belongs to this profession, would take advantage of this debate, of these estimates, to stand up and express his views on this particular question. I think it would be very important and very effective if the hon. members of this Legislature who are lawyers would express the viewpoint that we should have some minimum degree of democracy within our own governing profession if we profess to be the guardians of the democratic society in which we live.

The other item on which I would comment, and state my approval of the remarks of the hon. member for Sudbury, is on the question of payment into court, because this is a matter on which this Legislature could well, through the hon. Attorney General, express to the rules committee the fact that, in my opinion and, I think, in the opinion of many others, payment into court is, as has been said, an oppressive and coercive device in law suits related to insurance claims in this province.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the hon. member for Riverdale in relation to the great gap in our law concerning such matters as separation agreements and actions between husband and wife and so on, I think, are most pertinent. I am not going to amplify them at all. I had some notes here about which I was—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: He spoke very well.

Mr. Singer: Yes, he did. And I just want to compliment him and express the view that—

Mr. Dunlop: Write him a note.

Mr. Singer: No, I think it is important that it go on the record that there are many people in this province who believe that there needs to be a better system of family law for the province of Ontario, that there is a big gap in this jurisdiction and as a result of it many people are suffering very severe hardship.

Mr. MacDonald: What is next on the agenda?

Mr. Singer: The next matter I want to deal with is the registry office—

Mr. MacDonald: Let us get on to it.

Mr. Singer: Thank you. The registry office and land titles procedure.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Downsview just let me ask the hon. Attorney General if he has any comment to make on that point before we continue?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am much indebted to the hon. member for Riverdale, as well as the hon. member for Sudbury, in the complementary remarks confirming their suggestion, which I think are very thoughtful and thought-provoking. I must confess, particularly on the question of the lack of a right or a power in our courts to grant a decree of judicial separation, that I used to wonder when I practised before the courts why that was lacking.

Mr. Trotter: What are you doing about it now that you are the Attorney General?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I did not get around to doing anything about it at that time.

I would like to add to the suggestions that have been made—I think they are very worthwhile—dealing particularly, first, if I may, with what was said by the hon. member for Sudbury on the question of payment into court. I would think that that might be supported if the legal profession, as the hon. member for Riverdale suggested, represents public opinion by and large. Then I should think that a good deal could be done to strengthen the hand even of the Attorney General or this Legislature by resolutions from local Bar associations and law societies. The same would go for the matter of the power to be given to our courts to grant decrees of judicial separation. But I think the thoughts put forward are certainly worthy of consideration and worthy of some effort to see if there can be an accomplishment in that area.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, I would like to add something in the area of juvenile courts, after which the hon. member for Downsview can pick up on a totally new topic.

I do not think that we should allow the vote on juvenile courts within this particular branch of the estimates to go through without making some reference to that bizarre and unhappy case of young Jamie in the detention home. I want to raise it in good spirit, Mr. Attorney General, through the Chairman, because I think that it raises some rather interesting questions and merits some observations which I for one would like to hear about.

I think this particular case is sadly illustrative of a general problem, and I want to say to him that I do not pretend that the province of Ontario has a large number of deaf mute children with severe emotional disturbance but it has a lot of severely disturbed children who require some particular kind of help and for whom no such help is available. This particular case, I suggest, borders on the supernatural in its implications and in the efforts that have been made—so far unsatisfactorily.

The hon. Attorney General suffers some arrows of misfortune by association. I admit that one does not expect ministerial dispensation in this case. I think back to the matter of the Guelph inquest, raised in this Legislature, some of which was directed to this hon. Minister when, in fact, they arose from Reform Institutions. I think of the Fred Fawcett case, through which some dishonour fell on The Department of the Attorney General, when in fact it should have been directed at Health. Now, alas, we have the problem of young Jamie, and the onus of responsibility, in fact, lies jointly, I would suggest, in The Departments of Education and Health and Public Welfare, but alas, the hon. Attorney General finds himself in the unhappy fortune of making reply.

I would like to make some observations and ask some questions, and then perhaps the hon. Attorney General can respond. I am curious, Mr. Chairman, about the clinical team which made the diagnosis. I am perplexed that the diagnosis should have led to the suggestion that Jamie be placed in Milton—without previous contact with the superintendent of that institution or without previous contact with the superintendent at Belleville. In fact, sir, both of these men have indicated that they do not run psychiatric institutions; they are for children who are deaf but are otherwise normal in all faculties. I am also perplexed that we could have made the suggestion that Jamie go to Milton or Belleville, when, in fact, the term ends in the month of June and does not pick up again until the month of September. I ask the hon. Attorney General what is to happen to this young lad in the intervening period during the summer. Does he know?

I am also curious about the position in which we have placed Magistrate Little. I am not at all sure that it is not an invidious position in an exceeding degree. I would think that if this case demonstrates anything, it demonstrates the necessity of asking all magistrates in juvenile court at the point at which they succeed to their duties to visit—

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might suggest that because of the lack of interest that has been shown here, I would like to move that the committee rise and report progress, and beg leave to sit again.

Mr. Singer: The motion is in order and not debatable.

Mr. Chairman: Only if he has the floor.

Mr. Thompson: I did have the floor. The hon. member yielded the floor to me.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. leader of the Opposition just came in to make that motion.

Mr. Thompson: Not at all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Singer: Are you going to call it? Are you going to call the motion?

Mr. Chairman: No, because—

Mr. Singer: You are not? Oh, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Under the regulations, the speaker—

Mr. Singer: Under what regulations?

Mr. Chairman:—relating to the proper conduct, the orderly conduct of the business, the motion can be moved only if the speaker has the floor.

Mr. Sopha: Is it not competent for the hon. leader of the Opposition to move a motion?

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, it is not competent unless the hon. leader of the Opposition rises on a point of order and asks the member speaking if he will yield the floor for a particular motion of intent. He did not do that. It is not that I want to extract the political drama from the hon. leader of the Opposition; do not let him misunderstand me—I am not persuaded that if we fill this Chamber we will achieve any more in this case. I am persuaded the hon. Attorney General is a genuine person and I for one, Mr. Chairman, should like to continue this and get his response, unless the issue is forced.

I want to go back, Mr. Chairman, and say that the magistrate has been placed in an invidious position. It demonstrates that one of the things we should demand of our magistrates is that before they assume their duties they visit every single institution in the province to which they can designate children, so that they are familiar with the facilities, so that they are familiar with the problems of overcrowding, so that they are familiar with the psychiatric and psychological emphasis, so that they are familiar with whatever punitive features exist if such do, so that in fact they can not make errors of judgment. I am sure this is something to which the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions would subscribe.

It also raises interesting questions about the detention home and detention home facilities. I want to suggest strongly to the hon. Attorney General that one of the ways in which we could have alleviated this bad problem, by our detention home having some clinical staff and some intense supervision for equally difficult cases; because there are many disturbed and retarded and otherwise handicapped children who pass through the detention home. You would not have had this incessant public outcry and clamour if the detention home itself were equipped to handle these children.

From all the press reports one reads, Jamie has responded to some therapeutic treatment through the demonstration of love and affection, and the proximity of other human beings, even, let it be said, untrained human beings. If, in fact, there were some legitimate counselling services available, if there was in a detention home, a treatment orientation, then many of these problems would be less severe and extreme.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman—and this is why I raise it at this juncture—the hon. Attorney General is being put in this rather difficult position because there are, in fact, no facilities, with which we are presently acquainted, for children like Jamie in the entire province of Ontario. And if there were such facilities, the people involved cannot afford them; indeed, society itself has not shown a willingness to undertake financial responsibility.

I want to suggest that the answers lie in the field of education and welfare and health. I would just like to tell the hon. Attorney General of two specific cases of which I am now aware. I am not going to give a diagnosis, but they are of an approximate kind.

I have a young boy in my riding who has been to the Toronto psychiatric hospital out-patient clinic. He is an organically disordered child. He falls within the category of learning disability: Some small degree of brain damage at birth. He has been to Toronto psychiatric hospital out-patient clinic. I have spoken to the people there, and they feel he needs some kind of intensive treatment. He has been to the Ontario crippled children's centre. They have made a similar diagnosis—they feel he needs some intensive treatment.

During the Easter holidays, he was expelled from a public school in my riding. I have spoken to the principal. He has now taken him in and the school is making a desperate effort to cope with this young boy who manifests the very broad spectrum of erratic observance in class. But there is not a single specialized class in the entire municipality of Scarborough township to look after this lad who is ten and a half years old.

Why do I raise it in this context? For two reasons, Mr. Attorney General. First, because the boy has been breaking windows in the district and could conceivably come into juvenile courts through the natural channels; second because the mother is in a state of despair and may in fact have to bring the child herself. What are we going to do? Is society again to have another dramatization of the Jamie equivalent?

Just yesterday afternoon I spoke to the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) about a schizophrenic young girl for whom there are absolutely no educational facilities in the entire area of the city of Toronto. At the moment the parents have had to make plane reservations for the United Kingdom Monday night, so that something could be done by way of alternative education. And again, the inability to communicate, and the frustrations which build up, and the disabilities involved, can manifest themselves in delinquent ways, which would bring the child within the purview of the hon. Attorney General. It would place him in another untenable and difficult position, because it is unhappy when a Minister has to respond to such individual and complex cases.

Mr. Chairman, I think what the hon. Attorney General has to do in general terms—the Attorney General generalizing is an admirable phrase—is to have the staff and the facilities of the detention home itself strengthened and to see that the magistrate becomes much more familiar with the facilities available. And some co-ordination must be developed within this Cabinet immediately with a tremendous sense of urgency to provide alternative facilities, placements and group homes and above all, at the educational level, special classes for the wide range of children who ultimately fall within this vote, because society provides not a whit for them.

This is a sad case. I do not expect the hon. Attorney General to wave a wand and give a reply, but I do not think that he should have to suffer outraged fortune in his own portfolio because of the inadequacies demonstrated by his fellow Cabinet Ministers. I urge him to pressure them, as we are pressuring him, so that similar incidents do not arise a year from now. I say to you, Mr. Attorney General, as I stand here, with every ounce of sincerity at my command, that I think it would take no more than one or two years to provide sufficient treatment centres and special education classes to remove these extreme and dramatic cases from society. It can be done. There is already enough success evident, and I profoundly hope that you will give it the propulsion necessary.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 207.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I want to address some remarks about our system of dealing with registration of titles in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member mind if I just made some comments on the subject raised by the hon. member for Scarborough West? I think he might be interested to know—

Mr. Singer: I am going to get to the land titles later, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I think the hon. member would be interested to know that we, in our department, have been working with the juvenile family court judges association, in setting up a programme to do precisely what he is suggesting, that is to visit all of the institutions, so they would, as the hon. member stated, be familiar with what goes on in them.

You might also be interested to know that, as a matter of fact, I met with them at dinner time tonight, before the evening session—

Mr. Bryden: None of the institutions you now have is suitable for a case like Jamie.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: All right, but it is not just Jamie. Whether there is such a place for Jamie, no one knows yet. You know, some of these cases—

Mr. Bryden: Well, maybe there is, but you will not put him there.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It would not suit you if we did.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No one has proven yet that there is such an institution for a youngster like Jamie. Some of these cases are so complicated, a great deal more research has to be done to find out the sort of treatment the youngster needs.

I do not know enough about this particular case, but we have such cases. In some instances it is like saying, "For God's sake somebody better do something about cancer," but no one has an answer to it yet. I will agree we have to do something about finding out what the answer is in some of these difficult cases.

The point I was getting at was that I was discussing with the juvenile court judges tonight, that under the new Act it is proposed that the juvenile court judge would state specifically the kind of treatment, or institution, or programme that he thinks a youngster who is up before him should have in preference to committal to a training school. So we will know precisely, say, a year from today, how many of those youngsters should not in fact have been in training schools, but should have been given a specific type of treatment or programme outside of a training school. So rather than talking in nebulous terms of nebulous types of programmes or treatment that these youngsters should have in place of a training school, they will tell us what, in their view, the youngster should have, and how the youngster should have been treated.

They are meeting next week. They are going to discuss this amongst themselves, and I think we are moving very rapidly in the direction in which the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to shock the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, Mr. Attorney General, but let me rise at this point to say that I would also like to acknowledge to him on the record, at this point, his new emphasis on the detached worker programme which he is now undertaking in the city of Ottawa. This sense of urgency, at this point in all these cases, is the only answer. That is why we flank our attack in this way.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I just want to say, very briefly, that I appreciate what the hon. Minister for Reform Institutions has said, and I want to say to the hon. member for Scarborough West that I appreciate his suggestion. Whatever responsibility falls here, I would be glad to share. I do like the suggestion very much, that was put forward. It was one that had not occurred to me, that magistrates and judges—those who have to do with the juvenile courts—should have an opportunity, and it should be part of their education, part of fitting themselves for their functions, that they do see the places to which juveniles are sent.

The other suggestions I think are very worthwhile. I do not know the answer and I cannot wave a wand, but I appreciate the comments which were made.

Mr. S. Lewis: What does the hon. Attorney General think about the proposition of turning detention homes into more intensive treatment areas? I cannot quote the words of the editorial, it was a Globe and Mail editorial, but I can quote him the date. It was November 9, 1964. It was an editorial which suggested that a large number of children—representative of great disturbance and retardation, and delinquent behaviour—went through the detention centres at all times. They frequently were left for two or three months, subject only to the untutored but, I am sure, highly genuine and affectionate supervision of the workers who were there; and I think you could achieve more of that if you had interim concentration. This, of course, brings us back to the fact that was raised earlier this evening.

When a municipality like Metro Toronto is so myopic as to deny the $100,000 specifically designated for improved psychiatric and counselling services, then children in the society eventually suffer. Although I can take no issue with the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions about the extremity and severity of individual cases, I will argue forever that there are, in fact, several thousand children in this general category, and that Jamie is reflective of a large group, not a very small and minute portion of society.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This was suggested to me, Mr. Chairman, in the way of a question, and I would ask the hon. member not to expect me to give a proper and sensible answer offhand at this moment. I think the implication of that suggestion is one that deserves study. It carries with it a good many consequences. It carries with it much that has to be planned and worked out before it could be suddenly put into effect. I think it has merit, but beyond that I would not like to express myself at the moment.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, if everyone is through with that particular facet, may I now get into the registry office and land titles system?

We have a system here in the province of Ontario, which in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, leaves a substantial amount to be desired and I have some remarks here that deal with some analysis of our system and some of the faults of it.

The primary purpose of all systems of land registration is to promote security of title to land and facilitate the smooth operation of the land market. Two distinct systems of land registration have existed in Ontario since the enactment of The Land Titles Act in 1885. The system created by that Act is not available in the whole province of Ontario. The counties in which it is not available, startling enough, include the county of Peel, which adjoins Metropolitan Toronto and which is represented by the hon. Minister of Education in this House.

Land not registered under The Land Titles Act is registered under the residuary system established by The Registry Act. The genesis of this Act is found in the legislation of the province of Upper Canada of 1795. The value and importance of systems of land registration are obvious to anyone who owns property in the province, and the value to each land owner or person dealing with the land owner and the state may be judged by considering the following factors.

First is the security of title of the registered owner of land; second, the scope of protection accorded to persons dealing with it; third, the ease and certainty with which any defects in his title may be ascertained and dealings affecting the land completed, and fourth, the technique and the expense of bringing the land within the system. I propose to discuss briefly the theory and the comparative value of each system on the basis of the above criteria.

Under The Registry Act, evidence such as a deed that a transaction affecting land has taken place, a conveyance, may be registered in the appropriate registry office. The system is one of document registration. Failure to register does not affect the validity of the transaction between the parties to it, but rather the priority of the transaction over subsequent transactions affecting the land. For example, a conveyance, which one came first, or a mortgage, which is first in priority, is made to depend on the order of registration. Persons dealing with others who appear on the register to be owners of the land thus are accorded very limited protection under this registry system. The title of the registered owner is not guaranteed by the state, or the province of Ontario, although of course it may be by a solicitor, and often is by a solicitor. The solicitor charges a tariff for that guarantee, in this county in any event. It runs to 1.25 per cent of the value of the first $20,000 with diminishing portions after that.

In these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to be uncritical of the legal profession, because I am suggesting that there is a mystique existing in the whole system of land registration that has not been critically examined by members of the legal profession, or pretty well by anyone else, for a long, long time. I just wonder why there has not been a more careful look at what I think is a most inefficient system, a system that is wasteful and a system that does not afford to the members of the public the sort of protection to which I think they are entitled.

The register does not purport to define accurately the nature of the owner's title, nor specify all the defects to which it is subject. It is incumbent upon each person dealing with the registered owner of land to satisfy himself as to the person's title. This involves the examination and the appraisal of registered transactions affecting the land for a period of at least 40 years and that is only comparatively new in terms of the length of time it takes to change the law—a comparatively new step that not too many years ago meant you had to go back to the initial grant from the Crown. As you know, Mr. Chairman, if the purchaser of land sells it after a few days or months, the process will be repeated again at further expense, and the same ground almost invariably is gone over again and the same documents are examined and the same sort of opinions are sought and given. Indeed, the process will be repeated several times within a year, in the case of many pieces of property, and several times within the year the same documents are examined, the same procedures are taken, the same sort of inquiries are made, and the same sort of tariffs are charged, and a series of people pays 1.25 per cent to have the same title guaranteed as many times as that title is dealt with.

Finally, not all the defects of the title of a registered owner are disclosed by the documents registered. For example, a neighbour may have acquired a title in fee to a part of the land under The Limitations Act, through adverse possession, since the acquisition of title in this way is not evidenced by a document, registration is not required and a different type of inquiry has to be made.

In summary, document registration does not ensure security of the title to the registered owner. It accords only limited protection to persons dealing with it, and makes the ascertaining of the registered owner's title, hazardous and wasteful. In fact, as I say, a mistake has been established to which few people, except the very acutely educated in this particular field, can find their way. It is almost impossible, I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, for the average person who has land that is registered under our registry office system, to inform himself properly about very much by going in and getting out the appropriate register. He needs very specialized training in this regard and unless he has spent some time absorbing this type of training and this peculiar type of knowledge, he is not going to be able to tell himself very much about who has the title to a piece of land. In other words, he has to turn to the professional, whether it be a solicitor or whether it be a person who makes his living out of searching titles.

Enactment of The Certification of Titles Act was a minor effort, I would suggest, taken in 1958 to be somewhat helpful in this situation, and it provided some relief respecting land registered under The Registry Act, but it has many defects. The owner in fee of the land may apply to the director of titles to have the title of such land investigated and certified. Further and more importantly, in any area designated as a certification area by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, a plan of subdivision cannot be registered unless and until the title of the owner of the land included in the plan of subdivision has been certified under the Act. It does not apply to land registered under The Land Titles Act.

Subject to certain qualifications upon registration in the appropriate registry office, a certificate of title is conclusive evidence as to the day, the hour and the minute named therein that the title of the owner of the land is described as absolute and indefeasible, but that is only under this procedure.

The Certification of Titles Act assurance fund was established by the Act to compensate persons wrongfully deprived of land or of an interest in it, by reason of the title being certified. In addition to all other fees, in order to constitute the fund, applicants under the Act are required to pay a defined sum of money calculated on the value of the land.

In one of the questions I addressed to the hon. Attorney General, I inquired about the delays in connection with this procedure, and in my question 71, I asked:

Will the Attorney General advise:

1. What is the average length of time required to issue a certificate of title from the date of application until the land is registered in the land titles office:

(a) in all land titles offices in Ontario,
(b) in the land titles office, Toronto?

2. Have any complaints been received about the length of time so required?

3. What are the reasons for such a length of time?

4. What steps have been taken to remedy this situation?

And the answer that was tabled said this:

1. (a) One to two months, depending on completeness of the submission and complexity of the application.

That is in offices other than Toronto.

(b) One to five months, depending on completeness of the submission and type of application.

This applies to Toronto.

2. Yes—in the form of written, telephone and personal inquiries at the land titles office.

3. (i) A marked increase in volume—of the applications, and he details particulars of the volume:

—the extension of The Land Titles Act, submission of faulty surveys, the failure of some lawyers to file applications, change in the nature of the application, applications are becoming more complex—and so on. He gives six reasons, all of which have some substantial importance in them.

What steps have been taken to remedy the situation? He says:

The employment of additional staff—a detailed audit of the methods—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, we cannot hear the speaker over here.

Mr. Singer: I am sorry. To continue quoting:

—a detailed audit of the business methods in these offices, visits and inspections to various offices with the result of suggestions as to how procedures can be improved.

But the fact is, Mr. Chairman, that there are substantial delays. The delays occur particularly in Toronto where, I suppose, the greatest number of transactions go on in real estate of any place in the province, and where the delays are lengthiest.

The hon. Attorney General does not refer—and I think perhaps we could just pause a moment in this presentation and deal with it—to the difficulty in obtaining and retaining staff, both in the land titles offices and in the registry offices. I think that the salary levels in these offices are far too low, and I am not alone in this opinion. I referred once before in this House to some remarks made by Mr. Hurst, the former registrar of the registry office for the east and west ridings of the county of York, who stated in a letter that he sent out to some members of the profession that it had been difficult during 1964 to keep the abstracting up to date, owing to the difficulty in hiring abstractors at salaries permitted by the government. He continued:

Representations have been made which I hope will eventually improve the situation.

There was a young gentleman who was a very efficient person, in my opinion, in the land titles office in Toronto—perhaps my friend, the hon. Minister of Labour would be familiar with him. He was there when I was a student. His ability and intelligence appealed to the responsible governmental officials of the day. They determined that he was the logical person to send, at government expense, to Osgoode Hall, because not only did he have the practical knowledge and experience of working in a registry office but he had the ability and interest in advancing his education. The general intention was, I would imagine, to have as a trained man in the land titles office, a young man of ability and intelligence and education.

Well, what happened? He went off on government time and at government expense, to Osgoode Hall and came back into the land titles office. Because of our fascinating system of determining pay for civil servants, whoever is responsible for these things determined that the young man had to go into the category of young lawyers just out of law school. He was expecting to take—and I think reasonably, and I would imagine the people who were responsible for having made the original decision would have expected this young man would have to take—a very important role in the running of that office, but after he had gone into that position and spent several months there waiting for payment and position commensurate with his ability, his education and his training, and nothing being forthcoming, a very well-known firm of solicitors in London, which does a great deal of real estate work, came to him and asked him to go with it. I do not know what the salary is that he is getting in London, but I am sure that it perhaps multiplies by two or by three what the government was paying him.

So in the one effort that I am aware of in the land titles system in Toronto, because there was no ability to cope with situations like this, because everything seems to go into a sort of meat-grinding system and you do things by number and by category, you lost the first professionally trained man through the system that our registry offices seem to have produced and that the land titles system seems to have produced. You will never replace him; you will never get that man back in again, because of the very unfortunate experiences he had working in those offices.

I compliment the hon. Attorney General for one departure that he has made that has come to my notice and to that of many members of the profession. He has departed, very fortunately, from the approach that most of his predecessors have taken, of looking outside the system for the top jobs in the registry office, both in the registry office for the city of Toronto and the registry office for the east and west ridings of the county of York. When those positions became vacant, the hon. Attorney General looked carefully at the deputy registrars and saw fit to appoint, as registrars in both those offices, the men who had served there many years and who, up until this Attorney General's arrival, had no hope or expectation—no matter how able they were or how much experience they had—that they were going to get the top jobs. In these two cases that I am aware of the hon. Attorney General did this and I compliment him for it.

I would suspect, and I would hope, that this same attention is being paid to ability in other registry offices and that the old system is not continuing in other places where you look for someone who needs some political award, whether he knows anything about registry offices or is interested—that it is nice to put good old Joe in as registrar because the deputy is there and is going to stay and do the work anyway. This is a new approach and it is a good one. I hope it continues and applies throughout the whole of the province.

I assume, in most parts of certification areas—which I was talking about before I got off on this thought about salaries and staffs and so on—an owner wishing to subdivide and develop land must prepare and register a plan of subdivision in order to comply with sections 26 and 28 of The Planning Act. In a certification area the registration of a plan must be preceded by compliance with The Certification of Titles Act. It has been pointed out that the Act has no application to land registered under The Land Titles Act.

The Land Titles Act—in sharp contrast to The Registry Act—supplemented by The Certification of Titles Act, establishes a system of title registration. Generally speaking, the title to the land can only be effected by an entry made upon the register and not by a transaction made off the register. After the first registration of a parcel of land the person shown to be its registered owner by force of the legislation is conclusively presumed to be the owner and to have the title described on the register.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, might I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Singer: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: By reading the entire dissertation of the history of the system, what is the hon. member's point?

Mr. Singer: My point is to inform the hon. members of the House and the members of the public of the systems that we have and the methods by which they work, because I think, Mr. Chairman, it is most important that this sort of system be discussed, be understood, in the hope that we can bring some real reform to our method of dealing with the registration of land, as I said at the beginning of my remarks. Whether you are satisfied with that answer or not I do not know. In any event, that is my purpose and that is my answer.

Mr. Chairman, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, it is my opinion that this is a system that is archaic and outdated; that it is not properly serving the interests of the people of Ontario; that it is surrounded by much mystique and mystery; that the average citizen, by and large, is unable to find out on his own who owns a piece of land and who else might have an interest in it. I think this is a problem the government must turn its serious attention to at the earliest possible opportunity.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You never took that position as a lawyer.

Mr. Singer: I am not going to bother to answer these remarks. If my friend, the hon. Minister of Labour wants to get up and answer some of these criticisms, that is his privilege.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I am just looking at the sincerity of your presentation.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister is questioning my motives, I would draw to his attention the rules of this House which make it quite clear that this is not permissible. What other purpose the hon. Minister has, I do not know. I propose to continue with my remarks.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Those who talk longest do not come back.

Mr. Singer: The registered owner is the only person—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Remember that.

Mr. Singer: I skipped a sentence there. After the first registration of a parcel of land—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Did somebody else write what you are reading?

Mr. Singer:—a person who is shown to be its registered owner, by force of legislation, is conclusively presumed to be the owner, and to have the title described on the register. It should be noted that the title shown on the register does not disclose, for example, zoning bylaws.

Other qualifications are specified in the Act. The registered owner is the only person who may deal with a registered parcel of land. The purchaser may rely on the register of title as conclusively establishing defined title in the registered owner. It is not necessary for him to look further than the register in order to determine who has the title to the land. Neighbouring landowners cannot acquire title to a part of a parcel of land registered under the Act by adverse possession.

The Land Titles Act assurance fund is constituted under the Act to compensate persons wrongfully deprived of land, or some estate, or interest therein, by reason of the land being brought under the Act, or by reason of some other person being registered as owner through fraud or misdescription, omission or other error, in a certificate of ownership of land, or of a charge or an entry on the register.

In addition to other fees payable on an application for the first registration under the Act, a defined sum of money is computed on the basis of the value of the land and buildings involved, and is payable to make up this fund.

Mr. Dunlop: Could the hon. member not be more exact—

Mr. Singer: I am sure that the hon. member for Forest Hill has studied these statutes very carefully, and if he feels that anything I am saying here is wrong, I would appreciate his comments. I think this is a fair and reasonable summary of what is in these statutes, and I think the hon. member for Forest Hill, being a fair-minded man and interested in the progress of government in its advancement in the interests of the public, would agree with me that we should have a better system of dealing with land registration than we have—the registry office system and the land titles system.

Mr. Dunlop: The hon. member's comments are more useful than your readings and lectures.

Mr. Singer: That is a question of opinion, and it is an opinion I do not share with the hon. member for Forest Hill, so I am going to continue on with my readings, my lectures and my comments until I have had my say. That is why I was sent here, and that is what I intend to do.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of interest, are you going to continue? This commentary is more properly under the Budget or Throne Speech debate rather than a debate on the estimates. Mr. Chairman, are you going to continue to permit this?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: I believe it comes under the registry office.

Mr. Singer: Of course it does. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As my hon. friend well knows, since he has come into the House at eight o'clock he has made a concerted effort to disturb every remark I have said. I accept his remarks in the intention in which they are given, and I am going to proceed in any event.

Mr. Chairman: You have the floor.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, it is the most unfair reactionary comment from the hon. member since he has been in this House.

Mr. Singer: The Land Titles Act has been made to apply to many municipalities. The Land Titles Act, 1885, applied only to the city of Toronto and the county of York. By 1911 the Act provided that it applied as well to the county of Elgin, including St. Thomas; the county of Ontario, the city of Ottawa; the county of Carleton and the provisional judicial districts in northern Ontario. It also permitted the council of a county, city or separated town to extend the Act by enacting a bylaw declaring it to be expedient that the Act be extended to such municipalities. Further, a procedure was established by which ratepayers of a county in which a city or town to which the Act had been extended was situate, to petition the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to extend the Act to such counties.

By 1962, in the land titles amendment Act of that year, the Act had been extended and made to apply to every local municipality in the counties of Elgin, Ontario, Carleton, Lincoln, Halton and York, including Metro, and the united counties of Prescott and Russell. Since 1962, the Act has been extended by bylaw to the counties of Essex and Welland and the cities of Riverside, Windsor, Niagara Falls and Welland. Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, it does not apply to significant parts of southern Ontario, including, for example, the counties of Peel, Middlesex and Wentworth, which are experiencing, and will continue to experience, great increase in commerce and land.

Apart from the provisional judicial districts in the municipality to which The Land Titles Act applies or has been made to extend, the owner of land registered under The Registry Act must choose to make application for the first registration under The Land Titles Act. If he is the owner of land which has been divided and developed, unless he is concerned to have his suspected defect in title removed by adjudication on an application for the first registration, or is compelled to comply with the demands of a lender of funds, there is very little incentive for him to make such an application. The benefits which flow from the title registration system tend to accrue to successors in title of the current owner, and the state.

In addition, significant fees must be paid on first registration. It is unlikely that they would be reflected by an increase in the value of land. Accordingly, one would expect comparatively few owners would choose to apply for first registration under The Land Titles Act, and very few of them in fact do.

However, a curious and indirect incentive is provided to bring land under The Land Titles Act where the area in which land is situated has been designated a certification area under The Certification of Titles Act, and is one to which The Land Titles Act applies or extends. If, prior to the marketing of land, a plan of subdivision must be registered as a result of an enactment of a bylaw by the municipality under section 26 of The Planning Act, designating the area in which the land is located as one of subdivision control, the owner must choose between bringing the land under The Land Titles Act or applying for certificate of title under The Certification of Titles Act, and registering it. The expense schedule under the two Acts is so formulated, and the administrative procedures are such, that it is often advantageous from a cost and convenience standpoint to make application for first registration under The Land Titles Act.

This incentive, if it can be so described, is said to work satisfactorily as a technique to promote registration under The Land Titles Act. It does not work if the land is located in an area defined as a certification area, but to which The Land Titles Act does not extend. Such an area is the township of Toronto and the county of Peel, just outside Metro.

Of course, once a plan of subdivision has been registered, The Certification of Titles Act cannot be used to promote registration under The Land Titles Act. Thus, the thousands of plans of subdivision already registered are completely unaffected by this legislation, and the land within them will continue under The Registry Act. So many of these things that appeared on the surface to have substantial benefit, in fact really produced nothing except a momentary clearing of the air, and the system is proceeding retrogressively once again.

I would suggest that from the standpoint of the present owner of land, persons dealing with them and the province of Ontario, that the system of title registration provided under The Land Titles Act is obviously—it is not just a suggestion—regarded as a far superior system to that of the registry office system. The technique of extension of the Act in municipalities by local option manifestly has not resulted in these advantages being diffused throughout the whole province. Further, the technique of determination by individual owners whether to make application for the first registration under the Act has not worked satisfactorily. Finally, The Certification of Titles Act provides no answer to the long-range problem of promoting security of title to land, and to the smooth functioning of the land market.

It would seem to me that the following reforms could, and should, be taken and could, and should, be taken almost immediately. First of all, I think it is obvious that The Land Titles Act should be amended and made to apply to all parts of Ontario.

Second, there should be a requirement that all new plans of subdivision be registered under The Land Titles Act and be preceded by an application for a first registration under that Act by the owner of the land.

Third, I would suggest that these parts of The Certification of Titles Act inconsistent with these recommendations be repealed.

Fourth, I would suggest that we adopt a suitable technique to bring all land now registered under The Registry Act into The Land Titles Act.

Fifth, and I think it is an important part of any of these recommendations, we must concentrate on improving the staff and on improving the facilities.

Just recently, in the land titles office at Toronto, there was a delay of I think a month or six weeks because suddenly a crisis had arisen in another part of the province and several of the senior men from the land titles office in Toronto had to be quickly taken to another part of the province to assist in helping out in that crisis. While those men were gone from the Toronto office, the work there slowed down to a very substantial extent, and almost, in certain phases of it, came to a halt.

To be fair and reasonable to the people of Ontario who own real estate, I think we have to establish a better system. The land titles system at the moment seems to be far superior—there is no question—to the registry office system. It may be that there is something even better than the land titles system, and there are many practitioners who are not too sure that the land titles system is in fact the final answer. But certainly, a system of half land titles and half registry office is not working and is not working at all. As you go into our registry offices and into our land titles offices, you must recognize that we are unable to attract in those offices young men who are anxious to make a career of working in registry offices and in land titles offices, because we are not providing sufficient incentive by way of pay and opportunities for advancement to make this an interesting and attractive career.

Time has long since caught up with the antiquated wage scales and the lack of attention that we have paid for so many years to our civil servants, and in the registry offices and in the land titles offices, we are suffering as a result of it. It would be my hope, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Attorney General tonight would have some real promise of some immediate progress to be made in this, rather than the sort of minor amendments that we see from year to year, to The Land Titles Act and to The Registry

Act, which are housecleaning amendments or which change some very minor detail.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 207.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting for about two days to have a few words on this vote, on collection agencies. I note that in vote 207 comes the division courts, which I presume is the appropriate place to make these comments.

I am not going to illustrate my point at great length, because I think hon. members are generally familiar with a problem that I want to remind them of by taking one case history. I do not think it is out of the ordinary, though it is certainly extraordinary. It is a case history that was reproduced by Ron Haggart in his column of March 19, entitled—

Mr. Edwards: Reading the papers again.

Mr. MacDonald: "Elsie Brown."

Mr. Edwards: You have been reading the papers to get all this.

Mr. MacDonald: Some of us do a lot of things very frequently. I read the papers, you do other things very frequently.

Mr. Edwards: You have to read the papers to get this type of thing.

Mr. MacDonald: Maybe my excesses are less damaging.

Mr. Chairman, this is the case of one, Mrs. Russell Brown, who signed a contract for five magazines with the Education Book club on November 23, 1963. She was supposed to receive a cook book valued at $24, and in the contract it said, "Allow 14 days for this book to arrive." Well, the cook book did not arrive. Indeed, it did not come to her neighbour whose name she was supposed to have submitted, and therefore she wrote to the Education Book Club and said she was not interested in the magazines any more. She then got into a year-plus of exchanges with the Education Book Club, or its collection agency, known as the Sentinel Credit Corporation which demanded increasing amounts of money that started out at $13.95 and ultimately climbed to $93.40.

The first letter she got from the book club—and I want to read this one, because it is indicative of the kind of threats, indeed of terrorizing, that goes on—said:

This is to advise you of the fact that your contract has been submitted to our lawyer for collection. He has been instructed to issue a writ of summons to be served upon you by the bailiff—and Ron Haggart says "sic" after that, because I do not think the bailiff comes into the picture here anyway, even if they had proceeded with an action.

—in order that we may obtain judgment against you in the division court. This action against you will only result in the collection of your account in full plus court costs, that can result in considerable loss of sometimes valuable time and oftentimes considerable embarrassment.

If you read that letter carefully, absolutely every imaginable phrase is thrown into the letter to terrorize this person into putting that cheque for whatever it was—$13.95 or somewhere between there and $93.40—into the mail, to avoid all these dire consequences. But Mrs. Brown was not deterred. She did not send the money in, and in a short time she received a pink-coloured, rather official-looking slip claiming to be a 48-hour notice, final notice of court action. It said:

Unless payments are made our lawyers will file proceedings against you without further notice.

Three months later, on August 13, 1964, she got another 48-hour notice all over again, saying once again that the lawyers would be taking proceedings.

In between these two pieces of pink paper, the Browns received another official-looking document, which was clearly designed to fool the ordinary person into thinking it was some kind of legal document. On it there were smudges of red ink which, if you examined them closely you would recognize were not an official stamp. All of it was set out in very legal fashion in its printing.

The final threat came on January 25, 1965, when the Sentinel Credit Corporation sent a letter to Russell Brown at the factory where he is an engineer. The envelope had the word "garnishee" on the outside and the letter inside was emblazoned with the words "notice of impending garnishee action" in bold red type. The document, says Ron Haggart, was dated three days before the Sentinel Credit Corporation dated its writ and it was six weeks before the Sentinel Credit Corporation case was even called for trial. There was no impending garnishee action at all. There could not have been; it had not gone to trial; there had been no court action.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, this thing did come to court, and Mrs. Brown was there with her lawyer, but the Sentinel Credit Corporation decided that it was not going to fight it any more, so the whole case went by default.

Later on, in another one of his columns, Ron Haggart, who has pursued this and done a great deal of the research that I draw to the attention of the hon. Minister, notes the fact that he knows of not a single instance where these phony front collection agencies, or collection agencies that are a front, will actually go to court if the person is willing to fight this matter through. In other words, the whole thing is a case of blackmail from start to finish, to try to extract this money from people. He draws attention to this fact, that in Canada, we have now emerging a kind of organizaion that has emerged in the United States, where the recipient is left with the impression that he is getting a document from a collection agency, when, in fact, it is only a mimeographed sheet that is sent out, and indeed sometimes comes from the very same office of the company that has been dunning him all along.

We have in Canada today, a Canadian credit and collections agency, which is one of these phony front organizations. I draw to the hon. Minister's attention—in case he has not got a satisfactory answer for me as to what he is willing to do in coping with this kind of thing, at least with regard to these phony collection agencies, which are really house organs within the companies—that the US government has acted. It is sitting down with these companies and saying, in effect, "Do not pursue this any more, because it is not going to be tolerated," and they called off the hounds. The US federal trade commission sat down with a group of companies, which shows just how far-reaching and how important the organizations were which were involved in these practices. It involved the Popular Science Monthly, the Heritage Club, The History Book Club, Simon and Schuster, Pocket Books Incorporated, Golden Press Incorporated, Grolier Enterprises and the Conde Nast Publications Incorporated.

I repeat, the federal trade commission, the FTC, sat down with these companies and persuaded them to cease this kind of letter through a phony front organization, and at least that aspect of this kind of terrorization has come to an end.

As Ron Haggart points out at the conclusion of his column:

There is no such inhibition in Canada because no action has been taken by this government.

Now, I put the question to the hon. Minister. I think this is an intolerable kind of terrorizing of people—bulldozing them to extract money when there is a good deal of evidence to suggest that when they get to court, if it goes to court, the companies simply will not appear.

Can the hon. Attorney General give the House any assurance that he is willing to do something about it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. member before I answer him, was this agency a house organ—the one he is particularly describing—the example he used—was it an agency of some mercantile house?

Mr. MacDonald: That is not the long Brown case, no.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: One other question: Did the lady who was being badgered make any appeal or complaint to The Department of the Attorney General?

Mr. MacDonald: I am not aware that she did, though I cannot speak with assurance on that point.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, might I say this then—answering first the question of collection agencies generally and The Collection Agencies Act—I have some notes in this vote 208 with respect to collection agencies: There are 134 collection agencies with 60 branch offices and 830 collectors registered under and subject to our Act. Three registrations were cancelled during the year for shortages in trust accounts; known losses to the public were $90, $750 and $1,200; claims have been filed under the surety bond which the registrants are required to pay—this is incidental information; 167 complaints were received during the year.

Most complaints were against collectors for using threatening or abusive language over the telephone. These complaints expressed as a percentage of the total received, are now tabulated against each agency, and repeaters are required to show cause as to why the registration should not be cancelled. This new procedure has caused a marked reduction in complaints against abusive language and we are hopeful that the improvement will continue.

I recall, Mr. Chairman, in our Collection Agencies Act, section 20:

No collection agency shall, among other things, use any form or form of letter to collect, or attempt to collect, money from a debtor unless a copy of the form or form of letter is filed with the registrar.

So they must submit this very type of letter to our agency, and we have this pretty well covered. I think—I cannot put my finger on it, but I am certain that in this Act—I had introduced an amendment where if an agency was attempting to use anything simulating a court form, this is a heinous attempt, if I may call it such. But we have it covered by the fact that they must submit the collection letter—in any form—to the agency and have it cleared before they can use it.

Now if this lady had complained, she could have saved herself hiring a lawyer and going to court, I think. In any event, she could have stopped that type of letter.

As to the house agency, this is a new touch.

Mr. MacDonald: Before we leave that, have you had many complaints with regard to the Education Book Club, because this is the one—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have not got the names of the firms complained against; there were 167 complaints—

Mr. MacDonald: Because—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will be glad to look it up.

Mr. MacDonald: There are two or three other columns that repeat accounts in connection with the Education Book Club.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The Education Book Club; we will take a look at it.

I do not know about the house agencies, but I am quite certain that this came to our attention as an abuse. In this country we would be able to find means to deal with it. I do not know if the Act specifically refers to such, but I think it would perhaps qualify as a collection agency—it carries on the business of collecting debts for other persons; a person who carries on the business of collecting debts for other persons. I should think that we would be able to surround that area, if it came to our attention.

Mr. MacDonald: In other words, Mr. Chairman—I should just like to clarify this—I take it then that if enough complaints come in to you and demerit marks mount up against any company, that they would have their licence taken away.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is what is happening. That is the way we are proceeding.

Mr. MacDonald: I hope that this gets out. It does not look as though it would get out much tonight, but we will send a copy of Hansard to Ron Haggart. Maybe he will do a column on that and flood you with complaints, because I really think that this should be cleaned up.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, on that last commentary, if I had thought, we were on 207, I would have drawn it to the attention of the hon. member that that was under 208.

Mr. MacDonald: I am sorry; I thought it was under division courts.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have got that, I trust, disposed of—at least part of 208 covered.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister the problem of bingos and car raffles. I understand that this would come under the administration of justice and under this vote. Am I right, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I suppose the enforcement of any breach of the criminal code is part of the administration of justice.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, some three years ago the city of Windsor passed a resolution that had been endorsed by the inter-service club council—which is a group of all the service clubs in the community—and the city recommended that legislation be passed authorizing the service organizations to conduct raffles, bingos and so forth on behalf of charitable purposes. I understand this is federal.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. I want to draw this to the attention of hon. members—this is definitely federal legislation.

Mr. Newman: I am working on the enforcement aspect of it only, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. member: Why bring it up here?

Mr. Newman: Because of the difficulty of uniform enforcement throughout the province; that is why I am bringing it up. In my own community, the enforcement, as far as car raffles go, is very severe. No car raffles are allowed whatsoever. But it is very disturbing to the community when you find other parts of the province conducting car raffles. Does the department enforce a ban on car raffles throughout the province?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All I can say to the hon. member is that we have enforced the law when a breach of it is brought to our attention.

Mr. Newman: Well, Mr. Chairman, if I may, does the department enforce the ban when it comes to the Canadian national exhibition, because from my understanding, they do conduct a car raffle?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If you bring it to our attention we will enforce it.

An hon. member: Would you like us to go and lay a charge, lay an information?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 207.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I have several more topics. I wondered if the hon. Attorney General wants to comment on my remarks relating to land titles and registry office? I think this is a most important topic.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have a very brief comment, Mr. Chairman. I am much indebted to the hon. member for his very learned and lengthy dissertation. I can inform him that the salaries of officials in registry and land titles were revised substantially upward, with further consideration to be given to that phase, which I think will improve our staff, and he will note by looking at the estimates that there is quite an amount requested for additional members of staff.

I do not propose at this hour of night to attempt to discuss historically, as he did, the merits and demerits of one system against the other. I have lived with both. As he noted, the provision of judicial districts calls for land titles offices. They fall heir to that by virtue of the Act, except where registry offices may have previously been established. Both systems, in my experience, have worked very well. As he also knows, any area that wishes to go over to land titles may do so. A municipality does it by passage of a bylaw, owners by petition. There is some assistance afforded where judges' plans are required; then, the government assists financially. We are trying to improve the systems by increases in staff and increases in salary and I think, by and large, the systems do not work badly.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 207 agreed?

Mr. Singer: No, Mr. Chairman. This is a sort of catch-all vote and there are a number of subjects that have to be discussed under this one. I think one subject that we should talk about for a while is the whole question about grand juries. There was a story carried in the Toronto press just a few days ago, a few weeks ago—

Mr. Edwards: That is another press clipping you are working on.

Mr. Singer:—concerning grand juries which I thought was a little amazing, if in fact it is correct, and it appears to be. The question was asked, addressed to the sheriff of the county of York, as to what real powers a grand jury has. This article starts off:

How grand are a grand jury's powers? May they stroll through Queen's Park and inspect the Prime Minister's office or perhaps sit in on the Cabinet meetings?

These questions were raised by a grand jury report last week which asked that future panels be given a list of buildings that they might inspect.

"We found it difficult to assess what to inspect due to the lack of information supplied to us," wrote the foreman, R. S. Kellow. The York county sheriff, Phillip J. Ambrose, who would have to supply any list eligible for inspection, says he would be at a loss to give specific instructions. The Jurors Act says a grand jury may inspect any institution in the county supported wholly or in part by public money.

Is that as broad a mandate as it seems to be? "I don't know what it means," confesses the sheriff. Does it mean hospitals, does it mean schools? What is an institution? Has it necessarily to do with criminals or with places of detention or just what does it mean? Or does an institution maintained in whole or in part by public funds encompass governmental departments and administrative tribunals—for instance, the workmen's compensation board?

By tradition, says a spokesman for the Attorney General's department, grand juries inspect only institutions which house people, homes for the aged, jails, and so on. But asked if a jury had a legal right to walk through the Queen's Park offices the official said, "Don't ask me to interpret."

My obvious question to the hon. Attorney General is, if the sheriff of the county of York is not able to answer these most most pertinent questions, and apparently he is not, is there not some method by which rules and regulations and instructions can be passed on to such people as the sheriff, so that when the grand jury approaches him and says, "What can we do, where can we go, what can we inspect?" there would be readily available to the grand jury a reasonable answer?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, there is a Jurors Act to begin with, which sets out certain responsibilities and duties of grand juries. The sheriff, particularly the sheriff of Toronto, has a manual, quite a thick book, telling him what his duties are and I know it specifically covers the instructions for grand juries. Grand juries are usually also instructed by the presiding judge. But I have not heard of any difficulty or any confusion on the part of grand juries.

Mr. Singer: If the hon. Attorney General has not heard of it, this story seems to indicate it and I just wonder why the sheriff appeared to give those answers.

An hon. member: Whose story is that?

Mr. Edwards: Is this a newspaper account again?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Is this another newspaper clipping?

Mr. Singer: Yes, it is a newspaper clipping. If it is wrong, then I think the hon. Attorney General—

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Chairman, we have been listening to newspaper clippings for two months now.

Mr. Bryden: It saves you reading them.

Mr. Edwards: Sure, I read them, the same as you do. But I do not make all the hash you do.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Where is the hon. leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Thompson: Listening, and I think what you should do is also listen.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering how much supervision the hon. Attorney General's office exercises over the sheriff's office in the county of York. I am advised that there are personnel there consisting of some 100 members and that in the last 12-month period some 16 have left and that there have been very serious staff troubles. Has the hon. Attorney General had any occasion to check on the reason for the very substantial staff changes in that department? Have there been complaints about lack of pay or bad supervision or poor working conditions? It seems to me that those figures are alarmingly large and that it would be more in accord with the proper administration of justice that there was some better continuity in that staff.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I will not take the time, although it would take but a moment, to draw to the attention of the hon. member for Downsview the fact that the amendments to The Sheriffs Act are before the House at this session on the very points he raises. They provide that section one of

The Sheriffs Act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

The Lieutenant-Governor in Council may, by commission under the Great Seal, appoint a sheriff for each county and district and may appoint such persons to the staff of the sheriff's office as are deemed necessary and may fix their position specifications, salary ranges, and terms and conditions of appointment.

That is new.

Mr. Singer: That is only permissive though and I presume—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think you may rest assured it will be exercised.

Mr. Singer: All right. Am I able to read sufficiently well between the lines to attempt perhaps to put words into the hon. Attorney General's mouth? He is disturbed by the situation I have alluded to and perhaps this is a remedy that he is suggesting to the House for its correction.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am very chary about allowing anybody to put words in my mouth.

Mr. Singer: Can you elucidate further then?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I would phrase it this way: I am aware of the situation and I have taken what I consider to be necessary and proper action.

Mr. Singer: All right. That is good enough. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think under this vote the law reform commission—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, that is not under this vote. I will be glad to deal with it in a few moments tonight, though.

Mr. McKeough: That is 211. Carried!

Mr. Singer: No, no. Where does the law reform—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Vote 211.

Mr. Singer: No, I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, not the law reform commission. What I was looking for was legal aid. Legal aid is under this, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Now we have got that covered surely.

Mr. Singer: No, all we have got done, Mr. Chairman, is to table the report. This is a very complete report, but I do not know that we have debated it. I had suggested that when that report was introduced, an opportunity should be given to debate it. It is not on the order paper and I do not know if it is the government's intention to debate legal aid. This is a very important facet of the administration of justice and I think we should discuss it, whether tonight or at a later time. I notice the hon. Prime Minister is back and perhaps I can just address that part of my question to him.

Is it the hon. Prime Minister's intention to put the report of the legal aid committee on the agenda for separate debate or not?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, that particular report is under study now with a view to eventual implementation and to the introduction of legislation. I very much doubt that legislation will come forward at this session, in fact, I am quite certain. The whole question of legal aid and the report of the committee is at present under study with this idea in mind.

Mr. Singer: All right. If it is not going to be put on a special item for debate, I have a few remarks that I want to make—they are necessarily brief—on this particular point.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the report is an excellent report. I think a good committee was set up, that it studied its subject well, that it did its research well and that it presented a very commendable report.

There are two or three things, though, that I think should be considered when the government reviews the report and is preparing its legislation. The first part is, I am disturbed somewhat that The Department of Public Welfare will be deciding whether or not legal aid will be granted if the adoption of the report is made in full.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, or a point of procedure, are we getting into a legal battle to be settled by the hon. members of the House here, or what? I am just asking for guidance.

Mr. MacDonald: You certainly need it.

Mr. Trotter: The whole government needs guidance.

Mr. Edwards: I go for what I said. We have lawyers down here and our—

Mr. Chairman: Order! The Attorney General has accepted this procedure as being correct.

Mr. Edwards: I am just asking for guidance.

Mr. Trotter: Is it divine guidance you want, or legal guidance?

Mr. Singer: As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the recommendation that The Department of Public Welfare be substantially responsible for determining the people who are going to be provided with legal aid causes me some concern. This would more or less separate the responsibility. There is a criteria for legal aid, and then there is the sort of financial examination that is going to be done in another section. I just wonder, if we get into this—if there are two departments of people looking after legal aid, if there is a legal aid committee or a director or a staff, and The Department of Public Welfare are in both—whether we may not ask for and get great confusion, and perhaps some very substantial difficulty and delay in getting the thing moving along.

I suggest to the hon. Attorney General that when he comes to review this legislation, he very seriously consider making the same group responsible for all of the decisions. If you want, bring in trained people—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If the hon. member will permit, Mr. Chairman, I think I should make clear to the hon. member that if I recall the recommendation in the report, the part of welfare was simply to determine the ability of persons to pay, not their entitlement other than that.

Mr. Singer: I think the hon. Attorney General is right on that, but what concerns me is that there may have to be two separate reviews. If the law society is going to administer it—and this is one of the major recommendations—those officials of the law society have the duty and responsibility of doing a particular review, and perhaps saying, "In our opinion applicant A should get assistance." Now we have to send this file, or a portion of the file, to The Department of Public Welfare to let them send out their investigators and we may come to a different sort of a conclusion.

It occurs to me that the split in this jurisdiction could be very dangerous. And it would seem to me—if substantially the recommendations of the committee are going to be adopted—that the hon. Attorney General would do well to consider having a staff that will do this sort of thing attached to those people who are actually making the decisions, so that the processes can go on the same track.

What concerns me is the split jurisdiction, and I think if we get into the split jurisdiction—it may be you want to take personnel out of there and second them to the law society or to the people who are going to administer—you might have conflicts, you might have delays and so on, and that the same people who are responsible for making the decision may be unnecessarily delayed, may have two different sets of criteria, may not have a proper understanding. I think this is something that is well worthy of serious consideration.

We have seen in other fields of government that where a responsibility falls astride one or two or three departments, very often we have difficulty in getting any action, because Minister A can move only so far, and Minister B is not quite sure where Minister A has stopped moving from; civil servants are not quite sure where the lines of demarcation are. Even though these problems are often ironed out—sometimes they are not—they cause delay and confusion. That is my first suggestion in regard to this.

The second problem that concerns me—and I have commented about it outside the House—is the difficulty that might well arise if the only lawyers available to do legal aid are those who happen to put their names on a panel or might be so moved to put their names on a panel. It would be my thought that careful consideration should be given, perhaps, to putting all lawyers on the panel, making it a panel of all the lawyers in the province of Ontario, or putting all the lawyers on and letting those, who for particular reasons that concern them, withdraw. Let the impetus come from the persons who are administering it, and try to make the coverage as broad as possible. In other words, I think that the initial plan should be concerned with trying to get as many lawyers participating in this as is possible.

I recognize that somebody is going to say, if you put two or three of the top counsel on the panel, everyone who wants legal aid will want a John Robinette or a Joe Sedgwick or perhaps persons of that calibre.

Mr. Kerr: Or Vern Singer.

Mr. Singer: Or my hon. friend, the hon. member for Halton. But I would think that there should be a real study done as to the method of getting the broadest possible participation.

It may well be that you should start off by putting all the lawyers on and then let some of them withdraw. For instance, if you were to put all the lawyers on, the Deputy Attorney General would be on, and obviously he would not be available for that. But people who have good and substantial reasons could, and should, withdraw. Those two points commend themselves to me immediately as this report is in study. I do not know if the hon. Attorney General has any comment on this point.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have a very brief comment. I would like to see—one of the reasons the report was tabled and left, as I mentioned at the time, was for comments and discussions and suggestions which might come forward from the law societies and local associations—the law society further itself with a broader study than the hon. members were able to give while the report was being prepared. I would hope that local law, county and district law associations, would come forward with studied suggestions such as the hon. member has put forward tonight.

Mr. Singer: May I ask, has there been an abundant distribution of this report to all societies?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, very thorough arrangements have been made to see that the report is distributed broadly all across this province, to lawyers and law societies.

Mr. Singer: I would imagine that as it has been distributed, perhaps in a covering letter the hon. Attorney General has asked for suggestions.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It has not actually gone out. We have been printing it and getting it ready for distribution.

Mr. Singer: But this will be done?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Right.

Mr. Singer: Fine. Now, Mr. Chairman, another matter that I did want to talk about was the conditions that existed in the master's office. The master's office, in effect, just about collapsed six months ago.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It has been completely resuscitated.

Mr. Singer: I appreciate it was completely resuscitated, but what concerns me very much is what were the conditions that brought about this collapse? How is it that suddenly one of the most important judicial offices that we have in the province of Ontario was in need of such resuscitation? It must have been known, surely, to the hon. Attorney General's—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Will the hon. member permit? Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to sit and listen and learn, and to receive suggestions and critical comments, but I think, perhaps I can reach the thought that the hon. member is seeking here to tell him that the office collapsed, or almost collapsed, through a set of circumstances arising out of the age which the personnel were reaching. Three of them, as I recall, reached retirement or past retirement age all at once, and there was one serious illness. We lost four almost at a stroke, and we replaced with four, almost at once.

Mr. Singer: This has to be expected, but surely it was no secret within the hon. Attorney General's office that these gentlemen were approaching retirement age. What causes me great concern is why arrangements were not being made as these gentlemen came closer and closer to retirement age, to find replacements for them. Why suddenly the emergent situation burst upon the hon. Attorney General; then we had the pause; then we had the crisis; then we had the resuscitation.

In the meantime, the problems were further complicated by the peculiar position of Mr. Kimber, who was wearing two hats and could not be in the master's office while he was in the securities office. Surely it must have been noticeable or obvious to the hon. Attorney General and to his officials that these men were getting older, that there was going to come a day reasonably soon when they were going to retire. Perhaps I am threshing old straw, but I wonder why this was not noticed—and this is particularly pertinent because I am concerned that this sort of situation might be mounting up in other jurisdictions, among other very important branches concerned with the administration of justice. Is there any sort of replacement system? Is there any sort of record kept; in sub-branch X, where four of your senior officials are getting awfully close to retirement age, are you bringing new ones on? What kind of an organization was that? Perhaps I cannot fault this Attorney General but certainly I can fault the system that allowed this to come about.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I know that the hon. member wants to be fair in his criticism, but I think I should point out that I did not have much time to observe this situation. This Legislature rose last year, as I recall, on May 8, and I was then able to observe certain things; one of them was the master's office.

As I have mentioned, there were three persons there reaching retirement age. Mr. Marriott—if I may use his name—would have his time, in the ordinary course of events, extended. He would not have retired, as was the usual custom, but he would have been given an extension from year to year; and he would have continued except that his health constrained him not to accept that arrangement. So we had four situations arising there. As you have mentioned, it was something which I felt was proper policy, to get a full-time chairman of the securities commission, and Mr. Kimber accepted that arrangement, but we were able to fill those positions. It takes a little time to get the proper type of very capable official, almost of the nature of a judge, whom you appoint to be a master or assistant master, so I do not think that it will arise again.

Mr. Singer: I quite agree that this is a very serious responsibility, but certainly there could be no greater indication of panic than the full-page advertisement that was inserted in the Ontario Weekly Notes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That was no panic—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, surely it is a most unusual thing? I do not know of any other precedent that even corresponds to this, where we advertise in the Ontario Weekly Notes in a full-page advertisement for the most important judicial official. You advertise for sheriffs; you advertise for registrars of deeds; you advertise for magistrates; you advertise for whomever you have to appoint; but here you must have been in a panic, you must have been in a crisis, to put an advertisement like that in the Ontario Weekly Notes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member considers that unusual, I will take responsibility for it and he can call it unusual; I think it was the best way to let the profession know, across this province and even outside the province, that we were looking for senior, capable officials and I think it worked; I think we have them.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, if the system is that good is he going to advertise for magistrates—because I think he has a similar crisis?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have a little different system in the magistrates. I have a chief magistrate looking over the field continuously, and they are pretty well known to us throughout the province.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I did table an order for return concerning the correspondence involving the very short period of employment of Mr. Creighton. Is that correspondence going to be tabled?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I doubt if it will be. I do not think it is really of interest to the House or to the public.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, it seems peculiar to me—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I might add this: Mr. Creighton has advised that, in his view, it is personal to him and he sees no reason—

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, it seems peculiar to me that, in this time of crisis, one man—I have never met the man or talked to him personally but, as far as I know, he was highly regarded as an authority in relation to mechanics' liens and so on—took employment in the master's office. He closed up his office, gave up his lease and, I am advised, handed out his files. Then, some few weeks later, he decided that something had gone wrong and he left. I think that maybe there should be an answer—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You have heard that the man himself requested that it not be presented in the House. Have you no respect for him?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General's answer will speak for itself.

Vote 207 agreed to.

On vote 208:

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Prime Minister is planning to continue this session tonight because I have some rather extended remarks I want to make.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We might take the next 25 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, the matter which I wish to raise is the matter of the emergency measures organization, as we have it in this vote. We are devoting a considerable amount of money to it. The emergency measures organization has existed for some time in this province and has, it seems to me, in recent years served only one purpose. That purpose has been to disperse certain moneys to municipalities for fire equipment. Perhaps this debate should have taken place earlier in the afternoon, after The Milk Act vote, because this is a sacred cow which gives perhaps no milk and which is a very expensive item to keep.

We have, time after time, had a verdict about EMO and its use. Maclean's Magazine, for example, on November 2, 1964, tells us something about the H-bomb and what we can expect:

For most people have now realized, they say, that a fallout shelter is simply a prematurely dug grave, a hole to be buried alive in; no more effective against H-bombs than a silk umbrella against machine-gun bullets.

The programme for fallout shelters, as far as EMO is concerned, I think, is past; so we do not need to concern ourselves about that too much. But, in the Toronto Daily Star of very recent date, we have an article by Nicholas Steed, who says this:

Metro's emergency measures organization can do nothing to help you and me if a bomb drops on Toronto. The stark truth emerges that, after three years' work by Metro EMO, an expenditure of $1.5 million of the taxpayers' money, EMO director, John Pollard, a small, wiry former wartime officer and civil servant, admits bluntly, "We can do nothing to protect individuals." And further, all EMO could do would be to try to rush as many local politicians as possible to its underground Aurora headquarters. What purpose that serves I am not sure. Its chances of doing even this would not be too good.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Young: That is right. Either one. These are local municipal politicians. I do not think they are concerned about us in this particular House. We can go up in smoke. And all the public could do would be to take cover and hope for the best, the article says.

Most Metro politicians feel EMO is a waste of money but they are reluctant to speak out for fear of losing what is, in effect, a federal subsidy to local governments. EMO, in effect, serves no use; that is my first point. It has, in the past, issued a handbook to our schools; that handbook, I find, is not known to a great many of our principals and is not used.

There are some rather pertinent quotes here telling about what children ought to do. It says there can only be a partial saving of human life if the bomb drops. Blind fear in the face of danger can paralyze or panic. Understanding can make possible protective measures in advance and effective behaviour in times of peril. They tell about children going to school, Mr. Chairman, and what should be done.

A different type of problem is involved in protection during the hours when pupils are going to and from school. Drivers of school buses should be qualified to look after large groups of children and each one should be thoroughly familiar with the possible emergency shelters on his regular routes, but since there are no emergency shelters on his regular routes, we take for granted he does not become familiar with them. Then it says:

Pupils who walk to school should be made clearly aware of their responsibility for their own safety and in case of sudden danger they should seek the nearest available shelter. A survey to identify suitable buildings and other forms of protection should provide the information which each child might use in locating the places on his home-school route that would serve as a personal protection landmark.

And so we get the picture, Mr. Chairman, of the children heading for school. They look for the next landmark where protection might be and get to that, and then desperately look for the next one and get to that, and to the next one and get to that. So they are going from place to place and landmark to landmark, until such time as they reach school. The poor little souls are filled with fear and we hope that they get there safely before the bomb falls.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Be careful, that will be in Hansard.

Mr. Young: As far as the schools are concerned, we are told by Mr. Pollard that a survey has been made of the North York schools—that is my own municipality—where safety might be found, and he says a survey is in the process in determining fallout shelter requirements. Studies have been made and completed of all North York schools and 18 schools under the jurisdiction of the separate school board. In checking with the chairman of the North York school board, he first of all did not know anything about this, and when he checked with his officials he found that some little studies had been made two or three years ago but nothing had been done about it since and none of the schools seemed to know where the safety areas are. As far as this activity is concerned, affecting the school children, the only protection evidently is to make sure the bomb does not fall, because if it did fall EMO has accomplished nothing in getting these shelters categorized and even if they were categorized, the question is, how much use they would be.

I am not going to mention the matter of getting our people evacuated from the city. I understand that the hon. member for Downsview has a great deal of information, which came as an answer to one of his questions on the order paper, about the way signs are stored and how they will be put up and how eventually we will have, when the bomb hits, people running around putting up signs and then showing us where to go—in spite of all the information and all the advice of Mr. Pollard here that it is useless and hopeless to get a few of the municipal politicians out there, that we are just not going to accomplish the job. But we are going to have the signs up, we hope, so that while the buildings are falling and the people are dying, the signs can go up to direct us in some way or other.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): What do they do about fallout protection in the Chamber?

Mr. Young: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Maybe we should have fallout protection in the Chamber.

Mr. Young: Well, this might be.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): I think what we should all do here is pray.

Mr. S. Lewis: Are you trying to evacuate the House?

Mr. Young: It might be a good idea for us to evacuate the House at this point and then continue this tomorrow. However, if we are going to continue, let us continue.

There is one function that EMO seems to be performing in this province which might be described as useful. Again, I question it. That is the supervision of grants for auxiliary fire pumpers. I have in my hand the emergency measures financial assistance programme of The Department of the Attorney General's emergency measures branch. That financial assistance programme outlines how fire pumpers may be bought for municipalities in various parts of the province and how certain grants may be given to them. The conditions of the grants are very interesting:

That the municipality does not have sufficient fire fighting apparatus and/or equipment which can be made available to train auxiliary fire fighters.

This is the first thing.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That will put the fire out.

Mr. Young: That is right, so the auxiliary fire fighters are going to be trained if this equipment is bought. Correct. That is the first thing we have to keep in mind. The second thing is that the additional fire pumper will not replace old or wornout existing municipal fire apparatus or equipment. That is important. It is not going to replace it. It is going to supplement it—I think, Mr. Minister, this is the idea.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Big Brother is watching. The fire chief is in the gallery.

Mr. Young: Big Brother is watching? I hope he does not turn the hose on. If he does, turn it on the government side so that we dampen down their enthusiasm for late-night meetings a bit.

The third condition, if I might have the floor again, Mr. Chairman, says that a municipality must have established a fire department under the provisions of The Municipal Act and have passed the necessary bylaws, named a fire chief and have regularly trained fire fighters and have a self-propelled motorized fire pumper. It must have that first to start with. Then of course a municipality must participate in the county so that it can go to any fire when it is called upon and all that. The municipality agrees to make the additional fire pumper available for any fire emergency measure or exercise approved by the fire marshal. If the fire marshal approves this exercise, and the EMO orders it, out it goes, and I presume at that time if there is only this one piece of equipment, then the arrangements are made that no fire occurs in that municipality.

In this whole matter, Mr. Chairman and Mr. Minister, I was very interested to—

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): There is nobody in the press gallery.

Mr. Young: That is all right. We quite realize that and these are still important.

I would like to call to the hon. Minister's attention certain items which have been brought under these conditions and then to ask certain questions. First of all, we had a fire—I am sorry the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Yakabuski) is not here because one of the first fire pumpers, I understand, was delivered at Douglas—and a clipping of July 23, 1964, from the Eganville paper tells us about the way in which the local people were on their toes. When they found out about this largesse of the senior levels of government, they immediately applied for and got a brand new fire pumper. Members of a fire committee are to be commended for their quick action in applying for the grant under EMO, under the provisions of the emergency measures financial assistance programme.

I understand they did have an old pump. It was under-capacity in one of those areas in that part of Renfrew county, but certainly this fire pumper was not replacing any efficient kind of equipment. I understand now that Douglas and the surrounding areas have a nice piece of fire equipment which is looked upon as local fire equipment, not as supplementary.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether that old pumper is still in existence; if it is, that is, carrying out the letter of the law? But we see what happened here; the people said, "Now we are getting grants, we can afford the equipment, we are going to get it." I do not quarrel with that principle; I think that Douglas and these municipalities had every right to have some fire equipment, and perhaps they had every right to have grants from the provincial Treasury and the federal Treasury to get this equipment. My question is, what vital part did EMO have in securing this equipment? I ask the hon. Minister if a junior clerk in his own department could not have made the decision, could not have handled the paper, the application, and have put the stamp of approval on it.

The other thing that I would raise for the hon. Attorney General's consideration is this: I would think that these grants ought to go first of all—and there was a real scramble for the grants, I understand—to the areas that might be in greatest danger. Perhaps with the equipment and the plants up the Ottawa River, perhaps Douglas and that part of Renfrew county might conceivably have a bomb dropped on them at some future time, I do not know. But a rural area like this—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: To protect the House of Commons.

Mr. Young: To protect the House of Commons, the hon. Minister of Mines says, so we see them scrambling down from Douglas to help the Ottawa fire department protect the House of Commons. Perhaps we can also call on them from up here—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: We have a very efficient staff.

Mr. Young: But why in the world this rural area should get the first pumper, when it seems it is one of the minimum danger areas for the nuclear bomb to fall, is beyond my comprehension.

Then I would call the attention of the hon. Minister to another situation which I would ask his opinion upon and that is Belleville, where their pumper, an old 1949 pumper, was sold to Woodville. After that sale, the application was made for the new grant, for the new pumper, under these conditions. My understanding in reading these regulations is that a municipality is not supposed to sell old equipment in this way. It is to maintain its old equipment, then it is to get this equipment as supplementary equipment. The town of Belleville got this new equipment after it had sold a piece of old equipment to the town of Woodville. I would like to ask whether or not this is carrying out the rules.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is two municipalities where you have lost their votes.

Mr. Young: I am not worrying about Belleville at this moment. We will worry about that a little later on.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Young: In any case, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister perhaps can answer the question here as to why this took place, and what happened there.

There is one other question that I would like to ask him, and that is regarding Port Hope. Tenders were called in Port Hope in the usual way after the application was made for their pumper, and I understand that in Port Hope various companies tendered for the business. I would think logical in a municipality, that providing those tenders met the specifications—and I understand they all did—that they would have been interested in the lowest tender which was for $15,065. But the pumper was bought for $16,995.

Several hon. members: Shame! Shame!

Mr. Young: In other words, EMO sanctioned an extra $2,000 of expenditure in this case of public funds which it had no business to sanction. So we are asking a question about Port Hope. I understand the firemen there are very concerned. They got their new equipment, but they could have saved themselves tax money in this case. And the voters could have saved a little money. But their point of view seemed to have been, "We are not worried too much because we are getting all this money from the federal and provincial governments so why not spend it?"

I call this to the hon. Minister's attention, and I ask him why it is that we need EMO for this one purpose of pushing paper across the desk, making certain assessments of this kind which any fire marshal or fire chief could make and then make recommendations. Surely he has men in his department who could look after this kind of a situation? When I see a statement like Chief Mackey made here a while ago, that if a disaster came, he was not going to give up his command of his police to any EMO chief, certainly the fire chiefs are not going to give theirs up and be co-ordinated by somebody who has not been doing this job.

So, Mr. Chairman, I ask this House, what purpose is served by this organization? What purpose is served by this grant of money? After all, we have efficient fire fighters, and we are co-ordinated across the province. We are getting more and more efficient police departments across this province and we are co-ordinating them.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Now you have lost all the municipal votes, and the fire chiefs.

Mr. Young: I hope one of these fine days we are going to have efficient regional municipal government, Mr. Minister of Mines. This will come, I think, in spite of the backwardness of some of the hon. members on the opposite benches.

Why do we need EMO to co-ordinate these efficient forces when EMO has demonstrated nothing yet of efficiency?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Young: If asking for efficiency is losing municipal votes, Mr. Chairman, then I ask the hon. Minister to explain his statement.

An hon. member: Are you preaching for a call?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Prime Minister cannot keep the Cabinet Ministers quiet, I would suggest we should have adjourned at 11:30. This inevitably happens. We have had three Cabinet Ministers interrupting all the time.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: Will you sit silent if you do not want to listen? The hon. Prime Minister has said we are to continue with the estimates.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, if I could complete in two or three minutes, I could say I have talked to a good many people who have participated in EMO organization.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this frivolous sort of heckling that goes on is quite out of order in this House. The hon. member for Yorkview has participated very little in this debate, he has important matters that he wishes to call to the attention of the hon. Attorney General and of the House. I think it is regrettable that the hon. Prime Minister insists on them being dealt with at this time of night when his own members treat the whole proceeding of the House as a joke, and trample into the dirt the business of the House. I think this is most regrettable, but I submit to you, sir that you should at least keep them in order so that the hon. member can deal with the matters—important matters—that he wants to deal with.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: You are the only joker in the House, Bryden.

Mr. Chairman: Order, Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if you cannot get the hon. Minister of Mines to be quiet, then I do not think that this House should continue. I thought he had learned after the last few months that he opened his mouth too often.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order. The member for Yorkview will continue with his address.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, if we ever had a demonstration of the futility of EMO and the low regard in which the hon. members of this House hold EMO and the whole organization, we certainly had it tonight. EMO, as far as this House is concerned, is a joke, and the House treats it as a joke. Then why should we be spending this amount of money on something which this House regards as nothing short of a joke?

When I talk to people who have participated in EMO organizations, they tell me they are sick of playing cards night after night and they have quit. They learned to be card sharks, but they did not learn anything about the business of protecting ourselves in case of an emergency.

This kind of thing has happened time after time, and we have seen the money of this province and of this Dominion frittered away in this organization. It is high time we faced up to the fact that this House looks upon it as a joke, and that this item ought to be cut out of this estimate.

Mr. Chairman, I move that items four and five be stricken out of this vote.

Mr. Chairman: I have no motion in writing.

Mr. Bryden: I move that items four and five of vote 208 be struck out. Is that clear enough?

Mr. Chairman: In writing.

Mr. MacDonald: All right, Mr. Chairman, if the rules are going to be strictly enforced by the Clerk, then just give us a moment and we will submit it in writing. If you want to get technical around here, fine; we will just have to reduce the whole thing to a shambles. You are heading for it already.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Your remarks do not help the situation.

Mr. MacDonald: I agree. Did you listen to the hon. Minister of Mines? Do you think that helped the situation? Did you listen to yourself earlier in the evening? Did that help the situation? Look who is preaching now!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let us have the amendment.

Mr. MacDonald: Right. Okay. Sometime you people will learn that you yourselves make a shambles—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bryden moves that items four and five of vote 208 be struck out. All those in—

Mr. Singer: No. This is a standard motion. There is a lot of debate to take place on it yet before the vote is to be called on this motion.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of the motion—

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I will speak in connection with this motion and I have quite a few remarks to make on it. I concur wholeheartedly with what the hon. member who spoke before me has said. I am also going to say, sir, that if we come to this House in order to listen to remarks like yours, I would suggest that we might as well go to a vaudeville place.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate that you will have order here, sir, and some respect—it is the hon. member for Scarborough Centre to whom I am referring.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Thompson: May I start, Mr. Chairman?

I would say, sir, that we have a real question in connection with EMO. I think that there has been a great deal of confusion about what its role is. I think one of the very real questions has been that there was an impression that EMO was going to look after survival.

I remember, in previous discussions, where it was suggested by another Minister, who was in charge prior to the hon. Attorney General, that there would be an army of volunteers all around the province. This was when I first came into the House, and this Minister stood up and told us that he had this army of volunteers. Then, as we pushed further to find out just exactly where this mythical army of volunteers was, at that time the previous Prime Minister, the hon. Leslie Frost, came in. And, as he often did when a Minister got into difficulty or got a little too obstreperous, he stood up and took over from him. In this situation he stood up and said that, in a national emergency, the responsibility is that of the army, not of a voluntary group. So, just by his words, was dispelled a whole mythical approach which was being developed by the then Minister of Economics and Development.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Chairman, could I inform the hon. leader of the Opposition of what happens up in Perth county?

An hon. member: How long does this have to go on?

Mr. Edwards: He has not been informed; they have an EMO in Perth county—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: I would suggest, sir, that this is reported in Hansard. I refer this to the hon. member and I would suggest it is a very—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would say that I have heard a number of remarks from this—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I was rather hoping that your remarks would follow the remarks of the hon. member because I am quite sure that the hon. Attorney General will have some remarks to make too. This item is within his jurisdiction, and I am sure that he will want to explain the approach that the government has to it. However, I had hoped that these might follow some sequence so that we might have what could be termed an orderly debate, even though it might keep us here a little later than we may have been here previously, this evening.

I think we are going to have to extend the hours of sitting of the House: There have been many remarks made about the relevancy of the items that are taking place in the examination of the estimates, and if it is going to take a long time we are going to have to sit longer hours. I would suggest to hon. members that a little more attention be paid to the relevancy of the debate to the items which are being considered in the estimates. The comments which have been made at the moment concerning EMO, I think, are very much in order. I cannot say that I can wholeheartedly support and say that a lot that has been said in the last few weeks in the estimates has been relevant; and if we are to have irrelevancies we will, of course, have to arrange for routines which will keep us a little closer to the rules. I simply say this; I do not want to place any restriction on what the hon. members have to say—and I think you will have to agree that a wide degree of latitude has been allowed—but, if it is abused, of course we will have to get back to somewhat more strict interpretation of the rules of the House.

I am going to move that the committee rise and report progress and, in so doing, I hope that all hon. members of the House will consider what I have said, with a view to a somewhat more speedy dispatch of the business of the House and some higher degree of relevancy in the remarks that are made here in this debate.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say, sir, that certainly during this debate, we have appreciated—and I certainly speak for my party on this—the thoughtfulness and consideration given by the hon. Attorney General to the questions which have been carefully researched over a period of time by my hon. colleague and others in my party. But what we have not appreciated is the fact that there has been a tendency for ridicule, and for a misunderstanding on the part of some of the hon. members, of the job as we see it as an Opposition—to raise questions. And if it takes longer, and if it is more inconvenient to us as members, and if we are going to have to spend longer, we still maintain that that is our duty.

We make no apology for the fact that, many of the suggestions we bring before the hon. Attorney General, which we have researched carefully, will take time. Because, you see, our role as an Opposition is not only to try to raise questions, but also to offer suggestions. We have appreciated—and I want to re-emphasize this—that you, sir, have stood out as an example, I would say, for some others to follow, in the very great co-operation and consideration, and gentlemanly approach, with which you have conducted this debate.

Mr. MacDonald: On a point of order, the hon. Prime Minister has intervened rather quietly here. I am persuaded that the hon. Prime Minister is not any happier about the kind of situations which emerge in this House periodically than anybody else. But I would like to make this serious suggestion to the hon. Prime Minister.

If he wants to extend the hours of the House, I would much prefer that the House convene at two o'clock, and on even more nights a week. Indeed, I do not know whether the hon. Prime Minister is going to announce publicly that he has requested Monday nights from this point forward, other than the 24th. But I would much prefer that we meet at two o'clock in the afternoon, than trying to sit after 11 o'clock at night. It is surely evident, and must be evident after tonight, that it is impossible on the government side of the House to conduct an orderly handling of the business of the House as well as anything else. I am not being critical of them, because I think nobody should have to sit after 11 o'clock at night. If you want an extra hour or so, put it in between two and three in the afternoon; and I make that as a serious suggestion to the hon. Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, just to complete this, on the question of sitting at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, I have given it a lot of consideration. But I would only indicate to you from my own experience—for instance in this week—as far as this side of the House is concerned, we have had three caucuses. We have had three Cabinet meetings that have run a full period of time, and my experience in other years is that if we sit at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, then you simply do not have the men in the House who are responsible for the administration of government. As soon as some of the workload dealing with legislation lightens and the committees are not meeting as frequently as they have been, I have every intention of moving the hours forward to 2 o'clock.

I will have something to say when I move the adjournment of the House, about the future business of the House.

I would just say in answer to the remarks of the hon. leader of the Opposition, that it is not my intent at any time to prevent the hon. members making what comments they want in this House. On the other hand, I would say this, that what I am asking for is for somewhat closer attention to be paid to the rules because I think many of these remarks that are made here might very well be made in some other place, and I think that we are going to have to have, and ask for, a little more relevancy.

This is the point that I make. There is no desire on my part to prevent any hon. member from speaking about anything he likes. But there are places which are appropriate according to the rules, and there are others that are not. I just mention this, in the hope that some attention will be paid to it, and that we will not have to get into too strict an interpretation of the rules, which inevitably leads to a restriction of debate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the committee rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report a certain resolution and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will conduct the debate on the report of the committee studying youth problems and the Budget debate, and on completion of that, we will return to these estimates.

I would like to sit on Monday night and the House will not sit on Monday, May 24, which is a holiday. It is so long since this Legislature has been in session on May 24, that the physical difficulties in getting staff here and so on—because the buildings will be empty that day—I really think it would be simpler if we were not to sit on Monday the 24th, but we will sit on Monday night and every other Monday night thereafter.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Could the hon. Prime Minister give us some indication of the estimate lineup? I understand there will be Public Works and Treasury and Civil Service. What is beyond that, or has there been any change in that?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, there has been no change. Public Works and then Civil Service and then Treasury; and there is some doubt at the moment as to what will follow those, but as soon as I have that resolved I will tell the House.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 12.15 o'clock, a.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, MAY 14, 1965

The House met at 10:30 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome as guests to the Legislature today in the west gallery, students from Lynhurst public school, Aylmer.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to announce that The Department of Lands and Forests has been informed that Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company, Limited, will undertake a mill expansion at its Kapuskasing plant which, we are informed, will involve expenditures of approximately $20 million. It will mean that a new 100,000-ton annual capacity unit will be constructed, and the present 50,000-ton unit closed down. This will mean that about 60,000 additional cords of wood will be required annually, and employment for approximately 100 additional men in the woods is indicated.

The end result would be to bring the annual cut of the Spruce Falls Company, Limited, to about half a million cords a year. I am glad also to say that because of the regeneration agreement with this company which the department has, this type of increase can be undertaken with assurance that the supply of wood will be available for the future, the tree-planting programme being adequate to take care of the long-term future requirements.

The operations of this company began in Kapuskasing 40 years ago, and it has been a successful and well managed operation. The New York Times has a daily interest in it.

This latest move is in line with the further development of the facilities which this province affords to users of our forest products, and is but one of a number of projects involving expansion of existing plants and facilities, and renewed and continued confidence in the ability of this province to keep pace in this particular industry.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The third order, resuming the adjourned debate on the interim report of the select committee on youth.

Mr. S. Apps (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a prolonged speech today because when I tabled the report on April 9 I think I outlined at that time the scope of the work of the committee, and what we had accomplished so far.

However, I do want to put on record a small correction in the report on page 10, at the bottom of the page, and the words "15 years of age to 24 years, inclusive" should be deleted. That particular paragraph should now read:

The total labour force in Ontario June 1, 1961, was made up of 1,700,567 males, 692,448 females, formulating a total of 2,393,015.

I do want to reiterate again how impressed the committee has been with the interest that has been shown by those many people who are working with the young people of Ontario, and the tremendous help that they have been to our committee thus far. We feel that our work is only partially completed, and we feel that it is a most important work.

I would like at this time to ask that our committee on youth be reappointed so that we can carry on this most important work that we have begun.

Hon. J. P. Roberts (Prime Minister) moves that order No. 3 be discharged from the notice paper.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The first order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, the teaching of religion in the public schools of Ontario is based on a regulation secured by The Department of Education in 1944 which reads as follows:

Subject to the regulations two periods per week of one-half hour each, in addition to the time assigned to religious exercises at the opening of school, shall be devoted to religious education.

This is the basic regulation that has controlled this matter in the public schools of Ontario for the last 21 years. Further regulations set out a group of Teachers' Guides, published by Ryerson Press, that are to be used, and have been used, over this period of time in the classroom.

The teaching is done either by the regular classroom teacher or by a minister of the community invited to do this by the local board. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that municipalities may opt out of this programme as a whole, and, of course, any individual student may be excused from the instruction, but during the last few months the question of whether or not this programme—the only one of its type in Canada—should be continued, has been hotly argued by citizens and at the Ontario educational association a few weeks ago, and by editorial writers across the province.

The problem, I believe, has been presented to Judge McRuer for his consideration as a possible infringement of individual liberty. During the time of the educational convention in Toronto at Easter, some sort of announcement came from The Department of Education. It appeared almost from the back door. I believe the Toronto Globe and Mail got it first and featured it in its headlines on the front page, that the government itself was responding to some of this debate and discussion and was itself considering the institution of yet another committee to delve into the possibility of change or perhaps elimination of the instruction in religion in the public schools.

In my opinion, the government should examine its policy with a view to eliminating this form of teaching of religion in our public schools, and I would like to take some of the time at my disposal this morning to express my views to the House in more detail.

I do not want to take too extensive an historical approach, but I do feel that this should be a time in which I might emphasize the fact that the reading of the Bible, and prayer, in our school system has been established for many years and should continue to be so established. Nevertheless, the relationship between church and state in Canada is different on the one hand from what it is in England where there is an established church, and on the other hand from what it is in the US. There, the separation of church and state is an absolute thing; it is placed in the Constitution and all of us have read with great care, I believe, not only the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States, but the reaction to these rulings across the country wherein they expressed the view—and a view which would be followed in schools in the United States—that even the Lord's prayer, or any prayer, and the use of the Bible, is in fact unconstitutional in the schools in the United States.

This is not our background; this is not my proposal. There is nothing in my comments, and I would like to make this clear to begin with, that would eliminate the use of the Bible or the Lord's prayer, or any other suitable prayer, from use in our public schools.

As a matter of fact, the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) was good enough some weeks ago to send a copy of a very old textbook used in the schools of Upper Canada more than a century ago, in which it was quite clear that scripture verses and the morals that they carried were used in the readers of those days, and used, I am sure, very effectively; but we sometimes forget what our early customs actually were. There are several instances where Egerton Ryerson has been quoted on his views in setting up the education system of Ontario, and on whether or not religion should be a part of the curriculum, and I suppose his views are summed up in the regulation for which he was responsible, which states:

Pupils shall be allowed to receive such religious instruction as their parents and guardians desire.

This was the other side of the coin. The parents could direct the local school board to institute a programme of religious studies, normally outside of regular school hours. In other words, they could opt into such a programme. The way it stands now, the programme is established and the responsibility of the individual parents and the school board is to opt out, if they so desire.

Ryerson, in taking a survey of religious practices in the schools of the province in 1858, said that in his view not one in 20 of the schools of which he had knowledge had regular daily prayers and use of the Bible. It is interesting to note that when this assembly itself came into being in 1867, there was no thought of opening our deliberations with prayers and it was not until some years after that, actually during the time that Mr. Blake, and later Mr. Mowat, were looking after the affairs of the province, that we find the resolution in the journals of the province that sets up a committee to study the possibility of this. It is interesting to read the committee report, in which they recommend the prayers that are used by Mr. Speaker daily and it is also interesting to note that the report permits outsiders, local ministers and presumably the clerk, to read the prayers to the legislative assembly if that is convenient, and it has been so during this very session.

Therefore, our traditions changed during the later Victorian era; the use of prayers and Bible readings in the schools became much more heavily entrenched than it had been up until that time. Of course, I was quite interested in reading some of the remarks made by George Brown, who was a foe of Ryerson in many ways. He criticized Ryerson's establishment of the school system, his centralization of control and what he called his Prussian ways, on every occasion. But he agreed with him in this matter, and in the speech that he gave just before Confederation itself, at Quebec City, his views were summed up in the view that religious instruction has no place in a mixed and public school.

As I say, I do not want to dwell too long on the historical background but I think many of us in this Chamber would be interested in the events in 1944, and 1945, which established the regulation that controls the teaching of religion in our schools as it presently exists.

In the years just before the war, an organization in Ontario went from community to community urging the local school boards to opt into the religious instruction programme. They had great success, as school after school decided that they would institute this programme of religious teaching. But it was not until the change of administration in 1943, that Mr. Drew, the new Prime Minister, brought in the regulation that presently governs this affair. In the year following, in the second session of the new administration, it is interesting to note that in the debate that ended in the defeat of the government on another motion, the motion put forward by the second Opposition party, which at that time was the Liberal Party, was critical of the government for introducing this measure.

It is interesting also to note, Mr. Speaker, that the government was sustained through the votes of their own supporters and the votes of a large segment of the then official Opposition, the CCF Party. As a matter of fact, in the very next vote, as I read the record of the day, the government was defeated; and in the subsequent election, in which I suppose the teaching of religion in the schools was one of the issues, the government was returned with a large majority. Obviously the citizens of the province approved of the change that they had made.

Nevertheless, 21 years have passed. Our population has changed dramatically. We now have people with many ethnic and religious backgrounds in all areas of the province. We look to our public school, certainly with established Bible reading and the use of prayer, as an institution in which no religious practice as such should be an established religious practice. We see that, since Confederation and before, the Roman Catholic citizens of the province, and in other areas of the country, have had the privilege of having separate schools, particularly for the teaching of religion in this special way. But, over a number of years, other parochial schools, which do not have the advantage of public support, have been established.

In my own community, we have Dutch Reformed Church schools; we have a small but growing Amish community, which does insist on having its separate school system; and it seems to me that, with a large variety of religious and ethnic backgrounds in our country, the way it is now, it is our overriding responsibility to see to it that the public schools are, in fact, completely public and completely democratic and take no established position which could in any way offend any of these groups and, in fact, urge them or give them the compulsion to look to the establishment of their own parochial schools. I feel that this is something that we should consider very seriously when we see the tremendous expenditure on education to which we are already committed.

I would like to say that, in my opinion, there is much good teaching of religion in the schools of the province. I attend the United Church in my community and my own minister takes part in this programme, so my personal objections should be viewed perhaps in that light. But it is true that in many schools the regular classroom teacher has this responsibility and, in others, the local minister comes in.

Both of these groups are directed to teach the curriculum, or the course of religious studies following a very definite curriculum laid down by The Department of Education. But, in a news report, one of the more interesting ones dealing with this matter, that appeared in the Globe and Mail of April 23, 1965, I believe, on a discussion at the Ontario educational association, Reverend Frank Peake, director of religious education for the Anglican diocese of Huron, from London, Ontario, said that the books used are based on English text and have been changed very little. I quote:

They represent a monopolistic assumption on the part of Christianity that we are no longer prepared to make.

He further said that he does not know why they have not been changed, and in fact we should ask Mr. Davis about this.

I do not want to dwell on this point, but I can remember asking the hon. Minister of Education about this in the past, and he assured me and assured the House that the matter was under constant review. Now, what that meant, I do not know. But here is someone who is obviously qualified to pass a comment, and he says that it is seriously out of date and is taking a monopolistic approach to religion that simply is inadmissible today.

Further on in this same article, one of the teachers who is not named in this report indicated that, although the curriculum is available, he himself does not use it. As a matter of fact, I quote his words: "I threw the guide book away 20 years ago." And this is the point: Although there is good religious instruction offered in our classrooms, in most cases it is a personal view, not only of the religion itself, but of what should be presented.

In the case of the layman, I submit that he does not have the deep religious faith, or in many cases he would not have the deep religious faith, that would make this instruction meaningful to the young people. In the case of the cleric who attends the classroom to deliver this instruction, I am quite sure that, if he is worth his salt, it would be very difficult for him to be hidebound by the watered-down version in the books that are prescribed — which, in fact, represent the lowest common denominator of more or less accepted Protestantism. On the one hand, it does not do justice to the faith which a good many of us in this Chamber respect so deeply; and, on the other, it is an intrusion into the democratic and civil liberties of the individual parents and the students who are exposed to the programme.

So, as I have said, it is often a personal point of view on the material provided, or as to what should be provided. My understanding is that there is very little inspection of what goes on in these classrooms. I have also heard, since it was in the news a few weeks ago, that there has been a great deal of tightening up by the individual school boards. I have talked to a number of teachers who are responsible for the programme, and they have indicated to me that over the years they have more or less established a course of their own that they feel would be useful in presenting ethics to the young people under their care. Apparently there is recently a much more rigid inspection of what is going on, because I suppose those with responsibility in this matter realize that what they are doing is going to be looked into rather carefully, if the government proceeds in their announced plan—I believe it is an announced plan—to set up a committee to examine it.

Certainly the aim of the programme is not to proselytize, but to teach Christian morals and ethics. I am quite sure that this can be done by example in the school and in the home, and certainly the main responsibility lies with the Christian church itself in our community.

The Public School Act at one time, and up until very recently, set out these responsibilities — the responsibilities to act as an example — in very interesting terms. The teacher was instructed to inculcate, by precept and example, respect for religion, and the principles of Christian morality, and the highest regard for truth, justice, loyalty, love of country, humanity, benevolence, sobriety, industry, frugality, purity, temperance and all other virtues.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Sounds like the government.

Mr. Nixon: It is interesting to note that the statute was originally framed, and I believe this part has not been changed, to provide for visitors to the public schools. All of us as members of this assembly are visitors to the local public schools, and we can enter at will and take part in any exercise that is going on, and we are free to address our remarks to the teachers and the students on any matter that we feel would be of some importance. I think this is a responsibility that not all of us take to heart or take too seriously, but it is interesting that this is in the statutes and would permit that sort of activity.

But I do feel that the watered-down approved version of Protestantism that is presented in the teachers' guide, does not do justice to the deep faith that Christianity must have. On the other hand, I believe that the inclusion of religious instruction in our curriculum is, in many ways, an infringement on the democratic nature of the public education system.

Nevertheless, in closing this part of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I believe that moral and ethical values are essential in our school system. The teaching of these values cannot be left to chance. If a committee could come up with some type of instruction that would effectively inculcate these values in our young people, it would receive the whole-hearted support of everyone. But until such a course of instruction is devised, I believe that the regulation defining religious instructions in our public schools should be rescinded.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a few moments to deal with one other matter that has some application in the curriculum of our school system. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we in the Legislature should authorize the Minister of Education to undertake a compulsory, specific, and certainly effective educational war on alcohol in our school system.

As a member of the committee on commissions, I have had an opportunity to question the officials of the liquor licence board of Ontario and the liquor control board of Ontario as to their views on the rising number of cases involving juveniles and alcoholic beverage; where the law has been broken in any one of a number of ways; in traffic accidents and in street brawls. It is apparent, and the statistics would bear this out—although they are not as complete in these commissions of the government as they should be—that this is exploding into a tremendous problem affecting the young people of Ontario, and I suppose of every other jurisdiction.

As I say, the statistics are not complete, but report after report from different provinces of Canada, would indicate that those agencies that deal with young people, not only the schools but the YMCA, and this sort of thing, are recognizing the problem as a great one and a growing one.

In my experience in teaching, it has become apparent to me that young people, particularly in the early grades of high school, are very impressionable about this sort of thing. I would not suggest that a course be set up that would frighten them into temperance or abstinence, simply that the facts of the use of alcohol beverage be made known to them in a very straightforward way—the statistics associated with alcoholism; the statistics associated with traffic accidents; what actually happens to the human body when alcohol is taken into its system. If this is made known to the young people of Ontario, then I feel their decision, and it must be a personal decision as to how they are going to use beverage alcohol, could then be made on a basis that we could accept. It would not simply be under the compulsion of mass advertising. It would not simply be the response to group psychology, although this would of course always play a part in it. If it were effectively presented in the schools of the province of Ontario, not as a great temperance programme, but simply as a factual programme available in their science or health courses, and not dependent just on a single teacher who might be interested in it, or a teacher who finds time for the subject, but something that would be definitely presented to each student, then I am sure it would have a great effect in at least partly coping with the problem that is before us.

I have been very much impressed by the work of the alcoholism and drug addiction foundation in the province of Ontario. I have seen the large advertisements, in the newspapers and on television, that are released in the province of Ontario, and they would certainly be of the type that would give young people and parents pause to think about the necessity of leadership of our young people in this matter. This is the agency that could provide schools with pamphlets, filmstrips and precise courses of study, which, when properly applied, would be of great aid to our young people in meeting this emergency problem that is developing in such great proportion.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would say that a mandatory and factual course would assist our young people in meeting this great problem of our society.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in the interim between my last Budget appearance and this one, my friend, the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), has introduced his Medicare bill, the introduction of which has confirmed my fear that the chiropractors and optometrists would not be included in the bill. It is against this background that I would like to make a few remarks this morning.

I think it is obvious to the government that we are going to be under the greatest kind of pressure in this province to provide for the health-care workers of all kinds who will be needed to meet the increasing demand for health services on the part of our people.

We shall be directly involved, not only in helping people pay their medical bills, but also in finding someone for them to pay them to. This, to my way of thinking, is just as important as the financial one, from a health-care standpoint. It does not matter how universal, or how generous insurance, benefits for health care may be. If the individual must wait months for services of health care, then it is of no use, or no value.

Providing medical or other forms of health benefits without providing for sufficient personnel in the field, is like selling a ticket to a theatregoer and then telling him that he has no place to sit down. Although there is no doubt in my mind that the present government step to increase our supply of health-care workers is coming too late, nevertheless I believe we should be grateful that the government has announced this plan to do something to provide more doctors, dentists and nurses for the province. Even so, we will not have enough professional health workers.

Even if the government's programme had come in time, even if we had stretched our resources to the utmost, even then, we would still be facing a crisis for the next few years. It is no secret, for example, that most doctors already work intolerable hours. I think my hon. friend would agree with that—perhaps intolerable and dangerously long hours.

Dr. Claude Gendron, past president of the college of general practice, said recently:

Answering patients' requests kept me working 85 hours a week, but I do not think I was carrying a heavier load than most other general practitioners.

The man who works 85 hours a week has no time left to increase his professional competence. He has no time, for that matter, to renew his own health and spirit. Fatigue and pressure, in all but the most exceptional, lead to a reduction of their competence when they are on the job for hours. This is the situation today with the medical profession, and to my mind, the handwriting is on the wall, but it will get worse before it gets better.

Under this kind of pressure, both the doctors and the patients will suffer. In this situation, it is our obvious responsibility to do everything we possibly can to reduce the pressure on our doctors.

One giant step that can be taken in this direction is to be found in the encouragement of the paramedical profession; in the provision of health workers who talk about it in almost production line terms, who can be produced faster than MDs.

Obvious ones leap to mind: Medical technicians, nurses, registered nursing assistants—a whole host of professions and subprofessions, which work with the doctors in the provision of health care. I believe we have been extraordinarily neglectful in this field. I believe we have failed almost totally to tackle this branch of our health-care problem.

In his Budget speech, my hon. leader (Mr. Thompson) talked about this problem and suggested ways in which we could take steps to increase the supply of nurses and registered nursing assistants. I should like to speak briefly about another area in which we might more fully utilize the resources at our disposal. As hon. members undoubtedly know, Mr. Speaker, practitioners of chiropractic have been making a substantial contribution to the solution of specific kinds of health problems for more than half a century. It is no secret that chiropractors have been plagued on the one hand by opposition from the senior branches of the medical profession, and on the other hand by the reluctance of the government to recognize the profession and to give chiropractors the necessary legislation in order that they might be able to police their own profession more adequately.

I do not propose to talk about the scientific discussion which rages over the theory and practice of chiropractic. This is outside my competence. However, I do believe that the profession has amply demonstrated that it has a contribution to make to the health of the nation. I believe, too, that the chiropractic profession is ready, even eager, to assume a more definitely defined role in health services. This has been done very recently in the province of Saskatchewan, as is pointed out in this article. It is dated April 6, 1965, in the Regina Leader-Post. It is entitled:

LEGISLATURE APPROVES CHIROPRACTIC INCLUSION

The Legislature Tuesday approved unanimously a resolution moved by Henry Baker, CCF, Regina East, recommending the government consider the inclusion of chiropractic services under The Saskatchewan Medical Health Insurance Act.

The two CCF and two Liberal members who spoke on the motion appeared in rare accord on the subject, which took only 20 minutes to gain the assembly's approval.

Health Minister Steuart said he had already met members of the profession in Saskatchewan about the possibility of having their services considered in the Medicare plan.

Then the article goes on to say, in part:

Chiropractors are the third healing profession in the world, after medicine and dentistry, and they made 5,000 service calls in Saskatchewan last year, he said. He said he hoped their services would be included in the plan this year, if possible.

He added that the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta have legislation allowing the chiropractic services to be included as insured medical services.

Mr. Speaker, Saskatchewan has recognized the role of the chiropractor. I think an appropriate question at this juncture would be: Why not Ontario? The best review of the present situation with regard to the status of the chiropractor that I have seen is contained in the report of the Hall commission on health services:

The controversy has been going on for upwards of half a century and is one that ought to be faced and resolved in the public interest.

The report goes on to state that:

It was considered that an independent scientific study be undertaken to resolve the issue. However, such a study is currently being conducted in Quebec by Mr. Justice Lacroix of the Supreme Court of Quebec, and his inquiry is still proceeding.

If the study now being carried on concludes that the position taken by the medical profession is the correct one, then all Canadians should be made aware of it. If, on the other hand, the claims of the chiropractors are found to be valid, then they should be incorporated into and integrated with the teaching of health sciences in universities. No good can come from warring factions between competitors in the health-care field.

The Hall commission states:

It is, in our view, fundamental to good health care that all who labour legitimately in the field should do so in harmonious co-operation.

The chiropractors feel that they are justified in requesting that patients should be free to choose chiropractic services, even without a physician's prescription, and not have to suffer the financial penalties by using services not authorized under Medicare legislation.

The chiropractors point, for example, to the fact that patients can choose chiropractic treatment under The Workmen's Compensation Act, without suffering financial penalties.

To expect a doctor to recommend that a patient go to a chiropractor just will not happen. For many, many years the medical profession took every opportunity to criticize chiropractors and their method of practice. Today, overwhelming proof of the effectiveness of the chiropractic principle is to be found everywhere, and even medicine finally realizes that it cannot continue to dismiss volumes of evidence as poppycock.

The problem arises for the local medical doctor. More and more of his patients are asking about chiropractic services because they have a backache, a headache or a slipped disc. His professional association tells him that it is unethical to associate with a chiropractor in the treatment of a patient, or to refer patients to him, so he remains ethical by doing a number of things: he tries another pill; he tries perhaps to manipulate the patient himself; he tries a few weeks of physiotherapy, and if that fails then the patient will undoubtedly go to the chiropractor in the end, in any case.

Who suffers from this, what I term, rather ridiculous situation? Certainly not the medical doctor who has more than he can do now; certainly not the physiotherapist, and certainly not the chiropractor, because the patient eventually comes to him anyway. The only one who suffers under these circumstances is the patient. He suffers both physically and financially. Until organized medicine comes to grips with this problem and decides that the time has come for an end to this conflict in the health service field, we will continue to witness this rather ludicrous situation.

As it now stands, the chiropractic profession operates under The Drugless Practitioners Act, an Act that embraces, I believe, at least three other professions. If a charge of improper or unethical conduct is laid against a chiropractor by the chiropractic association, it has to be done under The Drugless Practitioners Act.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, may I put the hon. member straight in this matter? This is not fact, Mr. Speaker. The chiropractors some years ago were given, by legislation, the right to separate themselves from the supervision of The Drugless Practitioners Act. They are ruled by their own board, they have their own powers of policing, and only a little more than a year ago, I believe, they were given the regulations which they deemed were necessary to control unethical advertising in their own profession. But they are not subject to the direction or control of the board of drugless practitioners.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister then, am I right in saying that we do not have a chiropractic Act in this province as such?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: They do not have a chiropractic Act, but the chiropractors are controlled by a board of their own people.

Mr. Gaunt: But they do not have an Act?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: They do not have an Act. They operate under The Drugless Practitioners Act but they are controlled by their own people, and disciplined by their own people.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Speaker, I was unaware of this and I am glad of the interjection of the hon. Minister of Health, who clarified this particular point.

However, I would at this point go even further. I think that the chiropractors should have an Act of their own. I think they should have a chiropractic Act to, perhaps, more carefully define the area of professional competence of the chiropractor, to provide for closer supervision of professional training.

In my earlier remarks about the critical shortage of health-care workers with which we will be faced in the immediate future, I said that we should make maximum use of the paramedical personnel and thereby reduce the situation that all general practitioners and other professions have to face. It is in this context that I would like my suggestion on the chiropractic profession to be reviewed. I do not want my remarks to be seen as another scrimmage in the long and very unpleasant battle between the chiropractors and the MDs. That would not serve the public good. What will serve the public good is our determination that we leave no stone unturned in our effort to ensure that the people of Ontario will have available to them the widest possible variety, and the greatest possible quantity, of genuine medical services.

It is upon this basis that I would strongly recommend that chiropractors be included in any proposed medicare legislation; and, as we know, up until this point, it has not been. The hon. Minister has not included it in his bill which he presented just this week.

In the same connection, I would like to put in a word for the optometrists in this province. As I stated before, a medicare plan would provide health-care benefits and, as such, requires the participation and co-operation of health-care professions. In Bill 163, coverage of refraction benefits were included only when provided by a physician. However, let me point out that there are three times as many optometrists as ophthalmolo-gists in Ontario. At present, optometrists perform 65 per cent of the refractions in Ontario. In addition, in 60 per cent of the Ontario communities in which optometrists practise, they are the only practitioners available to provide the service of refraction.

I would strongly suggest that, unless optometrists are included in any medicare plan, it would mean a decrease in availability of vision-care services and subsequently a lowering of vision-care standards. Certainly, with this kind of situation, it will not enhance the health care in the province of Ontario.

In conclusion, I would strongly urge that my hon. friend take into consideration the inclusion of such professions as the optometrists, the chiropractors, yes, even the dentists, at the earliest possible date. I noticed in the Toronto Daily Star dated May 12, 1965, headed, "Dentacare, Opticare next, says Dymond":

"Ontario's medical care plan will be extended gradually to include dental, optical and similar services," Health Minister Matthew Dymond told a group of Brantford clergymen today.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I rise on a point of order. I would like to put the hon. member straight. This was not what I told the ministers.

Mr. Gaunt: Well, in any case, that is what it said in the paper and I had presumed that it was right.

Regardless of what it said in the paper, I would strongly urge my hon. friend to consider the inclusion of optometrists, chiropractors and dentists, for that matter, at the earliest possible date.

Mr. R. Welch (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate, I want commend the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) for placing before the Legislature a budget which I feel is firmly based on a realistic assessment of our existing circumstances and a full appreciation of the future needs and aspirations of the people of the province.

The allocation of public funds as projected in this budget will enable the government to play its essential role in the realization of our full potential for the advancement of Ontario and its people.

I am particularly impressed with the tremendous investment proposed in human capital—looking at the estimates for Education, University Affairs, Health and Public Welfare, just to name a few. It is interesting to trace this government's recognition of the need for governmental participation in promoting the development of our nation's "human capital."

To the sizeable expenditures to which I have already referred, for health, education and public welfare, we can list the many select committees of this House which have been charged with the responsibility of reporting on the general welfare of the people of Ontario, for example, the select committees on: juvenile delinquency, 1954; manpower training, 1963; cost of drugs, 1963; youth, 1964; and aging, 1964—to name only a few.

It is obvious that this government recognizes that it has a critical role to play in promoting an effective human-resource-development programme, for it continues to pay attention to our enormously valuable stock of human capital.

It is the custom for a private member to utilize an opportunity such as this to voice some personal, as well as some riding, views. The great county of Lincoln, from which I come, and the surrounding area continues to grow by leaps and bounds. Ships of practically every nation sail through the riding as they use a facility which traces its history back before the federation of British North America itself. By demonstrating that an escarpment 326 feet in height could be scaled by sailing vessels capable of traversing the Great Lakes, the Welland ship canals opened the way for the St. Lawrence seaway. Without question, the Welland ship canal is a navigational facility unequalled anywhere in the world today. It is my opinion that, because of the very existence of this canal in the peninsula, the whole area would benefit greatly with the development of harbour facilities on an adequate scale. Local chambers of commerce and boards of trade should be approached and, perhaps, our Department of Economics and Development would be prepared to give some leadership to such a programme.

The canal also attracts thousands of tourists each year. The tremendous implications for the district are clearly recognized and the St. Lawrence seaway authority is providing an observation area at the location of Lock 3. The province, working with a local committee, allocated funds as well to do a preliminary survey into the development of a third Welland canal park. A very interesting report has been produced, and I hope The Department of Lands and Forests and The Department of Tourism and Information will continue to encourage this project.

Reference was made earlier in these remarks to the advantages associated with the development of harbour facilities in this part of the province. I would also hope that we might find some way to help financially such co-operative efforts as the Niagara district airport, as it is viewed in the light of regional development. There might be some point in the departments of Economics and Development, Transport, and Municipal Affairs, considering what might be done to assist such facilities without getting involved in the jurisdictional question surrounding air transport. The emphasis should rather be on the economic growth potential of the area, stimulated as it will be by having the advantage of such facilities in the area.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would now like to turn to some other matters of general and particular interest.

Under the heading of agriculture, I would point out to you, and through you to the hon. members of the House, that agriculture forms a very essential part of the economy of the riding of Lincoln. Many of my constituents depend on this activity for their livelihood and the whole province—and indeed beyond—depend on these same constituents for the products of orchards, vineyards and farms. An interesting statistic for example is the fact that 65 per cent of the grapes grown in Canada are grown in Lincoln county.

I have a tremendous respect for the individuality, determination and independence of my rural friends. Many problems are, however, pressing in on these hard-working people. There are farms in certain sections of the riding which are going unattended as the head of the house finds his way into the "better paying industries" of the area. Many feel a sense of frustration as they toil long hours, only to see their financial rewards decrease under the pressure of higher costs which are not being offset by a corresponding increase in their prices on the market.

Little wonder, then, that there is certain resentment on the part of these people toward those who travel the area beating the drum with the theme "to save the fruitlands" and other related slogans.

The solution to this particular problem is a very simple one—if you want to save the fruitlands of the Niagara peninsula make it profitable for a man to carry out this activity. If we look far enough ahead, it is in the national interest to make sure that our rural people earn a decent living while they produce the food, not only which we need, but which is also needed by a hungry world.

Much could be said here of the efforts being made by the agricultural people of my riding to help themselves. I have been privileged to work with them as they approached this level of government for assistance and advice. An excellent recent example is the support given by the government to efforts by local growers to bring in much-needed farm labour from the British West Indies. The question of farm labour is a real problem, and in this regard our people are quite prepared to work with the federal government to provide job opportunities for our Indian people as well as a long-range project. However, we are faced with the immediate need to harvest our crops.

I do not hesitate in pointing out that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) is highly respected by my rural constituents, and he and his department work in their interests. The leadership of our county agricultural representative, and the great work at the horticultural station at Vineland are worthy of mention here. To single out one of our large agricultural activities—the fruit and vegetable industry—there are serious problems, many of which fall within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Internationally, we are faced with subsidized canned fruit coming from Australia at little or no duty on entering Canada. Low United States freight rates from California to Canada handicap movement of canned goods from point to point in Canada. Huge overproduction of such things as clingstone peaches and sweet and sour cherries in the United States can disrupt our market at any time.

While United States producers are protected by generally high tariffs, the surplus is sent to Canada and although not technically “dumped” is sold at the prevailing US distress prices.

At home, our growers supported overwhelmingly the proposal to give the Ontario tender fruit growers’ marketing board the power to determine the prices of tender fruit. While this will not solve all grower problems, it is felt that it will enable a new approach to the industry’s difficulties of negotiation and arbitration. It should, of course, never be overlooked that we, as consumers, can do much to help our grower-brethren, as well as those who process these products. In the spirit of the Ontario trade crusade we can be sure that we buy Ontario canned fruit and vegetables, asking our wives to watch the labels very carefully.

Perhaps this is the point where tribute should be paid to the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko) for his efforts to have home-grown products form part of the menus at dinners and receptions paid for out of the provincial hospitality fund. May I assure him that our grower groups could provide him with some interesting recipes if he runs out of ideas.

And it should be pointed out here that grower and producer alike share a pride in the reputation of our domestic wines which, in the opinion of those who claim to know, need not take a second place to any imported product. Many new Canadians from other lands have brought with them an appreciation of this beverage used in conjunction with meals. And yet, it will only be as the result of the continual demands of the consumer which will force some of our leading hotels, restaurants and other eating establishments to stock the local product.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): We are doing our best for you.

Mr. Welch: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. A certain status symbol seems to attach to the label—not to overlook the larger tip for the higher-priced bottles of imported wine to the maitre d’.

Needless to say, much more could be said with respect to agriculture, this vital part of our economy. We are obliged to do everything possible to stimulate these activities and to give these people purpose and incentive.

Turning to the question of legal aid, Mr. Speaker, life is I think becoming very complicated with all the laws and regulations which are enacted. It is little wonder that many of our people become confused and bewildered. Perhaps it is really too much to expect that people should be presumed to know the law. The problem is made more serious, in my opinion, when you consider the reluctance of many people to seek proper legal advice—obviously concerned about the cost or, even worse, just unable to pay anything. In this connection I am always concerned about the lot of many abused married women who feel they have to resign themselves to their lot in life because of the obvious lack of financial means to have their rights properly defined. Other human examples could be listed.

Most lawyers—and I speak, Mr. Speaker, as a practising solicitor in the province—will tell you that many people who do eventually come to them could have been saved a great deal of mental distress—not to overlook other serious consequences—if they had only come to them sooner. You see many people just need the secure feeling that comes from knowing what their rights are. In other words, if people could be encouraged to seek advice early enough, they might not get themselves so involved in such serious problems—financial, domestic and otherwise.

This, of course, raises the question of legal aid in which the lawyers of this province must be willing to give some sound leadership. We now have the report of the joint committee appointed by this government to study legal aid in the province. And it is a most excellent report. It must be pointed out that there has, in fact, been a legal aid programme sponsored by the law society of Upper Canada. This programme has performed a very useful function. But in doing so, we must also admit that the present plan is not good enough for today's needs—it must have very drastic revision.

In England, it would appear, as we read in this report, that legal aid has fared much better. Under the legal aid advice bill of 1949, legal aid is administered by a board of lawyers and laymen, and I would point out that this lay representation is most important. If entitled, a person has the right to choose his own lawyer from the list of lawyers who have consented to do legal aid work, and the fee of the lawyer so chosen is paid out of the funds provided for this purpose.

The legal profession itself would perform a most valuable service if local county Bar associations, as a matter of good public relations and community service, encouraged people to come in with their problems by agreeing to charge a very minimum fee for the short interview. It would of course be necessary that this service be well advertised in the area. Many lawyers in the province do this work already, but surely the time has come to do it on a more organized basis—even regular public clinics.

The legal rights of an individual in a democratic society should, I feel, be as important as his physical health. The appointment of the civil rights commission by this government was a most significant step, and one which will no doubt have far-reaching results. As our population grows and the rules increase, we must be on guard to make sure that nothing stands in the way to guarantee that the individual understands those rules. Not only must right be done—it must appear to be done as well.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I would like to turn to another area, for there is a growing area of concern with respect to certain care provided for under the Ontario hospital insurance plan. This has to do with the difficulty of drawing a clear line between those who need a hospital-type care, and persons who require home-type care.

In providing accommodation for the elderly, I believe a distinction can, and should, be made between those who require attention because they are ill, and others who need care because they are old. The treatment, control, alleviation or cure of disease in a person of any age is, of course, a health problem. The institutions housing such cases should be of the hospital type.

In contrast to the old person in actual ill health, there is the incapacitated man or woman. The incapacity may be due to the aftermath of illness, or to the mental or physical feebleness of age. Then, the primary need is for domiciliary care. This is a welfare responsibility and the institution should be home-like where personal attention is given to the routines of everyday living.

In summary, the treatment of disease in the aged is a health problem; the care of the enfeebled aged is a welfare responsibility. I believe that the welfare responsibility has largely been fulfilled through the present system of public and private homes for the aged. These homes admit people who have reached the stage where they can no longer look after themselves in the community. The homes are well staffed and equipped to provide a good life for the residents. They are divided into various sections, for normal care, special care, and bed care, so that there are facilities for persons at the several stages of incapacity brought on by age. Individuals who require active medical treatment are not suited to a home for the aged, because such a centre of residential living cannot undertake hospital functions. But, the municipal and private homes do serve the group of aged who need long-term accommodation and attention, due to the incapacities of age. The cost is not a factor of difficulty, since it is proportioned to the actual ability to pay.

When we turn to the situation of the aged who are properly health cases, we find there are certain provisions for their care. The acutely ill, are, of course, in active treatment hospitals, usually paid for by their Ontario hospitalization. For those with a chronic illness, there are chronic hospitals, and here too the insurance is usually available. Then there is the group of elderly persons with various degrees of illness, not acute enough for an active treatment hospital, not judged admissible to a chronic hospital, yet certainly in need of fairly intensive nursing and medical attention and here is where the problem lies.

People in this group are often found in the commercial nursing homes. Sometimes the hospital insurance will accept the case as qualified for insurance coverage; sometimes the degree or kind of illness is not recognized as coverable and the person must either pay his own way or become a charge on the municipality.

Thus, there are patients occupying beds in nursing homes who have their per diem rates paid for by our hospital commission, while in the next bed, a friend or neighbour has to pay the per diem rate himself because he is excluded from the terms of the insurance, and this does create a great problem.

Both patients have paid hospital insurance premiums faithfully, since the beginning of the plan, and one patient cannot understand why he should not have the same benefits as the other patient in the next bed, in the same establishment.

The question seems to be one for the health authorities. It is ill health that is the primary cause for people being in nursing homes and it is the presence of a more or less active disease that prevents them from entering residential homes. The question is whether the terms of the hospital insurance plan should not be widened to cover a broader area of ailments and health conditions.

Perhaps one solution would be convalescent and interim care establishments, built in connection with both acute and chronic hospitals. These additions would not be so costly as a hospital, since the more elaborate facilities such as operating rooms, and so on, would be unnecessary. For old people, this would serve as intermediate accommodation and treatment if they are not ill enough for a hospital bed, yet have a health condition which makes them unsuitable for a residential home.

A system of different levels of institutions seems to be needed in the health field to match the various levels of disabling illness. Chronic hospitals, convalescent and interim care establishments and nursing homes, each would serve a very useful purpose.

Medically great strides are being made in geriatric studies. This is particularly evident in the geriatric study centre sponsored by The Ontario Department of Public Welfare and Metropolitan Toronto. The department also obtained a grant, as you know, some years ago, to open a geriatric ward at Toronto Western hospital. This spring, a conference on university training for geriatric study in Toronto attracted experts from the United States and other provinces. It is apparent that we are gaining more knowledge of the care and treatment of the aged. Ontario is a centre of progress in geriatrics, and I think that the welfare authorities will put these findings to good use for the present and future benefit of our elderly citizens.

Financially, our senior people face the problem of living on fixed incomes, while the cost of living reduces the purchasing power of those incomes. There are those who need financial assistance, and I want to pay tribute to the provincial Department of Public Welfare for the efficient manner with which it carries out its duties in this regard.

Now that the federal government has announced a programme to reduce the qualifying age for the old age security pension to 65, I wonder if the time has come for the province to consider the possibility of gradually changing the basis for old age assistance—on the same year-by-year steps—to finally make it available to all at age 60 under the same arrangements as the present programme for widows and single women.

I appreciate that there are other matters related to this scheme, namely, hospitalization and medical cards. However, this aspect of financial assistance is related to need, and it would seem that the needs of these people are quite real for many in this age group now being covered by general welfare assistance from the municipalities.

Socially, it goes without saying that in an age which stresses the prestige of youth and the importance of working for a living that many of our retired elderly feel quite lonely. Many church and community groups are anxious to take advantage of provincial grants to help make life interesting for our senior people.

The Elderly Persons Social and Recreational Centres Act now offers them an opportunity to develop such facilities. A proposition is now before the St. Catharines city council to establish a recreational centre. Many other examples could be cited.

I am sure we are all looking forward to the report of the select committee on the problems of aging which was set up at the last session of the Legislature. This is a most important area for government consideration and under its able chairman I am sure many worthwhile suggestions will be coming forth. I consider it to be morally incumbent on each generation adequately to look after its elders.

Perhaps this is also the point where some concern should be expressed about the problems being faced by many whom we might not consider to be elderly as such, but are middle-aged citizens who are experiencing difficulty in obtaining employment these days. There are people in their late 40s and early 50s who are being told that they are too old to work and, at the same time, too young for provincially supported pension help.

And then one could not take part in a debate representing an area such as the one from which I come, Mr. Speaker, without saying a word or two about an appreciation of history and tradition. For one privileged to represent the historically rich county of Lincoln in this House would indeed have to mention the importance of tradition and the need for an appreciation of history.

Indeed, in the light of comments which have been made both in and out of this House in recent months, it is well that we stand up and be counted on a subject such as this. For I represent an area of this province where blood was spilled to protect the form of government on which our present system is based—a people who live in a true spirit of friendship with neighbours who are the successors to those who invaded our borders; an area which fully understands the concept of a constitutional monarchy.

And it was at Queenston, in our riding, at a dinner on October 15, 1962, marking the 150th anniversary of this conflict along the banks of the Niagara river, that the Hon. J. Keiller Mackay, then Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, reminded his audience in words such as these:

Out of this agony and from this sanguinary scene there have arisen rich and ennobling traditions. Nor indeed should we speak lightly of tradition. Tradition is the sum of those enduring values which have been kept alive through all mutations. It is tradition which gives continuity, stability and direction to life and reflects the "ceaseless whisper of permanent ideals." Far from stifling growth and progress, it is tradition which gives sustenance and nourishment for their germination. Indeed, one of the greatest of all is the tradition of growth and adaptation, in harmony with the fundamentals drawn from the lessons of the past; and it seems to me that we should have every young mind understand that there is such tradition, and that we wish him to be part of it and get strength from it and, if it lies in his power, to make it still richer and fuller in his day and generation.

Our very way of life, based as it is on our traditions and historical heritage, is the very essence of what we all come to know as something worth fighting for.

I do not want this section of my speech to sound like a history lesson, but it cannot be overemphasized that every facet of our country's life which contributed to our present state of development can be described simply as living history.

I say "living" deliberately, Mr. Speaker, since nothing of consequence that has occurred in the past ever really dies. We Canadians have been somewhat lax in recognizing our traditions and our historical heritage.

I commend the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) for the recent study of his department on this whole subject, and would draw the attention of the House to the programme started in St. Catharines schools this year with the designation of a special Canada Day to draw the pupils' attention to their country and its background.

As responsible citizens it is, in my opinion, our sacred duty to teach our children our past and an appreciation of the lessons to be learned from the experience of our forefathers. And as a history professor said recently: "If properly taught, history provides an excellent opportunity for a student to think for himself and form his own opinion from the facts presented."

This Legislature is a successor to that first Legislature which was convened at Niagara-on-the-Lake — then called Newark — on September 17, 1792. The legislative achievements of that Parliament make very interesting reading.

Perhaps the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) would consider, as part of our Centennial celebrations in 1967, the suggestion that a special session of this Legislature be convened at Niagara-on-the-Lake to mark as well the 175th anniversary of the meeting of the first Parliament at Newark. Research could be started now in order that special publications be prepared to commemorate the occasion. These publications would be available to all our citizens, both in and out of school. Pupils in the schools of the area could be encouraged to produce special programmes in anticipation of the main ceremony and history could be re-enacted in the streets of Niagara.

I would also urge the government to give special consideration to proposals already introduced in the House to assist in the acquisition of some of our historical treasures. Perhaps this could be in the way of grants to societies and groups, who in turn could raise private money for this purpose.

However, Mr. Speaker, it may be government assistance and leadership would be most necessary here.

Needless to say, much more could be set out in a speech such as this, including the plea of my wife and other parents that the hon. Provincial Treasurer find some way to avoid having sales tax paid on the purchase of certain articles of clothing worn by children.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): We have taken that up time after time.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Welch: If you just give me a chance, I will repeat it and then I will underline it. It is the general principle that children's clothing is exempt from such tax, but I am advised that a chunky 11-year-old member of our family requires clothes described as "husky size 14" and that such purchases are considered taxable. Other families, I am told, have been faced with similar situations.

In order that I may go home this weekend and live in peace and harmony, I promised my wife I would make this public plea to the hon. Provincial Treasurer.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to the hon. Prime Minister for the leadership he is giving in this province, and to the statesmanship he exhibits throughout the entire nation. There are many examples before us where issues have been settled by the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario, not on narrow and cheap politically partisan grounds, but rather in the national interest, putting Canada first.

In a period where politics and those in political life are being held in some disrepute because of the publicity being given to certain events and behaviour, I openly admit my pride in having the opportunity to serve the people of this province under the leadership of Prime Minister Robarts—a man with a deep sense of patriotism and political morality.

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have to get down to more prosaic things today than the previous speaker. I must admire his forthrightness in paying tribute to all of those to whom he feels he should pay tribute. I think this is fine, but—

An hon. member: He did not leave many out.

Mr. Freeman: Not too many. But today I would plead with you, Mr. Speaker, and to those of the hon. members who are present in the House, I would plead the cause of a large number of people, a very large number of people in this province, as a matter of fact, in excess of 125,000 people.

To begin, I would say that today in Ontario the small businessman—he it is of whom I speak—is in trouble. A variety of developments in our economic system are menacing his future. To survive, small businessmen are going to have to be assured of much more accessible short-term credit. They must have access to information and technical assistance which are now beyond their means. The small businessman is going to have to turn to government for this help.

Let us be absolutely clear what we mean by a small business. When a group is undefined, it usually does not exist for purposes of positive action. Of the definitions which have been bandied about, some have been needlessly vague and some of them positively misleading. The definition which seems to fit best has been offered by the newspaper, the Independent Businessman. A small business is one with a net worth of $1 million or less and whose shares are not listed on the stock market. This means, in effect, a business which must look to the banks for credit.

Most people would be astonished to realize the proportion of the economy in the hands of small business. The Porter commission studies have estimated that in any one vertical industry—and this is important—in any one vertical industry, 94 to 100 per cent of the businesses are small businesses. In the government brief to this commission, it was estimated that half the work force of the province is either self-employed or working for firms employing less than 15 people. By the definition quoted above, it has been suggested that three-quarters of the work force is involved in small business. Even in an unusual one-industry city like Oshawa, where 12,000 work for one huge company, another 8,000 find their livelihood in an enormous variety of smaller businesses, and Oshawa is very much an exception in Ontario cities.

In achieving industrial expansion and diversification, small businesses have an important economic role to play. While the present government does not appear to oppose the steady flow of industry from the smaller centres to the metropolis of the Golden Horseshoe, I suggest to you that a New Democratic government would. Our plans for regional development will work best from smaller industries and development.

Ontario, and particularly in the north, has had too much experience of one-industry towns. It is plain bad sense to have any population centre's existence dependent solely on a single industry. The people of the city or town are at the mercy of distant economic forces and sometimes of distant management as well. Many will recall the effect on the Brampton area some years ago when the Avro plant was closed.

In small centres economic commonsense would demand the diversified industrial pattern based on a variety of small enterprises in different fields. North Americans have a tendency to worship size, yet there was a real sense in which there was a social virtue in smallness and independence. If Ontario is to live up to its slogan as the province of opportunity, individuals must have a chance to set up their own firms and have a chance for success. Provided a worker finds decent working conditions and the security of the union contract, he or she can find greater challenge and satisfaction as a participant in a small firm than as an anonymous element in a huge corporate undertaking. The philosophers of the industrial revolution and early socialists like Robert Owen and William Morris were never more perceptive than when they condemned the alienation of the industrial worker deprived of a sense of fulfilment. In a small business, this can often be restored.

For all its importance in the economy and community life of this province, small business has been ignored by this government and by the federal government as well. There is no department in this government, not even a branch, with the specific job of considering the needs of small business. This province pays to send representatives abroad to find markets. When they are sent they are representatives of big business. This province pays for a very limited amount of research to be done. When it is examined, it is research work for large undertakings. Perhaps this is understandable when we observe that the hon. Minister who should be concerned has himself come from the management of a very large business.

In the United States a small business administration has been set up for many years to help in this particular area. Nothing like this has been done in Ontario. Instead, we find a variety of boards and commissions, often shrouded in secrecy, and meeting behind closed doors, making decisions which affect small business. The tariff board of the federal government meets in public and publishes the reasons for its decisions. It would be hard to find a single licensing commission, board or authority, under the direction of this government which does as much, yet the decisions of these bodies often have an enormous effect on small businessmen.

One example is already well known. It is the case of the service station and restaurant near Brampton which has been wiped out because of a decision to alter the course of a highway. As an editorial in the Independent Businessman has noted, if a mill is set on a river and the government alters the course of the stream, the miller must be compensated. Not so the independent businessman who in this case just sees his investment wiped out. More recently small businessmen led by Gordon Stanley came to Toronto to protest a government decision which will establish a service centre on Highway 400 near Orillia. This decision may well wipe out these small businessmen.

There are few groups in this province which have received more generous helpings of platitudes from this government than the independent businessmen. There are few groups which have received so little else. It is not really enough to condemn this government. We would also have to condemn some small businessmen who have shared the belief that the government has no obligation to help them. Certainly large corporations are under no such illusion, as we see every day in the close identification of their interests and their thinking with our government. For their own sake and, indeed, the survival of small independent business, we are going to have to look to government action for our preservation.

New Democrats are working to establish what is called a mixed economy. There are many different ways of controlling economic undertakings. There are examples of nearly all of them right here in Canada. Canada has been a pioneer in one form of ownership, the Crown corporation. Mr. Speaker, we do not believe that one form of ownership, be it public, private or co-operative, is suited to every part of the economy. There are some areas which cannot be subject to competition and which are needed by the whole community. The best examples of these are the public utilities, such as Ontario Hydro, or the Toronto transit commission. These are under public ownership now. There are other enterprises which are under co-operative ownership. We believe that this is a good and valid form of management and we would like to help co-ops to become more efficient and to provide better service to their members and to the public.

However, most of the economy is under private management. New Democrats can see no reason why it should not remain so. In many areas it is by far the most effective way that we have found to provide goods and services to the consumer. This is not our experience alone. In Sweden, a country which has enjoyed a social democratic government for well over 30 years, a higher proportion of the economy is in private hands than is the case in Canada today. If the example is not too far-fetched, even a communist country like Poland has been forced to allow private enterprise in the retail field and in agriculture.

A belief in a mixed economy will allow us to work in the best interests of all Canadians, because we are free of any doctrinaire commitment to any particular form of ownership, whether it be private, public or co-operative. If we are going to have a genuine mixed economy, we are going to have to look to the slogans of competition much more seriously. New Democrats do not condemn genuine competition; they do suspect and oppose private concentrations of power in any part of our community. There are areas of the economy where competition would be meaningless or foolish. We do not need two rival telephone systems in Canada; it would be silly to have two rival gas or electricity systems providing services along the same street. In these cases there can be no reasonable competition. The protection of the consumer must be provided in other ways; through very strict regulations, or preferably, through public ownership. The management of these enterprises can only be held responsible to the people through this Legislature.

We are all familiar with the traditional threat to competition, the combine and the monopoly. Many small businessmen live at the mercy of these concentrations of power. The federal government has legislation to deal with monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade. It is the view of our party, as it was of the CCF before us, that the legislation is ineffective, and it is enforced but it is feeble because present and past governments want it to be that way.

There was another, more modern threat to genuine competition in the private sector of the economy, the conglomerate trust. This is a form of holding company which may amass real estate, chemical factories, iron mines, a soft drink company, and, perhaps for a little spice, a newspaper or a radio station.

In the United States a senate sub-committee has been investigating these conglomerates. Some of their discoveries are quite fascinating. I suggest Borden's, for example—and I suggest to you also to forget the "contented cow." Including only some of the big parts of the empire, Borden's now controls two sea-food producers, five canned fruit producers, one each in dehydrated vegetables and pickles, two confectionery companies, one in coated fabrics, two in plastics, and two in plastic products. There are two in printing inks, one in glue and gelatine, one in toilet preparations, and one in surgical appliances. This collection helps to make Borden's one of the 200 largest corporations in the United States.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): No wonder it is a "contented cow."

Mr. Freeman: It should be a "contented cow." I wish our dairy people in the province of Ontario could approach that degree of contentment.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Give us time; we are on the way.

Mr. Freeman: In the fullness of time, the hon. Minister says.

It is not hard to see how conglomerates would be even more effective than monopolies in eliminating competition. Instead of having to collect a large part of an industry under one management to control it, ownership of merely a significant element can give enormous control. A shrinking number of holding companies is doing for industry what food processors have done to agriculture. Vertical integration is no longer a phrase reserved for the farm industry.

The private concentration of economic power creates a far more dangerous situation than might be imagined by any Conservative critic of public ownership. In both cases, Mr. Speaker, competition as a factor is eliminated, but in one case the power passes to a government which here, at least, is responsible to the people. In a private industrial empire, power is wielded in the interests of a small and politically irresponsible group of managers. It is possible that competition and profits cannot coexist.

Professor V. C. Fowke, a perceptive commentator on the business community, once wrote:

Profits exist where competition has been stifled. The search for profits is the search for ways to impair competition—

Mr. MacDonald: This is reality, not the myth you live by.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Does the hon. member think profit is sinful?

Mr. Freeman: I like profit.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): He means when somebody else is making it.

Mr. Freeman: May I repeat, for the edification of the hon. Minister of Highways. He probably is listening with only one ear—it is better to lend both to it; this is important:

Profit exists where competition has been stifled.

Now, follow a little further:

The search for profits is a search for ways to impair competition—

I am sure you are with me this far:

A free enterprise economy is one in which those persons compete who cannot avoid doing so.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I have been listening with both ears.

Mr. Freeman: Did the hon. Minister get the impact?

Mr. MacDonald: He is with us now—fine. Progress.

Mr. Freeman: Now, let us go just a bit further:

For the sake of the consumer and of the private sector of the economy, competition must be restored.

Now I know you are with me.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Not really.

Mr. Freeman: I continue:

The only force in the land with the power to act is the government.

Again, I am sure you are with me!

In the folklore of childhood, Mr. Speaker, there is little law and order. Princes win princesses in fairy tales because of their wit, courage and good looks; dragons are not kept in zoos and wizards are not sent to psychiatrists.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I am all the way back now.

Mr. Bryden: Which direction has the hon. Minister been going in?

Mr. Freeman: In the folklore of free enterprise, similar principles are admired. The world is a jungle where only the strong and quick-witted can make their fortune—and I pay tribute to you, sir, as being strong and quick-witted.

Mr. MacDonald: Look at the stock exchange as being a good example, for example.

Mr. Freeman: There one cannot miss.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: With $100 of stock, the hon. member is one of the guys who are loaded.

Mr. Freeman: Overloaded. It is just as well that most children outgrow these fantasies, however. So do most people with experience of the free enterprise myth; and now we are getting into something in which I think the scant number of people who are in the House today may be interested—and I think it could be of tremendous interest to the small businessmen in the province of Ontario. And I am sure that the small businessmen in the province of Ontario would appreciate you, who are here today, giving some attention to the problems with which they are faced. And they are serious, very serious problems.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You want to help them make a profit, do you not?

Mr. Freeman: Indeed, I do.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He is saying that he can't make a profit without sin.

Mr. Freeman: No, no, no. The hon. Minister is not even listening with one ear. I suggest he take the cotton batting out of his ears.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is so confused. He is a good capitalist!

Mr. Freeman: Let the hon. Minister get his mind on what is being presented today and forget about business downtown.

It is just as well that most children outgrow these fantasies. So do most people with experience of the free enterprise myth. Since the earliest known systems of human government, business has been seeking protection for itself through public action. Practical legal systems were cast in the language of business obligations; medieval laws about quality, and fair weights and measures, existed as much at the behest of merchants as of their customers. In our day, no businessman would deny that he demands transportation facilities, tariff protection and even marketing assistance from the government.

Mr. MacDonald: The original welfare state was for big business.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No interruptions.

Mr. Freeman: A favourable climate is not created for business by government policies of laissez faire. It is promoted by genuine policies of economic expansion through government action. It is promoted by government policies which redistribute income so that lower income groups have more to spend on goods and services, and even the hon. Ministers cannot deny that.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I will buy that.

Mr. Freeman: Even the hon. Minister cannot deny that.

Mr. MacDonald: He said he bought it.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, I said I cannot buy that.

Mr. Freeman: The hon. Minister cannot? But he has been buying it for years, and has not realized it. What a shame!

When the mass of workers survived on subsistence wages it was impossible for them to demand the sophisticated products made available by the industrial revolution. The rise of trade unions revolutionized the income pattern of our workers and today they are playing an incalculable part in liberating our economy from the plight of scarcity. In the past, and to a large extent even now, government has joined short-sighted interests in the community in opposing the growth of the labour movement and a consequent expansion of consumer spending. Every member of the community, and most emphatically the small businessman, can rejoice that these government measures have been unsuccessful.

When governments fail to grapple with problems like unemployment or lagging economic growth, they are robbing businessmen of the possible sales turnover from a prosperous consumer population. When governments leave the rise and fall of the economy to natural forces, they are costing ordinary businessmen money in bad investments in capital equipment and stock.

A planned expanding economy under a New Democratic government would be the best guarantee of prosperity for the independent businessman. And while that sinks in—

Mr. Bryden: It will take a long time.

Mr. Freeman: I know it will take a long time but it will eventually reach the more reasonably minded people.

When governments fail to grapple with problems like unemployment or lagging economic growth, they are robbing businessmen of the possible sales turnover from a prosperous consumer population. When governments leave the rise and fall of the economy to natural forces—and I am sure you must agree with this—

An hon. member: The hon. member said that before.

Mr. Freeman: I wanted to impress it upon hon. members.

When governments leave the rise and fall of the economy to natural forces, they are costing ordinary businessmen money in bad investments in capital equipment and stock, and this is so tragically true, so tragically true. A plan of expanding economy—and I say this again—under a New Democratic government would be the best guarantee of prosperity for the independent businessman.

A favourable economic climate would help all business. I am sure that hon. members will all agree with that. A favourable economic climate will help all business, large and small.

It will not guarantee the survival and expansion of the small entrepreneur. For him there are two basic problems—funds for long-term or equity financing, and managerial assistance. The traditional source of capital for the small businessman has been the savings of its operators, reinforced by credit. Today that is no longer enough. The small businesses do not attract private capital. There are many reasons for this. Many have a short history and a record of limited profits. It is true of most small businesses. Many are owned individually or in partnership and there is no guarantee of continuing sound management. Even when a business is entirely credit-worthy, it remains a long and expensive proposition to persuade a lending institution to place trust in it.

The one source of credit at reasonable cost is the system of chartered banks, yet these are very often difficult and even impossible to deal with. There can be few small businessmen who at one time or another—and I am sure many who are here today realize this full well—have not seen their future jeopardized by a banker's decision. I can add in a way of a personal note that I have a very keen recollection of not too many years ago, during the days of very tight money, which we all remember, I had stock valued at certainly more than $100,000 but when I approached my own bank with regard to a line of credit for spring purchasing, because of the tight money situation my banker explained that it was impossible to extend the line of credit so I had to use other resources.

Interjections by hon. members.

An hon. member: Planned by the wrong people.

Mr. Freeman: And in the wrong way.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Freeman: No, I had some friends who were in the insurance business.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that I, at that particular time—like many other people in today's picture and in years past and in years to come—could have been completely taken out of the retail business picture because of the decision of that bank. And if that is planned economy, I will not buy it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Freeman: However, let us get down to something that may be of interest to the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions. I am not going to talk about his particular department but something that he may be able to advise some of his clientele in future years.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is so long since I have seen a client, I would not know how to talk to one.

Mr. Freeman: The task of solving this problem, Mr. Speaker, lies largely with the federal government—we understand that thoroughly. We believe it lies in the expansion of the Industrial Development Bank. In its brief to the Porter commission—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That is not a Tory government.

An hon. member: It is indeed, the most Tory in Canada.

Mr. Freeman: We believe it lies in the expansion of the Industrial Development Bank. In its brief to the Porter commission, even the Ontario government—this I would call to your attention—was moved to comment of this institution that, and this is a quotation from your government:

It is obvious that it has at time out-banked the bankers in caution.

I repeat:

It is obvious that it has at time out-banked the bankers in caution.

And believe me, that is caution, that is real caution.

Another alternative might be to allow the interest ceiling for the chartered banks to be raised from six per cent to eight per cent. Those of us in business on very many occasions would be willing to pay a higher rate when the investment seemed justified. I think any businessman would go along with that type of thinking, when the investment seems justified.

The only alternative now is to accept the usurious interest rates of the finance companies. The consequence of this kind of borrowing is all too often disastrous, with a businessman forced to hypothecate everything to get cash—even to selling below cost—and this is done every day across this province in order to realize immediate cash to take care of obligations. It probably works out to the benefit of some of the individual consumers—to shoppers—but in the long run I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it cannot fail but cause difficulty to many of the small business people. There must be some way to reduce the gulf in credit costs between the banks and the finance companies.

Raising the interest rates will not be satisfactory unless we can make sure that capital will be available for small business needs. Raising the interest rate ceiling from six to eight per cent solves nothing if large corporations are the only beneficiaries of more available credit and the consumers are the sole losers through higher prices. Regulations must require the chartered banks to make a proportion of their credit available to businesses which have a net worth of less than $1 million. We all know the story, of course, of going to the bank when the banker knows full well that you have on deposit a very large sum of money and he is pressing you to borrow money to expand your business, and of going when the account is a little bit short and the banker is not so interested in whether your business is going to expand or whether it is going to expire.

A third alternative, one which has never been seriously explored, would be to use the machinery of the chartered banks to grant further credit to small business while having their liquidity protected by guarantees from the Industrial Development Bank. This would take advantage of the local facilities and the great resource of experience available in the chartered banks, while liberating credit for this vital sector of the economy.

The problem of credit may be primarily a matter for the federal government but there is nothing to prevent the provincial government taking its own initiative in this area. Credit need is urgent enough to deserve substantial government initiative.

Another major problem which faces the small businessman, is information and professional knowledge. By his very essence, the small businessman must be his own expert in many aspects of his own business. He must make decisions about processes, publicity, merchandising policy and office management. If he is an expert in design and fabrication, he is equally supposed to be an expert in accounting. The fact is that no businessman or woman can hope to be such an expert. Businessmen need help in keeping up with the developments in their field and in the economy generally. They need information about markets, about new ideas in management and merchandising, and suggestions about better financial control. They need help in dealing with the seemingly infinite variety of regulations, questionnaires, rebates, and other chores which the government has seen fit to drop in our laps. When I was operating a business I found that I was also a tax collector, for both federal and provincial governments, and as well a faithful participant in DBS surveys.

In the United States, help in this field comes from the Small Business Administration. Among other services, it employs 250 representatives, most of them recently retired executives who have had long experience in various fields of management. Their services are available on request. In Canada, we have long recognized that one area of independent business needs a regular source of ideas, information and guidance. In Ontario, the agricultural representative service is one of the most important parts of the extension branch of The Department of Agriculture. We need business representatives who can provide the same kind of assistance to small business as the ag. rep. now gives to the farmer.

By the very nature and scope of his business, a small businessman simply cannot afford to have this kind of expertise in his own organization. For himself, he cannot have the time and the capacity to absorb and assess the flood of information and promotional material which crosses his desk. A business representative service would be the basis for providing small business with a solution to the problem of information.

Again in the United States, the patent office publishes a regular report of new inventions in various fields. For firms interested in modernization and development, this publication has enormous value. In Canada, no such publication is issued. Once again, large corporations have the means to search out developments and to evaluate them. Small businesses do not. Again, there is scope for government action to relieve the shortage of information.

In its publicity, The Department of Economics and Development claims that one of its jobs is to form co-operatives of small businesses for more effective export undertakings. Once again, we return to a government which has a certain facility with phrases and a proved incapacity for bringing them to realization in this field in particular. Ontario government assistance in the export programme has gone overwhelmingly to the larger corporations, precisely those which need the help least. Here again, there is need for redress and emphasis.

As a model of all the problems we are considering in connection with small business, let us look at one industry, the tourist business. This is one of the major segments of the Ontario economy and one of the largest earners of US dollars and funds from other countries. At the same time, no one would say that this industry is helping our image. Some of our major tourist centres have been described—and I know it seems brutal, very brutal—as looking like hobo jungles, with dilapidated accommodation, inadequate facilities and unkempt surroundings. The mass of operators in this field are small businessmen, struggling to make a lean living in a short season. The bankruptcy rate in this field is proportionately higher than in most areas of small business and it is not hard to see why.

In few fields is credit more necessary or harder to come by. There has been only limited government initiative to promote co-operation among resort operators to improve the general appearance of holiday areas outside provincial parks, and as a result, some resort areas look like hucksterism gone mad. It seems sad that the government should spend more than $1 million to inveigle tourists to this province and then do so little to help them have satisfactory accommodation when they arrive.

A variety of suggestions have been made for government programmes to assist the small businessman. They will come to nothing unless they are presided over by a Cabinet Minister and administered by a single government department. We believe the time has come to eliminate the somewhat unhappy Department of Tourism and Information and to replace it with a department of business and tourism, presided over by a Minister with a direct knowledge and experience of small business. Since between half and three-quarters of the work force of Ontario must be in this category, it would be a rare Prime Minister who could not find such a Minister among his followers.

A department of business and tourism would have a direct responsibility for creating and developing a business representative service, bringing information, experience and professional knowledge to the service of Ontario's small businessmen. It would also assume responsibility for Ontario development agency financial assistance to small businesses, operating this service with considerably more imagination and dispatch than is now felt to be the case. The department would also have a research unit, organized to back up the business representatives and to provide information on economic, technical and managerial problems. Such a service should be provided at cost.

There has never been any suggestion that small businessmen are not proudly determined to pay their own way. The new department would, of course, continue the programmes of the present department in the area of tourist promotion, but it would take a much greater interest in facilities and services available to tourists on arrival. This would be its link with other sections of the department.

As for the present information role of The Department of Tourism and Information, the current session of the Legislature has drawn sufficient attention to the dubious nature of many of the services provided. Each department of government continues to have its own information service and there is no need to create the machinery for the expensive duplication and effort in operating in other departments.

Most businessmen would recognize that there was a community of economic interest with consumer and producer. In the age of scarcity, most attention has been concentrated on the human being as the producer. With the approach of an age when demand is persistently running behind supply, the human being as consumer is gaining in importance. New Democrats are keenly concerned about this transition. They are convinced that the small businessman has a vital role to play in the economy. They know that he will benefit from policies of higher consumer income and from measures to protect the consumer from the deceits of the unscrupulous merchandiser. They also know that the small businessman will need positive government action for his own survival.

I have outlined four major proposals for legislation to protect and encourage men and women who represent such a massive proportion of our economy: one, a department of business and tourism under a Minister with personal experience in small business and administering agencies of government directly assisting small businessmen; two, a business representative service providing information, expert advice and assistance to small businessmen; three, provincial government action to provide credit to small business and provincial representations to the federal government to take early action in this field; four, legislation to provide boards and commissions whose decisions may affect the livelihood and property of individual citizens, to conduct their deliberations in public and to offer reasons for their decisions in writing.

The notion that government has a role in assisting small business may strike some Conservatives as strange; it will not surprise realists in business and to many of us with personal experience in business, it seems long overdue.

In conclusion, perhaps I might again add a brief quotation from an editorial in the Independent Businessman and I quote:

Today, application, honesty and hard work are not enough to ensure a businessman's future. Today, he must have a combination of genius, blarney and witchcraft to survive, let alone to succeed. This need not be; this should not be.

Mr. R. J. Harris (Beaches) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The ninth order, resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for second reading of Bill No. 127, An Act to establish the Ontario institute for studies in education.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to speak at great length on this. In face of those interjections, it is obvious that the quality of the contribution is of no concern in this House—as long as it is reduced as short as possible.

Mr. Speaker, what I was about to say was that there is obviously great value in co-ordinating research in the field of education. Indeed, this is long overdue. We have had a tendency to a piecemeal approach to research; it has been fragmented; it certainly has been inadequate in its overall scope; and therefore, it seems to me that the first step in getting an adequate research programme must be one which will seriously co-ordinate what is going on in the field at the present time. I assume that one of the major objectives of this new body is to do just this and therefore I think it commends itself for that, if for no other reason.

When I move into the next area that my friend, the hon. member for Brant (Mr.

Nixon), raised, I must confess that I am still a little puzzled as to many of the worries that he expressed. I do not want to get into an argument with him. Indeed, I am anxious to hear what the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) has to say in case there is some validity in what the hon. member for Brant has raised.

At the moment, I just cannot see it. I will agree that theoretically, research, if it is handled by an independent agency that has no relationship with government, might conceivably be better research. Sometimes, however, there is a rather precious approach taken by people who are in business or in the academic world—that if the government happens to have some relationship to a project of this nature, inevitably this is going to reduce its quality.

I do not think that this necessarily need be the case. Indeed, when the hon. member for Brant presumably was clinching his case of the inhibiting or crippling factors that might be introduced by having a research programme that came so directly under the Minister, he cited two possible areas in which there might be a desire for research, and because of the constitution of the governing body, these would be vetoed. He suggested, for example, that they might want to research the Minister. Forgive me, Mr. Speaker, but I think the hon. member for Brant was really reaching on that occasion. Or they might want to research—

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): They might want to research the development of educational television and the Minister's role in it.

Mr. MacDonald: He also raised the proposition that they might want to do research into one of the teachers' federations and its role, and if they were on the board of directors, they would veto it. Again, these do not strike me as too convincing, but I look forward to the hon. Minister's comment on this particular aspect of the observations that the hon. member for Brant raised.

Let me just say in the final portion of my comments, Mr. Speaker, one reason why I have no objection, or why a very great need can be met in a research programme that is going to be tied pretty directly to the Minister and The Department of Education, is that I think if one were to go back—one could talk for an hour on this—to an analysis of some of the major steps and developments in education that this government has made in the last few years, one would find it has made pathetically little preparation, let alone research, or any activity that could be dignified by the name research. I remember that dramatic occasion, ironic occasion, shocking occasion, of sitting in a standing committee of the Legislature when the hon. member—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald:—when the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) was Minister of Education and introduced what is known as the Robarts plan. There was a bit of a mad scramble to get this explained so that people might know what it was, and there came before us one of the top officials of The Department of Education who, for his own benefit, I shall leave unnamed. Somewhat indiscreetly, he commented that on one occasion he had been sitting with the Minister and the Minister had commented to him, "Well, fine. Now we have made arrangements for all of these buildings through using the funds that were made available federally, what are we going to teach in the buildings?"

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Oh, no, no, no!

Mr. MacDonald: This protest is about five years too late.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to see that the hon. member has a big grin on his face when he makes this statement. I think I could go back, with a little research, and point out the time-tabling on this thing to show that the hon. member's statement simply could not be. And, anyway, I never heard him raise it before. That is quite a few years ago—

Mr. MacDonald: I have raised it two or three times in this House and I am very intrigued that the hon. Prime Minister should jump at this point. However, I do not want to go back and go into the details—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Neither do I.

Mr. MacDonald: It illustrates the point that I raised in this House the first time I came into the House in 1956—before the education estimates—about the great gap in our educational system, for example, in the provision of trades training and the fact that we had not implemented the programme mapped out by Dr. John Seath in the first decade of this century. I can recall making a speech when the former Minister of Education in this House was listening. As I said before, it was like throwing a snowball against a stone wall—it just collapsed and fell in a heap. Two or three years later, with the hard core of unemployment, with the “sputniks” in the sky from the other side of the Iron Curtain, with the provision of funds from the federal level to be able to catch up on this great gap, we certainly catapulted ourselves ahead and caught up a generation at least in the physical structures for this aspect of our educational system.

The hon. Prime Minister simply cannot deny the reality of this, and frankly, he cannot deny the reality of the fact that there was painfully little research as to what was going to go into the research programme. Indeed, they called in the teachers to explain it to them, arguing that a few teachers had been involved in the shaping of it prior to that.

Mr. Speaker, I could take many other aspects of our educational development in the last five years in which I think we are now facing difficulties because of an inadequacy of approach. Therefore any kind of an institution like this which would, in a more organized and consistent fashion, in a much broader and more comprehensive way, tackle the educational research problem for our present system and for its future development and expansion, I think is extremely necessary. It is a little late, but better late than never.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education and University Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just to reply very briefly to the observations of the hon. member for Brant who endeavoured to raise two or three matters in his remarks yesterday. I must confess that I am not impressed with the validity of his suggestions as to the constitution of the board, nor the question of independence. I think it is obvious that the intention here is to give the new institute a substantial degree of autonomy, otherwise it could be done entirely within the department itself. Yet at the same time I think it must be obvious to the hon. member that—and the hon. member for York South, I think, agrees with this, Mr. Speaker, we badly need research in the field of education today and we have adopted this vehicle as being the appropriate way. We are, I think, quite encouraged by the response to date.

I should point out that some reference was made to my remarks about the London school and I was looking through my statement and I have yet to find it. I think this probably was referred to in some newspaper editorial.

We have also studied the Harvard school of graduate education, and I think if the hon. member looks at this carefully he will find that it is not really used to assist the board of education of the state of Massachusetts, it is financed primarily on foundation funds, private moneys and perhaps some federal assistance through The Defence Training Act. These resources are not available to us in this jurisdiction. Substantial sums of public money must be spent on building up the type of research institute that is necessary here in this province.

Mr. Nixon: If I might ask, is there any other source of money going to be made available to this institute, other than the money we vote from here?

Hon. Mr. Davis: If the hon. member looks carefully at the bill itself, he will see that there is provision for other money. Whether it comes from private sources or foundations, there will be no limitation on the money that will be available—

Mr. Nixon: Is the hon. Minister aware of any?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I am not aware of any, and this is why we are doing it. We think it is absolutely necessary that this be done. Private industry and foundation money—the hon. member should know this—for research in Ontario is not as plentiful as it was two years ago because of the policies of the federal government in Washington—not in Ottawa—and this has made the situation somewhat difficult. We think that public funds must be available and as a result this institute must be in a position to do work for The Department of Education.

I had no hesitation—the hon. member mentioned this—in putting in the legislation that the Minister shall nominate the first directors. I do not care how elaborate an administrative structure you have, Mr. Speaker, certainly the key to the initial success of something like this lies in the personnel. I have every confidence that Dr. Jackson is as able as, if not more able than, any single individual whom you might select for this particular position, so I had no hesitation at all in putting this in the legislation.

The hon. member also referred to the field of graduate work and I should point out to the hon. member that this legislation does not give the institute the right to grant degrees. It gives it the right to prepare people for degrees, but obviously any degree-granting institution—and in this case it will be initially the University of Toronto—will have some considerable interest in the personnel who are appointed to the staff and who will be lecturing or giving courses in the degree field.

In fact, we have had discussions already with the dean of the graduate school of the University of Toronto and the president of that university. A committee will be established so that members who are to be appointed in the graduate area will be done so on the recommendation of this committee to the board. We are just as interested, and Dr. Jackson is just as interested, in maintaining a very high academic quality in the field of graduate study as, I am sure, the hon. member for Brant is. Therefore, this really is not a problem, in that the institute does not have the right to grant degrees; they must be granted by some degree-granting institution.

Mr. Nixon: Has the hon. Minister ever suggested that it would evolve into an independent degree-granting status?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, it has been suggested it become independent but not necessarily for degree-granting purposes. Mr. Speaker, I shall not stand up in this House either and predict what the function of this institution will be ten years hence, or the functions of many other educational institutions. I think this would be very foolish.

I think these were really the main objections or observations that were made by the hon. member for Brant, and I think, Mr. Speaker, that what we are initiating here is sound—from an academic standpoint. Of equal importance, I think it will fulfill a function that is necessary in this province and quite frankly one that I personally support enthusiastically.

There was one other area that was raised. The hon. member suggested that I had enunciated the areas for research. This is not the case. I named some of them; there is no limitation on what other areas the board might decide or the director might decide to pursue, although I did notice, as did the hon. member for York South with some interest, the possibility that the hon. member for Brant suggested, that the teachers' federation should examine its own administration. Quite frankly, I question whether the research institute would ever become involved in such a study. This has never crossed my mind before.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I should make it clear that the suggestion was that this group might be examining the role that the teachers' professional organizations play in education. No one has suggested that their administration needs any examination, nor that—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I apologize if I took that inference, but I think if the hon. member reads what he said, it is quite obvious that one could.

Mr. Nixon: I am very pleased that the hon. Minister does not feel that they need this examination.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I do not think, Mr. Speaker, there is anything more that I can usefully add unless the hon. members opposite have any other specific questions.

Mr. MacDonald: We cannot ask on second reading.

THE SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves second reading of Bill No. 134, An Act to amend The Succession Duty Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the House, there is an announcement perhaps I could have the indulgence of the House to make.

The Flag Act, 1965, which received Royal Assent in this House on February 14, 1965, will come into effect by proclamation on Friday, May 21 next. On that date, commencing at 9:30 in the morning before the House sits we will hold a ceremony on behalf of the people of the province in order to raise the flag of Ontario in front of the Parliament buildings.

The Royal Canadian Regiment band will be in attendance from London, and the civil service choir. There will be a guard of honour composed of our own provincial police. The Lieutenant-Governor will be in attendance and the proclamation bringing into effect the Act adopting the flag, which I might say has now been approved by Her Majesty the Queen, will be read by Donald Morrow.

There will be a programme worked out and circulated, but I would like to stress at this time that this symbol of our identity as a province is not intended to in any way be a substitute for any other flag or flags which will be flown, of course, on proper occasions when such flags should be flown. I would say, notwithstanding any speculative discussion—and there has been some—that in accordance with custom the new Canadian flag will take its honoured place on the new flagpole which is being erected outside, according to the protocol of flags—which is not an easy thing to get at, I might say.

The new flagpole that is being erected, according to the protocol, will give pre-eminence to the flag of Canada. Our provincial flag will fly on the flagpole where the flag of Canada is presently flying.

I do not want anyone to think that by this shift of flags we are moving the flag of Canada to a secondary position because we are not. If there are two flagpoles, according to protocol, as I can determine it, the right hand flagpole looking down University Avenue is the senior flagpole and on that flagpole will fly the flag of Canada.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): It is dependent on whether you look from the north or the south.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: As I say, this is the protocol as far as I am able to establish it. The whole question of flags, banners and ensigns is shrouded in the mist of antiquity and it is very difficult to establish these things. But I just want to make it very clear that as far as I can establish, this is the precedent.

I would say that in adopting the provincial flag, as I have said before, we bear in mind our own traditions, our own heritage, our own historical background. We think that this flag will help to give us a strong and united Canada.

Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will resume the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General and we will sit Monday evening.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. Prime Minister indicate whether it is his intention to call Bill No. 136 on medical insurance next week?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I want to make sure that it has proper circulation, but I can assure the hon. members I will not call it without at least two days' notice. It is a very important piece of legislation and there will be no attempt on the part of this government to hurry this legislation through this House.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 1.05 o'clock, p.m.

The first part of the report deals with the general situation of the country and the progress of the war.
